Millions to Go to Digging Up Dirt on Democrats

Republicans are planning to spend the vast majority of their sizable financial war chest over the final 60 days of the campaign attacking Democratic House and Senate candidates over personal issues and local controversies, GOP officials said.

The National Republican Congressional Committee, which this year dispatched a half-dozen operatives to comb through tax, court and other records looking for damaging information on Democratic candidates, plans to spend more than 90 percent of its $50 million-plus advertising budget on what officials described as negative ads.

The hope is that a vigorous effort to "define" opponents, in the parlance of GOP operatives, can help Republicans shift the midterm debate away from Iraq and limit losses this fall. The first round of attacks includes an ad that labeled a Democratic candidate in Wisconsin "Dr. Millionaire" and noted that he has sued 80 patients.

"Opposition research is power," said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), the NRCC chairman. "Opposition research is the key to defining untested opponents."

The Republican National Committee, meanwhile, has enlisted veteran party strategist Terry Nelson to run a campaign that will coordinate with Senate Republicans on ads that similarly will rely on the best of the worst that researchers have dug up on Democrats. The first ad run by the new RNC effort criticizes Ohio Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) for voting against proposals designed to toughen border protection and deport illegal immigrants.

Because challengers tend to be little-known compared with incumbents, they are more vulnerable to having their public image framed by the opposition through attacks and unflattering personal revelations.

And with polls showing the Republicans' House and Senate majorities in jeopardy, party strategists said they have concluded that their best chance to prevent big Democratic gains is a television and direct-mail blitz over the next eight weeks aimed at raising enough questions about Democratic candidates that voters decide they are unacceptable choices.

"When you run in an adverse political environment, you try to localize and personalize the race as much as you can," Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) said.

In a memo released last week, Cole, who is running to succeed Reynolds at the NRCC, expanded on that strategy. The memo recommended that vulnerable incumbents spend $20,000 on a research "package" to find damaging material about challengers and urged that they "define your opponent immediately and unrelentingly."

GOP officials said internal polling shows Republicans could limit losses to six to 10 House seats and two or three Senate seats if the strategy -- combined with the party's significant financial advantage and battled-tested turnout operation -- proves successful. Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to win control of the House and six to regain power in the Senate.

Against some less experienced and little-known opponents, said Matt Keelen, a Republican lobbyist heavily involved in House campaigns, "It will take one or two punches to fold them up like a cheap suit."

Republicans plan to attack Democratic candidates over their voting records, business dealings, and legal tussles, the GOP officials said.

John Geer, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University and the author of a book on negative advertising, said Republicans and Democrats alike lack positive issues on which to run because of divisions over the war and economic policy. This will be a "very negative campaign and probably a more negative campaign than any in recent memory," Geer said.

As Republicans try to localize races, Democrats' hopes for the most part hinge on being able to nationalize the election and turn it into a referendum on the Iraq war, President Bush, and the performance of the Republican Congress -- all faring poorly in polls this year.

Bush will try to make terrorism the issue nationally, casting the election as a choice between two distinct approaches for protecting the nation from attack. Beyond that, however, most Republicans want to distance their elections from the national context.

That strategy is born of necessity. Republicans are alarmed by the large number of House and Senate incumbents who are trailing or tied in their internal polling. Many are attracting the support of less than 45 percent of likely voters -- a danger zone for any incumbent 60 days before an election. The political rule of thumb is that incumbents rarely draw a majority of voters who make up their minds in the days shortly before Election Day.

History shows how the combination of opposition research and negative advertising can work. In 2000, Republicans unleashed a furious attack on the spending practices of Democratic House candidate Linda Chapin, including her purchase of an $18,500 bronze frog as a legislator in Florida. Chapin, then the favorite to win an open Florida House seat, lost to Republican Ric Keller. That same election cycle, Republicans dug up a tape of state Rep. Eleanor Jordan (D-Ky.) asking to speed up a vote so she could attend a fundraiser, an image that destroyed her chances of knocking off Rep. Anne M. Northup (R).

This year, the challenge is tougher, as national polling shows voters dissatisfied with the party in power and ready for a change.

"When all [Republicans] do is launch potshots, they look like they're trying to cover up the fact that they have no solutions" said Phil Singer, communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

As in past elections, the bulk of negative advertising this year probably will be delivered by party committees -- a strategy that allows the candidates to distance themselves from the trash-talking messages that turn off some voters.

Wisconsin's 8th District offers an example. Earlier this summer, the NRCC sent a young staff member to the district for one week to look through court records, government and medical documents, and local newspapers to find embarrassing information about physician Steve Kagen, one of the leading Democratic candidates in an important swing district, an NRCC aide said. The researcher discovered that Kagen's allergy clinic has sued more than 80 patients, mostly for failing to pay their bills.

A new NRCC ad airing in the Green Bay area, the district's main media market, warns: "What Dr. Millionaire doesn't want you to know is his clinic left more than 80 patients behind -- suing them. That's right, suing more than 80 patients."

In recent elections, Democratic officials have complained that Republicans are much better at opposition research. But Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who chair the Democrats' House and Senate campaign committees, have invested more heavily in research. Notably, the researchers dig not only into Republicans, but also their own candidates. This allows Democrats to anticipate what is coming and be ready to respond quickly.

One Democratic research success this year came when Emanuel's staff combed though the archives of several universities to find a copy of an article Colorado Republican candidate Rick O'Donnell wrote for an obscure publication in the mid-1990s. A researcher eventually found the article at George Washington University. In it, O'Donnell argued that Social Security should be abolished -- a revelation that was highlighted in three sharply worded DSCC mailings in the district.

Direct-mail appeals often carry the most negative and potentially damaging messages. Dan Hazelwood, a leading GOP direct mail consultant, said that if a hypothetical Democratic candidate favors the establishment of a garbage dump in a section of the district, for instance, it makes more sense to "narrow-cast" this message by mail to the people most affected rather than buying an expensive, districtwide television ad.

The RNC's expanded role in part reflects concerns that Senate Republicans may not have enough money to take the fight to Democrats. The National Republican Senatorial Committee, under Chair Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), had $15 million less to spend than the DSCC at the end of July. But, the RNC is planning to make up the difference. The committee ended July with nearly $44 million in the bank, four times what the Democratic National Committee had on hand.

In setting up a separate arm to spend money on Senate races, the RNC is altering its past practice. In the past, the RNC simply transferred a large sum of money to the House and Senate campaign committees and let the chairmen decide how to spend it. This year, Nelson -- a former top official in the Bush reelection effort and political strategist for House Republicans -- will work with consultants Tony Feather and Curt Anderson to oversee the TV and direct-mail campaign, which by law must remain independent of coordination directly with candidates.

Dems Seek To Tap Voter Discontent, Economic Jitters (HC)

GOP highlights national security theme as a bleak year is predicted for House majority

WASHINGTON — The fall congressional campaign season promises a wild ride as Democrats seek to tap into voter discontent and end the Republicans' 12-year reign as the majority in the House.

In the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 elections, Democrats will hammer at what they argue is the incompetence of the Bush administration in prosecuting the war in Iraq.

They also are appealing to economic jitters of voters by criticizing high, albeit falling, gas prices and lack of wage growth.

Republicans are fighting back by highlighting the national security theme that worked so well for the party in the past two elections, when President Bush convinced many Americans that he and his party were tougher than Democrats in the war against terrorism.

Republicans hold a 232-203 majority in the House.

Stuart Rothenberg, of the Rothenberg Political Report, predicts that the Democrats will pick up between 15 and 20 seats.

Amy Walter, who analyzes House races for the Cook Political Report, also predicts a bleak year for Republicans, noting that all but nine of the 44 House races considered competitive are held by Republicans.

Analysts say the problem for Republicans is that public opinion already may have hardened, particularly in the Northeast and Midwest, where Bush is particularly unpopular and voters may have tuned out the White House message.

Polls also show that most voters do not see Iraq as a part of the war on terrorism, making it difficult for Bush to justify the urgency of winning in Iraq.

Further, voters' opinion of the GOP-controlled Congress, where major issues such as immigration reform remained stalled, is lower than that of the president.

In a Zogby poll taken Sept. 1-5, 17 percent of respondents rated Congress' performance excellent or good. The same poll found 37 percent rated Bush's performance excellent or good.

Tough races ahead

Seniority may not guarantee re-election, as several top House Republicans find themselves in peril this year, including Ohio Rep. Deborah Pryce, who ranks fourth in the House GOP leadership and is in charge of fashioning the party message.

The seven-term congresswoman has been comfortably re-elected in the past but faces a strong headwind this year in a state where the manufacturing sector is in the dumps and top state Republicans, including the current governor, have been ensnared in corruption scandals.

Pryce's Columbus-area district has become more Democratic.

Bush narrowly defeated Democrat John Kerry there in 2004. Her Democratic opponent, Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy, has accused Pryce of pushing the unsuccessful GOP proposal to create private Social Security accounts.

In Connecticut, GOP Rep. Nancy Johnson, who was first elected in 1982 and has risen to become an expert on heath care issues, is facing a tough race against state Sen. Chris Murphy in a Democrat-leaning state where the Iraq conflict is particularly unpopular.

Senate challengesWhile no one is yet predicting the Democrats will seize control of the Senate, experts say they could come close to winning the six seats needed to oust the Republicans from power.

Republican Senate incumbents Mike DeWine of Ohio, Conrad Burns of Montana and Jim Talent of Missouri face spirited challenges.

Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, an outspoken social conservative who has unabashedly backed Bush on Iraq, is considered the most endangered GOP incumbent in his race against Democrat Bob Casey Jr., son of a late popular governor.

Democrats, however, face a competitive race in New Jersey, where polls show moderate Republican Tom Kean Jr., son of the former governor, running even with Democrat Sen. Robert Menendez.

2 Georgia Races May Threaten Democrats' Struggle For Power (LAT)

By Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Two congressmen face well-known opponents whose bids are aided by GOP redistricting.

ATLANTA — Riding a wave of discontent over the economy, Iraq and gas prices, Democrats are hoping to win enough seats to retake the House of Representatives this November. But their success could also hinge on their ability to keep the seats they already have — and doing so could prove difficult in two key races in Georgia.

Democratic U.S. Reps. Jim Marshall of Macon and John Barrow of Savannah are facing hearty challenges from a pair of former Republican congressmen with name recognition and the ability to raise big money. Bolstering their chances are new district boundaries drawn up by the first GOP-dominated Georgia Legislature since Reconstruction.

The outcome of the races could have broad national implications. The Democratic Party needs a net gain of 15 seats to obtain a majority in the House. Its candidates are posing serious threats to Republican incumbents in states such as Indiana, Connecticut and Pennsylvania.

But Republicans have also identified a handful of vulnerable Democratic incumbents, and are hoping to pick off a few of them to thwart a Democratic return to power.

DOJ_NMG_0060619

"Everyone's focused right now on where Democrats can gain seats, and properly so — it's a Democratic year," said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics. "But if Republicans can steal even a few seats from Democrats, it will probably eliminate the chances of a Democratic takeover.

"Georgia has two of these races — I really don't think there is another state where there are two Democratic seats that are at least somewhat vulnerable."

Carl Forti, communications director of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Marshall and Barrow were among 10 House Democratic incumbents his party considered beatable this year.

Others include veteran Iowa Rep. Leonard L. Boswell, a septuagenarian who has had health problems and who is facing a well-funded Republican challenger; Rep. Melissa Bean, an Illinois freshman whose victory was aided by the lackluster campaign of her 2004 rival; and Rep. Chet Edwards of Texas, whose district includes President Bush's Crawford ranch.

In Georgia, as in much of the South, the Democratic Party has been dramatically losing ground in recent years. Since 2004, Republicans have controlled both chambers of the state Legislature and the governor's office.

Democrats grumbled when the ascendant Republicans redrew congressional maps, which were introduced last year. Republicans said they were correcting years of Democratic gerrymandering.

This year, Barrow, a former county commissioner from Athens, and Marshall, a former mayor of Macon, were left with districts that had fewer registered Democrats. Barrow even had to leave Athens, his longtime hometown and, as the home of the University of Georgia, a Democratic redoubt, because it was left out of the boundaries of his redrawn 12th District. He moved to Savannah in January.

In November, Barrow will again face off against Max Burns, a conservative farmer who served in the House for one term before being defeated by Barrow in 2004. In the 8th District, Marshall is facing Mac Collins, a trucking entrepreneur who was a congressman from 1993 to 2003 and lost a bid for U.S. Senate in 2004.

Barrow and Marshall call themselves conservative Democrats — and point to their routine flouting of the party line. Both voted for the strict House bill addressing illegal immigration, both oppose gay marriage and both oppose set timelines for a withdrawal from Iraq.

Perhaps as a result, their Republican rivals have emphasized the bigger picture in their campaigns — namely, what would happen if the Democrats took control of the house. In a recent Collins TV ad, his opponent isn't mentioned at all. Instead, the ad targets House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who would presumably become House Speaker with a Democratic majority.

The ad says Pelosi would give "amnesty" to illegal aliens, doling out "welfare, food stamps and free education."

"How do we stop her?" the ad says. "Elect Mac Collins."

In a recent news release, Burns' camp also points to the alleged perils of a Pelosi-led Congress, noting her opposition to the National Security Administration's wiretapping program.

"At a time when our country needs to clearly remain on the offense against terrorists, John Barrow supports leaders who want to retreat and take away the programs necessary to win the global War on Terror," Burns said in the release.

In a phone interview, Barrow said voters in his district respected him for voting not according to dogma, but according to the district's best interests. "Ms. Pelosi only controls her vote," he said. "She doesn't control mine."

On Thursday, Bush traveled to Pooler, Ga., a Savannah suburb, and spoke at a fundraiser for Burns (who, unlike Collins, has lagged behind his Democratic opponent in the money race, despite raising more than $1.1 million through July 1).

Bush focused on national security, telling the GOP donors that Burns "understands the stakes" in the war on terrorism.

Democrats may disagree with that assessment. But everyone seems to agree the stakes in these two races could be greater than who represents a handful of Georgia counties.

To Hold Senate, G.O.P. Bolsters Its Most Liberal (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

WARWICK, R.I., Sept. 9 — With a barrage of television advertisements and the mobilization of its get-out-the-vote machine, the national Republican Party has lined up in Rhode Island to beat back a conservative primary challenge to the most liberal Republican in the Senate, Lincoln Chafee. The outcome on Tuesday could help determine whether Democrats have a shot at taking back the Senate.

In an extraordinary pre-emptive announcement, the National Republican Senatorial Committee has said it will concede Rhode Island to the Democrats should Stephen Laffey, the mayor of Cranston, defeat Mr. Chafee in the primary. Citing poll data, Republican leaders said they saw no way someone as conservative as Mr. Laffey could win in a state as Democratic as this; as it is, they are increasingly worried about Mr. Chafee's hopes in a general election.

The result has been the striking sight of the national Republican Party, dominated by conservatives, using resources to save the seat of a Republican who said he voted against Mr. Bush in 2004. He chose instead to write in the name of the first President Bush.

Mr. Chafee has opposed many centerpiece Republican policies, from the war in Iraq to tax cuts to most restrictions on abortion. This week, he helped force a delay on the confirmation of John R. Bolton as the United States ambassador to the United Nations.

For all that, Republicans said they expected to spend more than $1.2 million on advertisements attacking Mr. Laffey, saturating the television stations of this state, the nation's smallest. One advertisement lifts a line Republicans have used in countless attacks against Democrats, mocking the mayor as "tax-and-spend Steve Laffey."

Mr. Laffey's supporters, led by the Club for Growth, an organization advocating tax and spending cuts, have countered energetically with advertisements that have hammered the senator as a Washington insider and a Republican reprobate.

The Republican National Committee has rolled out its 72-hour get-out-the-vote program — used to great effect in 2002 and 2004 — against one of its own this year. More than a dozen trained party turnout specialists are encamped at a local motel.

"If Laffey won, on Day 1 of the general election, it would be over for us," said Brian Nick, the communications director for the Republican Senate campaign committee. Asked if his committee, run by Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, would then concede Rhode Island to the Democrats, Mr. Nick responded:

"No question about it. Would you play somewhere where you were down by 30 and you couldn't move the numbers?"

The fight has laid bare the ideological divisions in the Republican Party as well as the difficult road it faces in the fall. The Senate seat, which Mr. Chafee took over from his father, John H. Chafee, after he died in 1999, has been held by Republicans since 1976.

Mr. Laffey, standing on his front lawn before a Saturday morning of door-to-door campaigning, said Washington Republicans were coming after him because they viewed him as a threat to their power.

"It is really incredible to watch," he said. "Senator Elizabeth Dole and Karl Rove, and all those people down in Washington, they are just about power. The last thing anybody wants down in Washington — whether it is the Democratic National Party or the Republican National Party — is somebody there asking questions."

The contest in Rhode Island, where fewer than 15 percent of registered voters are Republicans, is one of several primaries on Tuesday that will begin to set the final cast for the fall elections. It comes as President Bush has sought to shape the midterm campaigns with a new emphasis on national security.

To win the Senate, Democrats need to capture six seats, and Rhode Island is high on their target list. Both sides see Democrats as having a better shot at winning the 15 seats they need to seize the House.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said he was confident that the Democratic challenger in Rhode Island — it is likely to be Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general — could defeat whoever wins the Republican primary.

"We have the inverse of what is usually true," Mr. Schumer said. "The Republicans are beating each other up in the primary, and our Democratic candidate has had two months to get to know the voters."

Mr. Chafee said in an interview that he appreciated the reinforcements from Washington, but that it could hurt the complicated juggling act confronting him in the primary and in the general election: appealing to both independent and Democratic voters. Independents, who outnumber Democrats but lean Democratic in their voting habits, are allowed to vote in the primary here.

"It's a double-edged sword because I need Democratic-leaning unaffiliated voters," he said. "This is a very Democratic state."

Still, Mr. Chafee appeared heartened, if slightly bemused, at the image of Washington Republicans riding to his rescue. He said he thought that was because he had taken care in how he positioned himself as a red senator from a blue state.

"I've taken an extra step in my rhetoric not to go over the line, so to speak," he said. "I have walked a fine line in how I vote and not taking it too far to alienate some people who could be helpful."

Mr. Chafee spent his Saturday morning at a barbeque with supporters here, where he warned that a Laffey victory on Tuesday would lead to a Republican defeat in November.

"Everybody knows who has the best chance to win in this very, very Democratic state — Rhode Island might be the most Democratic state in the country," he said. "My chances of winning are much, much greater than Mr. Laffey."

In many ways, what is happening in Rhode Island is a mirror of what happened in neighboring Connecticut last month: an ideological challenge from the wings to an established senator who is seen as out of step with his party. In that case, a Democrat, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, lost a primary to Ned Lamont, who attacked Mr. Lieberman for his support of the war in Iraq and his dalliances with the White House.

The difference is that there was no serious Republican challenger in the Connecticut race, so the Democratic Party invested relatively minimal resources in Mr. Lieberman.

And the sheer intensity of the attacks in Rhode Island — both in tone and the amount likely to be spent per voter — was described by party leaders and others as unlike anything they could remember.

"I'm searching for the right word — vicious," said Victor L. Profughi, a retired political science professor at Rhode Island College and a pollster who has studied the state's politics for 40 years. "I've never seen a race that was anything like this in Rhode Island."

In one advertisement, which critics have called racist, an announcer says that as mayor, Mr. Laffey agreed to accept "Mexican ID cards" as proof of citizenship, while an ominous blur of dark-skinned faces flashes across the screen. "Mayor Steve Laffey accepts Mexican ID cards that can threaten our security," the announcer said. "Will he put our security at risk in the Senate?'

The Republican attacks on Mr. Laffey have been met by attacks on Mr. Chafee by the Club for Growth and other groups. One advertisement belittled Mr. Chafee as "a Washington politician so out of touch he votes to waste $200 million on that Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska."

Mr. Profughi conducted a poll for Rhode Island College at the end of August that found that Mr. Laffey would easily beat Mr. Chafee. But this is proving to be a particularly tough primary to poll because independent voters are allowed to participate, and aides to both candidates say they expected the race to be much closer.

With both sides saying the outcome would be determined by turnout, the Republican National Committee's vaunted turnout operation could prove crucial in countering the anti-Chafee sentiment that has energized Mr. Laffey's supporters.

"There's no doubt that if the primary was held only among Republicans, Chafee would lose," said Nelson Warfield, the Republican consultant who produced the advertisements for the Club for Growth. "He would be repudiated by the Republicans who he has constantly repudiated."

Mr. Laffey's supporters said they were hopeful that should he win, Republicans would reconsider, the way Democrats have rallied around Mr. Lamont.

"Hopefully, it's just campaign bluster," said Pat Toomey, the president of the Club for Growth. The National Republican Senatorial Campaign, Mr. Toomey said, "would not be that irresponsible."

Mr. Laffey said he did not care what Washington Republicans did if he won. "Let them stay out," he said Saturday, huffing and puffing as he ran up a hill toward a voter's house. "We'll do it without them."

GOP Forced To Fight For Rebel Chafee (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

His Challenger in the Primary May Be Too Conservative to Win R.I.

WARWICK, R.I. -- Republican Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee disagrees with his party on the Iraq war, tax cuts and a host of other issues. But national GOP leaders are flooding this tiny state with manpower and money to save the rebel senator, fearing that his loss in a primary could cost Republicans control of the Senate in November.

Party leaders believe that if Chafee loses to Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey in Tuesday's election, they will have little chance of keeping the seat because many see Laffey as too conservative in Democratic Rhode Island to prevail against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse.

If Chafee falls, he will be the second sitting senator to lose a primary this year. But unlike Democrat Joseph I. Lieberman in Connecticut, whose defeat is attributed to his outspoken support for the war, Chafee's problems have little to do with where he stands on issues. Rather, they are rooted in his contemplative, consensus-building style, an aberration in the current bitterly partisan climate.

By contrast, Laffey has an assertive, tough personality. He contends that Chafee's independence has made him irrelevant, and that his unpredictable voting patterns suggest a political identity crisis, as if the senator can't make up his mind. Most political observers in Rhode Island gave Laffey the edge as of late last week, but polling has been erratic, and both sides say the outcome is impossible to predict.

GOP leaders are so pessimistic about Laffey's prospects in November that they intend to pull out of the state if Chafee loses.

"It would be a disservice to our other candidates if we didn't," said Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which is leading the Chafee rescue effort with help from other GOP groups.

Ronayne noted that Rhode Island has elected two Republican senators since the Depression -- Chafee and his father, the late John H. Chafee. "That's why we're so plain-spoken about losing the seat," he said.

Chafee's struggles serve as a warning to other incumbents that voters are dangerously open-minded this year. Chafee may be a Republican in a Democratic state, but he is well in sync with Rhode Island voters. He opposes the war, backs abortion rights and other liberal social causes, and is an ardent environmentalist. But it's Laffey who has struck a chord with voters such as Roger Dupont.

"I don't care about any particular issue. Steve wants to upset the apple cart, which is good," said Dupont, a retiree who lives in a middle-class neighborhood in West Warwick where Laffey was knocking on doors. As the candidate trudged up the street with his wife, Kelly, four of his five children and six campaign workers, Dupont shrugged, saying, "The guy wants to work for it. He comes up and rings my doorbell, it gets my attention."

Only about 11 percent of voters here are registered Republicans, and while the primary is open to a much larger pool of independent voters, turnout is unlikely to be more than 50,000. Still, the two campaigns and their allies are expected to spend $5 million by primary day, saturating the state with television and radio ads, yard signs, fliers, Chafee wristbands, Laffey caps and other paraphernalia.

Laffey's advantage is that his voter base is easier to identify and highly motivated, consisting of Republicans who think Chafee is too liberal and independents who like the 44-year-old mayor's blustery, in-your-face style. His antics at Cranston City Hall have provided fodder for critics and fans alike, but Laffey is widely respected for having saved his home town from fiscal disaster. The GOP's rejection of his candidacy has only bolstered his populist image. It's also kept the spotlight off his conservative views on hot-button issues, including his support for the war and opposition to abortion and embryonic stem cell research.

Chafee, on the other hand, worries that he is trapped between two constituencies. He is too middle-of-the-road to compete against Laffey for conservative support, and now -- given the GOP's blitz on his behalf -- too tethered to the Republican establishment to connect with moderates.

North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole, the NRSC chair, warned in a recent letter to GOP donors that if Chafee loses and Democrats take the seat, conservative judicial nominees may not advance and tax cuts could be in jeopardy. But Chafee is already a roadblock on both fronts. He opposed Samuel A. Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court and voted against the Bush tax cuts.

Chafee worries that the letter, which was widely reported in Rhode Island, casts him as a party pawn and could diminish his chances not only on Tuesday but also in a general election, when he will need a huge independent turnout to fend off Whitehouse.

"It's a high-wire act," Chafee said. "In either direction, you can't go too far."

Nor is Chafee convinced that the Republican outpouring has helped him much with conservatives. Many voters complain about the negative ads. First lady Laura Bush, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other luminaries have campaigned for Chafee, but the senator said he has seen little evidence that voters care. "I'm surprised the Republican support hasn't resonated more deeply," he said.

The senator's family is a pillar of Rhode Island's patrician ruling class, and his father was a popular governor and senator who died in office in 1999. His son had served as mayor of Warwick and had worked as a blacksmith on the Canadian harness-racing circuit before succeeding him.

After being appointed to complete his father's term, Chafee won a full Senate term in 2000, but it remains unclear whether he has formed the deep connection with voters that helps politicians survive volatile times.

Some Rhode Islanders do seem to have grown impatient with Chafee, unsure that he has the grit to tackle the many complicated problems that the country faces. Mary Beth Tsiokas, a Cranston housewife, stopped the senator on the sidewalk last week to ask about terrorism and the Iraq war.

"What would be your plan long term?" Tsiokas quizzed him. Chafee thought for a moment and began talking about the Cold War and the merits of diplomacy. Tsiokas studied the senator skeptically. "I can't get anyone to say why we should be so involved," she said, adding that she was still undecided on how to vote Tuesday.

Laffey relishes pointed questions and will expound on any subject voters raise. Shahnaz Siddigi, a Pakistani immigrant who lives in West Warwick, greeted Laffey at her door one evening and asked him how the United States should deal with Iran. The response was a long-winded lecture about standing up to dictators, weaning the country off foreign oil and completing the Iraq war. Siddigi listened intently, then announced she disagreed with him on every point.

"But I'm voting for you anyway," she reassured Laffey. "I'm impressed with what you're doing. I like your approach."

Rhode Island Race May Be Key To Senate (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Sen. Lincoln Chafee is in a tough fight for the GOP nomination. But his more conservative opponent could lose the seat for the party.

CRANSTON, R.I. — He opposed Bush administration tax cuts, voted against Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. and was the only Republican senator to vote no on the war in Iraq. On his presidential ballot in 2004, Lincoln Chafee even voted against George W. Bush, writing in the name of the president's father instead.

Chafee's liberal-to-moderate inclinations have served him well in his home state, where fewer than 70,000 voters are registered Republicans. His famous name also has been an asset: Chafee's late father, John, was beloved as a progressive Republican who served Rhode Island as governor and U.S. senator. Lincoln Chaffee was appointed to his father's seat in 1999.

But in a surprisingly heated primary contest Tuesday, Chafee will face off against Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey. The 44-year-old former investment banker, who has drawn support from national conservative organizations, has tried to paint Chafee as hopelessly out of touch with his own party.

In turn, national Republican groups worried about the party losing its hold on the Senate have sponsored anti-Laffey ads, such as the one that warns: "Mayor Steve Laffey accepts Mexican ID cards that can threaten our security. Will he put our security at risk in the Senate?"

Perhaps the better question is whether Rhode Island voters will deal a clear blow to the GOP Senate majority. The outcome of the Chafee-Laffey race, considered too close to call, could alter the larger struggle for dominance in the Senate, because Laffey probably could not defeat the expected Democratic nominee.

Democrats must win a net six seats in November's general election to gain a majority. The spot held by the 53-year-old Chafee — one of the Republicans' most prominent Senate renegades — is among the most vulnerable, making his battle with Laffey the marquee matchup on a day when eight other states and the District of Columbia will conduct primaries.

"This primary determines whether Republicans can stay competitive in the Senate race" in Rhode Island, said Jennifer Duffy, a native of the state who is editor of the Cook Political Report in Washington. "If Chafee does not win this primary, Republicans may be done in Rhode Island. They may take the resources they have allocated for this state and put them somewhere else because they don't believe Laffey can win."

A Laffey victory would represent a major triumph for the Club for Growth, an anti-tax and advocacy group that seeks to return the Republican Party to the economically conservative ideals of President Reagan. The Club for Growth, which has poured more than $700,000 into Laffey's campaign, also takes credit for toppling Republican Rep. Joe Schwarz of Michigan in that state's August primary.

David Keating, the group's executive director, said he was unconcerned about how a potential Chafee defeat might shift Senate power. "Looking at the whole picture, we thought this was a good idea," Keating said. "Look, if the Republicans are going to lose control, they are going to lose this seat anyway."

Chafee could become the latest in a spate of incumbents defeated in recent primaries. Republican Gov. Frank H. Murkowski of Alaska lost his party's primary in late August, as did Rep. Cynthia A. McKinney of Georgia and Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, both Democrats, earlier in the month.

In Rhode Island, comparisons are being drawn between Chafee and Lieberman, despite the fact that they represent different parties. The parallel, Rhode Islanders say, lies in grass-roots dissatisfaction with someone in power.

"Everyone wants to know if Chafee is going to be the next Lieberman," said Darrell West, a Brown University professor of political science. "His problem is that he is a moderate facing a rebellion from within his own party. It is much the same as Lieberman. The difference is, Chafee voted against the war, and Lieberman in favor. Chafee has upset the Republican rank-and-file voters. If only the grass roots show up on Tuesday, he will lose."

West said he did not conduct a poll in this Senate primary because the sample of voters was so unreliable. As registered independents, about 50% of Rhode Islanders can take a GOP ballot on Tuesday. Democrats are barred from crossing over.

Chuck Newton, spokesman for the Rhode Island Republican Party, said state and national GOP groups have backed Chafee because "no poll has come out from day one showing that Steve Laffey can beat Sheldon Whitehouse," the former state attorney general who is heavily favored in the Democratic primary.

"Chafee can win against Whitehouse, and Laffey can't. That's exactly it," he said.

Veteran pollster Victor Profughi, director of the Bureau of Government Research and Services at Rhode Island College, agreed that conventional wisdom said Laffey couldn't win. "But I would never put much stock in conventional wisdom," Profughi said. "Laffey is a very effective grass-roots campaigner. He really excites people. He is very strong among people who ought to be dyed-in-the-wool Democrats. If you think of a Huey Long, he's that kind of person. It's oratory — all style."

Laffey's director of communications, Nachama Soloveichik, said: "Listen, the polls have said a lot of things. Stay tuned. Steve has never entered anything that he didn't think he could do all the way."

Soloveichik all but dismissed the role the Club for Growth has played in Laffey's campaign. "A lot of candidates get a lot of money from out of state," she said. "It is a small state, not a particularly wealthy state. This is not some nefarious issue."

But Ian Lang, Chafee's campaign manager, accused Laffey of putting personal ambition "above the good of the party — jeopardizing this seat. If Steve Laffey wins, this seat goes Democratic. It's as simple as that."

Lang said the Rhode Island results could ripple across the Senate. "I think the Club for Growth is trying to send a message to other moderates — that 'we're going to come after you,' " he said. "And they're not thinking about what's in the best interest of the Republican Party."

Cardin, Mfume Eye Prize (WT)

By S.a. Miller And Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

The leading Democrat in Maryland's U.S. Senate race yesterday turned to his political machine -- built over his 40 years of state politics -- to launch an imposing voter-turnout effort in the final days before the primary election Tuesday.

"We've got to get the vote out, so we need your help today," Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore, said to about 100 volunteers at a rally in Towson.

Mr. Cardin, 62, then went to two other rallies with volunteers, in East Baltimore and Upper Marlboro.

High overall turnout will benefit him because it will offset the black vote, which accounts for about 40 percent of votes in Maryland Democratic primaries. Most of those votes likely will go to primary rival Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman and past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Cardin campaign leaders said yesterday that staff members already had made about 300,000 phone calls to voters and planned to make 250,000 more between yesterday and Tuesday. They also planned to knock on 75,000 "targeted doors in communities across the state." More than 1,200 volunteers would make phone calls, work at polls, drive voters to polls, and knock on doors on primary day, the Cardin campaign said.

The Mfume campaign indeed faces a much larger challenge, with one staffer saying yesterday that he and other staffers were "running around like crazy."

Mr. Mfume, 57, has 300 to 400 volunteers, an adviser said. They had made about 100,000 phone calls by yesterday, but did not have a targeted goal for the next few days. They hoped to knock on 40,000 doors.

The Mfume campaign also sent a caravan of 12 dump trucks and several other vehicles, bearing large Mfume signs, throughout Baltimore.

"It's a sprint to the finish line, and we're sprinting, and we've got 17 vehicles sprinting with us," said Mfume spokesman Steve Marinoff.

Mfume campaign manager Mark Clack said the goal of the final push is to make sure their candidate's base and those who would turn out to vote for Mr. Mfume indeed go to the polls on primary day.

"That is what it is all boiling down to," he said.

The Democratic nominee will face the likely Republican nominee -- Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, 47, and the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

The candidates are competing for the seat opened by retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat.

Mfume campaign callers are touting their candidate as an "independent voice" who will press for a quick military withdrawal from Iraq, universal health care and more college-tuition grants for the poor.

Mr. Cardin's campaign says its candidate helped expand Medicare benefits and "stood up to the president" by voting against the Iraq invasion in 2003.

High turnout also can help Mr. Cardin by reducing the percentage of votes siphoned off by the 16 lesser-known candidates in the Democratic primary, including Bethesda millionaire Josh Rales, who has raised his visibility in the race by spending about $4 million of his own money on TV ads.

Turnout for Maryland's Democratic primaries has averaged about 34 percent in the past four election cycles, according to the state Board of Elections.

At those levels, Mr. Mfume needs about three-quarters of the black vote and about 20 percent of the remaining votes to win, said Patrick Gonzales, president of the nonpartisan polling firm, Gonzales Research & Marketing Strategies. A recent Gonzales poll showed Mr. Mfume trailing Mr. Cardin, 43 percent to 30 percent, and Mr. Mfume winning about 15 percent of the black vote.

Other polls have showed a much closer primary race, including a SurveyUSA poll for WUSA-TV (Channel 9) last week, in which Mr. Mfume led Mr. Cardin, 42 percent to 38 percent. Mr. Mfume has had a marked advantage in all of the polls among black voters who have declared their support for a candidate.

"It could be Mr. Mfume still needs to get a higher percentage of the white vote than I've seen so far," Mr. Gonzales said.

The black vote also will be a key issue in the general election in November, when Mr. Steele, who is black and a Republican, will try to win votes from black Democrats.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume are aiming their drives to get out the vote in the state's most populated and most heavily Democratic jurisdictions: the city of Baltimore and Anne Arundel, Baltimore, Howard, Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

The Cardin campaign has concentrated its efforts further on his support base in the 3rd Congressional District, which Mr. Cardin has represented for 20 years. The district comprises parts of Baltimore city and Anne Arundel, Baltimore and Howard counties.

Neither campaign would say how it differentiates between Democratic voters within jurisdictions. A Cardin campaign official said the staff had cast a wide net and was telephoning Democrats who might have voted as infrequently as once in the past four primary elections.

Crucial Md. Vote To Mold New Political Landscape (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

A Younger Generation Finds a Rare Opening

Maryland is a state where politicians get elected and tend to settle in. But Tuesday's party primaries are the first step in a dramatic reordering of the political hierarchy, one that will mean a new U.S. senator for the first time in decades and could result in new faces in every statewide office.

The changes will range from the state's delegation on Capitol Hill to the county administrative buildings, where several of the state's most enduring county executives are moving on. And there could be a generational shift, as even the state's most iconic politician -- 84-year-old Comptroller William Donald Schaefer -- is in what appears to be his tightest election battle.

"It's a benchmark year," said House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel). "We're talking about replacing the longest-serving senator in Maryland history; we'll have new executives in three of the state's largest counties; and at least one new congressman."

Busch was referring to retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, who was first elected to public office 40 years ago and will have served in the Senate for 30. The low-key contest to replace him is the marquee race on the Democratic ballot. And in November, there will be new executives in Montgomery, Howard and Anne Arundel counties, as well as a host of new legislators and council members across the state.

Those in the new generation of Maryland leaders elected this fall "are the ones who will be faced with our toughest problems: how to solve the health-care crisis, how to restructure our budget, how to make college affordable," Busch said. It will be November before Marylanders know whether their overwhelmingly Democratic state has changed enough to re elect a Republican governor for the first time since the 1950s or to elect a GOP senator for the first time in a quarter-century.

But the party's leaders are thinking big. Chip DiPaula, who ran Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s groundbreaking campaign in 2002 and now serves as his chief of staff, said he believes the elections will swing the door open for Republicans, who have been out of power for most of the past century.

"We're looking at real [shared] government," he said.

Ehrlich is unopposed in the primary, as is his Democratic competitor, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who leads in the polls. For all the change in the air, it is the first time in years that neither party's nomination for governor is contested. Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) pulled out of the race in June.

The replacement for Democratic Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., who is retiring, will be of a younger generation. And Republicans in November will be looking to increase the gains they have made in recent years in the General Assembly, especially in the outer suburbs.

But some things about Maryland haven't changed much. With less than a third of the state's voters registered as Republicans and with few competitive battles, the party's contests Tuesday have drawn little notice.

And the Democratic tradition remains overwhelming in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, where the primary is almost always the final say. Of 46 General Assembly, County Council and other seats chosen on a partisan vote in Montgomery, only two are held by Republicans. In Prince George's, none is.

Below are summaries of the principal races.U.S. Senate and House

Sarbanes's decision to not seek a sixth term has brought an outpouring of candidates to replace him. But the two who jumped into the race first -- former congressman Kweisi Mfume and Baltimore Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin -- are the front-runners at the end.

Five of the 18 candidates on the Democratic ballot have conducted the most visible campaigns, and for the most part, they have given little indication that they would vary greatly from the reliably liberal record Sarbanes built.

Potomac businessman and philanthropist Josh Rales has spent more than $5 million of his own money on the campaign, and his television commercials became ubiquitous in the Baltimore and Washington media markets. But Rales's lack of Democratic connections -- he has contributed money to President Bush and Ehrlich -- meant he had no network of supporters to build on his media campaign.

American University professor Allan Lichtman has offered voters a strict opposition to the Iraq war and his long career as an educator, but his campaign never became the grass-roots force he had hoped for. Former Baltimore county executive Dennis Rasmussen presented himself as the moderate alternative but drew little attention in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, where 40 percent of the state's Democrats reside.

Cardin and Mfume agree so much on the issues that in recent forums Cardin began using Mfume's lines. In the end, Mfume said that though the two might vote the same, he would be the more passionate voice for the poor and for Democratic causes. Cardin promoted his success at forging bipartisan consensus during his nearly 20 years in Congress.

Political experts believe that the others in the crowded field could draw their support from voters who might otherwise back Cardin. Polls show that black Democrats overwhelmingly support Mfume, and he is hoping that the chance for an African American on the statewide Democratic ticket will increase the turnout. But Cardin, with far more money and a statewide television campaign, is thought to have the most organized operation for getting supporters to the polls.

On the Republican side, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the chosen candidate of the national and state GOP, faces only nominal opposition.

Maryland will have at least one new member of Congress next year as voters in Cardin's squiggly district pick a replacement. The district rambles from Baltimore's Inner Harbor through parts of Baltimore, Howard and Anne Arundel counties. Democrats will choose from a group that includes a state senator, a former television reporter, a Baltimore health commissioner and a lawyer, John Sarbanes, who is the senator's son. Republicans will choose among a doctor who lost to Cardin last time and two others.

House Democratic Whip Steny H. Hoyer is unopposed, and Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D) is not seriously threatened. The most spirited challenge to an incumbent is in the 4th District, where Rep. Albert R. Wynn is in a surprising battle with community activist Donna Edwards. Wynn stresses what he has brought home to the district, but Edwards labels him "Maryland's Joe Lieberman" for his vote in favor of authorizing the Iraq war and of other issues in which he strayed from his Democratic colleagues. The district stretches from the Frederick County line through Montgomery and down to Fort Washington in Prince George's.Statewide Offices

Schaefer, who began his public life in 1955 on the Baltimore City Council, wants one more term. But his close ties to Ehrlich, controversial remarks on immigrants and outlandish comments about women have not endeared him to the state's mostly liberal Democrats.

The comptroller stresses a career free of scandal and a "name you can trust," but his opponents are trying to make the case that his time has come.

Del. Peter Franchot, a liberal from Takoma Park, was the first to take on the legend, saying that antics that once seemed eccentric now are embarrassing. He promotes himself as the only real Democrat running and says he would be a more formidable watchdog on the Board of Public Works, the panel that approves much of state government's business.

But Franchot's mission became far more complicated when Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens jumped into the race. Owens, the only woman mounting a serious statewide campaign, presents herself as a moderate alternative. A series of bizarre spats between Owens and Schaefer has drawn the most attention: She said running against him was like telling grandpa it's time to turn over the car keys, and he responded by saying she dressed like Old Mother Hubbard and is "getting fat."

Four Republicans have waged a quiet race to take on the winner.

To replace Curran, Democrats will choose between Montgomery State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, who has coveted the job his entire career, and former Baltimore state's attorney Stuart O. Simms, who has wanted it for a few weeks. (Montgomery County Council member Tom Perez will appear on the ballot, although the state's high court has ruled him ineligible.)

Simms hasn't run for elected office in a decade, but he signed on to be Duncan's lieutenant governor candidate. When Duncan exited the race, he and others, including those who thought the Baltimore region should not be without a candidate for attorney general, encouraged Simms to run. He has drawn a number of high-profile supporters, but his campaign has been hindered by a lack of money and a late start.

Gansler, by contrast, has been planning his campaign for years. He has a Web site filled with proposals on combating gangs and pursuing polluters, and he has raised almost $2 million.

Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle is unopposed on the Republican side.Montgomery County

The state's largest jurisdiction will see a new leader after 12 years of Duncan's stewardship, and the two leading candidates to replace him are County Council member Steven Silverman (D-At Large) and former council member Isiah "Ike" Leggett, former chairman of the state Democratic Party.

The two share goals of creating affordable housing and maintaining the quality of Montgomery's schools. Leggett has said he would do a better job of controlling growth, standing up to developers who have been generous to Silverman's campaign.

Silverman, in turn, has cast himself as the more decisive leader and said he would be more aggressive in funding road projects and the proposed Purple Line.

All nine council seats are up for election, and two are open. Among General Assembly contests, the incumbent facing the most trouble is Democratic Sen. Ida G. Ruben, who has represented the Takoma Park-Silver Spring district for 20 years. She is in an increasingly bitter primary with American University law professor Jamie Raskin.

Voters not affiliated with a party can vote in the school board races.Prince George's County

More than 100 candidates in 21 races will be on the Democratic primary ballot, where winning the nomination usually means election.

County Executive Jack B. Johnson is running hard for a second term, emphasizing an economic boom and rising property tax revenue, which have brought added services and school construction.

Rushern L. Baker III, who lost in a multi-candidate race four years ago, charges that Johnson has been unwilling to acknowledge the county's rising crime problem and says Johnson's awarding of county contracts to friends and campaign supporters is a form of corruption.

All nine seats of the County Council are on the ballot, although there will be far less turnover than four years ago, when eight members were elected. There are a number of spirited General Assembly battles, including crowded races to replace three retiring Democrats: Del. Pauline H. Menes and Sens. Leo E. Green and Gloria G. Lawlah.

All registered voters are allowed to vote for the school board, which becomes an elected body for the first time since 2002. Voters on Tuesday will winnow a field of 46 candidates to 18, and in the Nov. 7 election will choose the board of nine.

Minorities In GOP Rally For Allen In N.Va. (WP)

By Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen joined several hundred Asian, Hispanic and black supporters in Fairfax County yesterday at a rally designed to show diversity within the Republican Party while recognizing immigrants' growing clout in state elections.

DOJ_NMG_0060629

The event came as Allen, a candidate for reelection who has been dogged for weeks by charges of insensitivity to minorities, juggles a rural image that has served him well in past races with the political reality that vote-rich Northern Virginia includes swelling ethnic populations.

"It is invigorating to be here with all sorts of different, diverse backgrounds," Allen told the audience after saying "good morning" and "thank you" in several languages.

Allen was joined by Reps. Frank R. Wolf and Thomas M. Davis III, two Northern Virginia Republicans facing aggressive Democratic challengers in an area where political allegiances could be shifting.

"This is a tough year," Davis told the crowd, which included at least a dozen ethnic Republican groups. "You can read the polls. You can read the press. You can see we are all under fire. We need your help."

A Mason-Dixon poll commissioned by several newspapers across the state and scheduled for release today shows Allen leading Democratic challenger James Webb 46 to 42 percent, according to people familiar with the survey. But Webb leads Allen by 13 points in Northern Virginia, even though the Democrat is relatively unknown and won't air his first television ad until tomorrow. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points.

Northern Virginia has changed since Allen, a former U.S. representative and governor, last ran for office in 2000.

In Fairfax County, the state's largest jurisdiction, 27 percent of the population is foreign-born. In Loudoun County, whites made up nearly 83 percent of the population in 2000, compared with 74 percent today. The number of Hispanics in Prince William County more than doubled in the past six years, census figures show.

Virginia's ethnic population remains a relatively small portion of the electorate, pollsters say. And unlike African Americans, who tend to vote Democratic, immigrants in Virginia are not closely aligned with either political party, making them critical swing voters in close elections.

Allen is trying to recover from his remark last month to a young man of Indian descent. Allen called the Webb campaign aide "macaca." After nationwide criticism, Allen apologized, saying he didn't realize the word, a genus of monkey, is a slur in some cultures.

Democrats say the remark hurt Allen among non-white voters, including Korean and Indian Americans who often vote Republican in federal races.

"I think it creates a big opening," said Peter Brodnitz, Webb's pollster. "In addition to the real impact, there is a symbolic problem, which is George Allen coming across as closed-minded."

Robert E. Lang, director of Virginia Tech's Metropolitan Institute, said many first- and second-generation Americans in Northern Virginia are well-educated with high incomes, a combination increasingly receptive to Democrats.

"The way to look at Virginia now is it's like South Carolina, with the suburbs in New Jersey and Connecticut laid on top of it," Lang said. "I think it signals a new politics."

For years, Northern Virginia communities outside the Capital Beltway were Republican strongholds, offsetting liberal-leaning neighborhoods closer to the District. But Democrats have been making steady gains. In 2004, Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) became the first Democratic presidential candidate in four decades to win Fairfax County. In last year's governor's race, Timothy M. Kaine (D) trounced Republican Jerry W. Kilgore in parts of Northern Virginia.

After Kilgore's loss, the state Republican Party commissioned a study to examine how to prevent similar defeats. Among other findings, the report concluded that the area's changing demographics "are having a dramatic impact on the politics of the region."

Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R), who won his race last year by 323 votes, said: "We need to go into ethnic communities, look them in the eye and tell them why our solutions are better."

Yesterday, Allen spoke about his efforts to support minorities. He said he has secured more visas for high-tech workers, backed historically black colleges, promoted a nuclear deal between India and the United States, fought gangs and encouraged more students to study math and science. In Allen's past statewide races, aides said, he has won more black votes than Republicans traditionally receive.

"My friends, I look at each election as a way to unify and inspire," he said at the event, sponsored by the Fairfax County Republican Committee at Edison High School in the county's Alexandria section.

Do Thieu, a Vietnamese American from Annandale who attended the rally, said Allen has always been there for his community. "He has listened, so his actions speak louder than words," he said.

Despite Allen's outreach, some analysts are wondering whether the Republican fully comprehends how the state is changing.

Last week, as he has for years, Allen put on a cowboy hat and saddled up a horse -- this time named Bubba -- to ride in Buena Vista's annual Labor Day parade. Allen, who was born and raised in California, rode down the parade route greeting the Shenandoah Valley crowd by saying, "Howdy! How y'all doing? Good to see y'all."

When the image was broadcast, one longtime Allen supporter said he cringed. "Seeing him with a horse called Bubba wearing cowboy boots, that doesn't resonate with us," said Terone Green, a Republican activist from Richmond who is black.

Green added: "He needs to revamp his whole operation. . . . I have never seen it this bad. I have friends who are just so anti-[Allen] now."

In an interview yesterday, Allen said: "I always ride horses. I wear boots. I am who I am."

Davis said Allen, who ended his day with a speech to 100,000 NASCAR fans at Richmond International Raceway, can't afford to have a rural image in Northern Virginia. Some GOP leaders say Kilgore's southwest Virginia accent cost him votes from independents.

Even so, Virginia remains relatively conservative. In 2004, President Bush defeated Kerry by nine percentage points. Lang said Allen might want to consider losing the cowboy image if he wants to avoid a loss in Northern Virginia. "The sort of Los Angeles identity might serve him better" in the area, said Lang, referring to where Allen grew up.

Allen rebuffed that advice, saying he lost his first campaign for the House of Delegates in 1979 after an adviser made him stop wearing his belt buckle and cowboy boots.

"The best advice I ever received from anyone was 'Just be yourself,' " Allen said.

McCaskill Tries To Buck State's Rising 'red' Tide (KCS)

By Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, September 10, 2006

One big question for Democrat Claire McCaskill: Can she stem Missouri's Republican tide?

As McCaskill seeks to defeat U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, the distinct shift in the state's voting patterns toward the GOP presents a thorny challenge.

That is, she must capture a greater share of independent voters than Democrats had to win just a few years ago. In 1998, according to the polling firm Zogby International, a Democrat needed about a third of independents to top 50 percent overall. These days, McCaskill must hold her Democratic base and attract at least half of all independents, who now are more than a quarter of all voters.

That challenge is compounded by two factors: More independents are voting Republican in recent years. Also, Republicans remain more reliable voters than their Democratic counterparts.

"All things being equal, McCaskill has to do better with that middle voter," said Missouri State University political scientist George Connor.

Democrats downplay recent Republican victories and insist the two parties remain basically at par. Recent narrow Republican wins, said Roy Temple, a former chief of staff to U.S. Sen. Jean Carnahan, have made the state appear redder than it really is.

"It's amazing how much the Republicans have capitalized powerwise on essentially a quite marginal electoral advantage," he said.

McCaskill says the shift has more to do with GOP organizers outhustling Democrats than any significant ideological swing.

"The Democratic Party had gotten fat and lazy in terms of taking its majorities for granted," she said.

But analysts say something more significant has occurred. After all, in the state House and Senate, Republicans now dominate chambers that in the 1980s were firmly in Democratic hands. Five of the state's nine U.S. House members are

Republican, as are its two U.S. senators. Putting aside the 2000 election of Gov. Mel Carnahan, who died in a plane crash just before the vote, the state has not elected a Democratic senator since 1980.

The major change has been in the rural-urban population split. The portion of the state's population growth for the state's two largest metropolitan areas dropped nearly 20 percent from the decade of the 1980s to the '90s. (St. Louis has actually lost population since 2000, while Kansas City has grown, but only slightly.)

At the same time, the share of the population growth in rural Missouri, where the GOP has been deriving strength for decades, nearly doubled from the decade of the '80s to the decade of the '90s. From 1990 to 2000, rural Missouri had 36 percent of the state's growth, and that share continues to increase this decade.

The Kansas City and the St. Louis areas still had the biggest slice of the population pie — 55 percent in 2000, according to The Brookings Institution — but that percentage was down slightly from its share 10 years before.

"The growth in outstate Missouri is one of the most important political trends in the last couple of years," said Democratic pollster Fred Yang, who has polled in Missouri since the mid-1990s.

That growth, he said, has turned Missouri into an "even-steven" state. Who wins on Election Day, he said, depends on who turns out to vote.

Another key shift: the dramatic drop in union members, who remain part of the bedrock Democratic base. In 1983, nearly 21 percent of Missouri workers belonged to a union. Twenty years later, just 12 percent did.

Republicans have capitalized on the shifts by emphasizing social issues, such as abortion, gun rights and opposition to gay marriage. That has helped cement the GOP base, said Republican consultant John Hancock.

The shift in focus combined with the new demographics has altered the way Missouri votes.

George W. Bush carried Missouri in 2000 and 2004 by percentages that topped his national support.

In 1992, network exit polls showed 42 percent of Missouri voters were Democrats, compared with 29 percent who were Republican. Those numbers narrowed during the next decade. By 2004, Republicans had the edge over Democrats — 36 percent to 35 percent.

In U.S. Senate primaries, Democratic Missourians once routinely outvoted Republicans 2-to-1 and even 3-to-1. Since 2000, almost equal numbers of Democrats and Republicans show up on primary day.

Missouri's "tilting conservative," pollster John Zogby said.

Still, said Connor, the political scientist, McCaskill must attract moderate independent voters.

He pointed to McCaskill's handling of immigration as a classic example of a Democrat trying to find middle ground on a contentious issue. McCaskill's approach has been to focus on businesses that hire illegal immigrants. In doing so, she can sound tough in a way that relates to Republicans angry at the flow of illegal immigrants into the country, Connor said. And by targeting businesses instead of the immigrants, McCaskill probably won't anger Democrats sympathetic to immigrants.

U.S. Sen. Kit Bond, a Republican, said the shift to the GOP was primarily because of the leftward lean of the national Democratic Party:

"I can't tell you how many people come up to me from all over the state and say, 'I've always been a Democrat, but I can't vote for that left-wing group up there (in Washington).' "

McCaskill, though, agrees with Talent that Missourians are independent-minded enough to vote the person rather than the party. Rural Missouri may have swung Republican in recent years. But look at St. Louis County, the state's largest, which once was a tough place for Democrats to win, she said.

In the 2004 governor's race, McCaskill carried it by nearly 60,000 votes. That she still lost is one more indicator of the growing clout of rural Missouri.

McCaskill is convinced that Republicans don't have an electoral lock on outstate Missouri, and is actively campaigning in rural counties.

"I really believe … that our problems in rural Missouri have stemmed from inattention and our willingness to let the Republican message dominate. We should have been going out there and making the powerful case that we will do a better job of looking out for people who live in rural Missouri."

Hancock says the next two elections will determine how long the pro-GOP shift is destined to last. There again, demographics don't favor the Democrats.

In 2004, Bush won all 10 of the state's fastest-growing counties, many by big margins.

Neglected By Democrats, Blacks Jump The Party Line (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 10, 2006

Committeewoman Norma Leggette (4th Ward) isn't sure what the Democratic Party stands for anymore. She wonders how she's supposed to excite constituents in her ward about November's elections.

Leggette said there are two Democratic parties in St. Louis - one that benefits whites and another that ignores blacks. "At one time, Democrats were a solution for us. I don't know when that changed or why that changed, but it has," Leggette told me.

Her comments underscore a familiar complaint from blacks who claim the Democratic Party takes them for granted.

Leggette voiced her concerns Tuesday during a rah-rah session with several local elected Democrats, hosted by U.S. Senate candidate Claire McCaskill. After reading the exchange posted on a local Weblog, Pub Def Weekly, I called Leggette to confirm her comments.

The quotes were correct, the 40-year veteran of local politics told me. She has no intention of voting for McCaskill's Republican rival, U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, but, like me, she's grown bored with the dog and pony show put on when major elections roll around. Democrats show up, throw out the "evil Republican" mantra, ask for black votes, then disappear without ever addressing our socioeconomic concerns or needs.

Democrats raise millions for major campaigns that rarely trickle down to neighborhood committees, like Leggette's, charged with getting blacks to the polls, she said. It's a "frustrating" experience, complicated by "clueless" leadership and blacks seeking personal gain.

"My community has been affected by benign neglect. Black political leaders only interested in lining their pockets with crumbs ought to get the hell out of the way," Leggette said.

During the meeting Tuesday, Leggette said McCaskill dissed Talent's friendship with President George W. Bush and criticized the president for letting poor and black people die in New Orleans. That didn't cut it for Leggette.

"Being a Democrat doesn't just mean being in opposition to Bush or Talent. You have to bring some meat to the table."

Other black Democrats I spoke with Friday agreed with Leggette, but they are willing to take their disenchantment further. Some were among the 300 guests who attended the "African-Americans for Talent" soiree in July. Charles Kirkwood, owner of Midwestern Construction & Development in the city, plans to jump party lines in the upcoming election.

"I've never voted for a Republican in my life, but I'm supporting Talent," Kirkwood told me, ticking off several reasons the candidate has earned his respect. He particularly respects Talent's federal initiatives to empower disadvantaged minority and small businesses. The $1.2 billion digital and wireless technology bill Talent sponsored will streamline needed job-training funds to institutions like Harris-Stowe State University and Lincoln University in Jefferson City, Kirkwood said. Blacks, he said, are "carrying the water" for the Democratic party - it hasn't reciprocated.

"We have a majority black populated city. Billions have been spent on development in this region. Very little has gone to black developers," Kirkwood said. "I've been blindly supporting Democrats for years, but what has it gotten me? Nothing."

Caroline Douglas, a black Democrat living in Manchester and president of the Sickle Cell Disease Community Advocates, also supports Talent. He "stepped up" to address a health crisis in Missouri, Douglas said, not only passing legislation that increased federal spending on sickle-cell anemia, but also he personally helped raise almost $3 million toward building and operating 40 treatment centers throughout the state, she said.

Halbert Sullivan, CEO and founder of the Father's Support Center in St. Louis, said Talent helped his agency obtain federal money for programs to help African-American men and low-income families. McCaskill, Sullivan said, is relying on black politicians to carry her message because she has no record of accomplishments in the black community.

"Her commercials boast of her desire to combat terrorism and illegal immigration, but how does that make her different than her opponent?" Sullivan said.

I remember walking away impressed with Talent after we'd shared a table at a minority business luncheon. Although an impressive candidate, he wouldn't get my vote because I think his politics are in line with a downright scary administration.

Kirkwood, Sullivan and Douglas aren't exactly fans of Bush either. But their differences with the top-ranking Republican won't alter their vote, they told me.

"All politics are local," said Kirkwood. "I disagree with Bush on mostly everything, especially this war, but I'm still supporting Talent."

Casey Says He's More Than Just The 'Anti-Santorum' (PPG)

By James O'Toole, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

CAMPAIGN 2006

Rushing away from the Labor Day parade, Bob Casey had just crossed Stanwix Street when a woman grabbed his hand, looked him in the eye, and said vigorously, "Keep after him; you've got to beat that guy."

Moments later, a car's horn beeped, and its driver poked his head out of the window. "Good Luck, Bob. You've got to beat that Sanitation guy," the man said.

"I keep getting these directives," a bemused Mr. Casey observed as he walked on. " 'You HAVE to ...' "

To his challenge to incumbent Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, Mr. Casey brings a golden name in Pennsylvania politics and the hopes of a Democratic Party hungry for victory against a polarizing figure with a record of frustrating their partisan hopes.

The imperative of defeating Mr. Santorum was the chief reason party leaders turned to Mr. Casey in the days after he won his term as state treasurer with the largest vote total of any candidate for any office in Pennsylvania history. It was the reason that Gov. Ed Rendell, the brunt of tough Casey attacks in their primary for governor four years ago, helped clear the field of serious opposition for him in this year's primary. It was the reason that many liberal Democrats overcame their objections to conservative positions on social issues. In a state where no Democrat has won a full Senate term since 1962, Bob Casey offers the promise of victory -- or so they hope.

"Sometimes Democrats ... we've forgotten that the objective of every election is to win," Mr. Casey said as he recalled the deliberations that brought him to the race.

But as the admonitions that followed him on Labor Day and throughout the campaign attest, the strongest passions in this campaign are generated not by this champion vote-getter, but by his opponent. The incumbent has devoted followers. He also generates antipathy unusual even in this increasingly polarized climate.

So for Mr. Casey, is it enough to be the anti-Santorum?

"No, it's not," he insisted on a holiday weekend as he rode through Westmoreland County. His campaign, he says, offers a positive choice, not just a chance to vote against someone. Buttressing his argument, he points to his record as auditor general and treasurer, the state offices he has occupied for the last decade after a political apprenticeship at the feet of his father, the late governor.

As auditor general, the post that first made his father's name as well, Mr. Casey won generally positive headlines for spotlighting abuses in areas such as nursing home supervision, child care policies and the follow-through on Megan's law.

Discussing that record, he said, "I think nursing homes and child care were the most significant, because they led to real change."

The nursing home audit prodded the administration of former Gov. Tom Ridge to increase spending and change procedures for the monitoring of the state's institutions for the elderly. On child care, Mr. Casey's office successfully fought a proposal to increase co-payments for lower-income working mothers.

The issues he cites were substantive, but they also point to a tactical advantage he holds in this race, conferred by the nature of candidates' different political paths. Over 16 years in the House and Senate, Mr. Santorum has cast votes on hundreds of issues, many of them difficult. Savvy opposition researchers have each of them archived, ready to be retrieved to fuel efforts to place him on the defensive.

Mr. Casey has dealt with tough, substantive issues, but for the most part, they've been issues of his choosing. In contrast to a legislator or a governor, he has not had issues thrust upon him. So far in this campaign, Mr. Santorum has attempted to raise questions about Mr. Casey's work habits and attendance record in his state posts, but he's yet to challenge any policy choices.

For months, the Republican campaign has asserted that Mr. Casey is too content to be the anti-Santorum, that he has no positions and won't discuss issues. As an overall statement, that's not accurate. Mr. Casey has clear and well-known positions on a variety of issues, some of them controversial within his own party.

He supports the rights of gun owners and he opposes abortion. Those positions are seen by Democratic strategist as keys to muting issues that have allowed Republicans such as Mr. Santorum to harvest votes from more conservative Democrats. Mr. Casey and Mr. Santorum are both observant Roman Catholics, but they differ on the legal grounding of their opposition to abortion.

Mr. Santorum argues that a whole line of Supreme Court cases, starting with the Griswold v. Connecticut, a 1965 decision that struck down a Connecticut ban on contraceptives, were wrongly decided in that they found an implicit right to privacy within the Constitution. While Mr. Casey would like to see Roe v. Wade, the landmark abortion case, overturned, he said, "I don't think there's any question that there's a right to privacy. I disagree with a lot of Democrats that that right should be the foundation of a right to abortion."

Flouting the tax hike taboo that rose with the Republican revolution of 1994, Mr. Casey has called for a repeal of the Bush tax cuts for those earning more than $200,000 a year. Taking pages from the moderate playbook of the Democratic Leadership Council, he has endorsed legislative proposals to provide health insurance for children and help small businesses provide health insurance for their employees. He has also embraced a call issued by lawmakers including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., for a corporate welfare commission to root out tax breaks and budget pork.

But the charges of vagueness ring truer on some of the more important issues facing the Senate and the country. While sharply criticizing the incumbent's call for private accounts for younger workers to transform the current Social Security system, Mr. Casey has not offered any specific alternative to its looming solvency problems. He calls Social Security a problem, not a crisis.

He notes that other entitlement problems, notably Medicare, represent a much greater threat to the overall federal budget. Mr. Casey advocates a change in the Medicare Part D legislation to allow government to negotiate lower drug prices but acknowledges that is just one part of any overall solution to the financial burden promised with the retirement of the Baby Boom generation.

Budget arithmetic questions

The steps he has advocated on the budget deficit, including the tax increase, add up, by his calculation, to about $1.3 trillion over 10 years. But, as his exchanges with Tim Russert on last week's edition of NBC's "Meet the Press" underscored, that number is less than half way to the deficit remedy he has called for. Neither in answer to Mr. Russert nor elsewhere in the campaign has he recommended specific programs to be eliminated from the budget. And he has advocated a variety of significant spending increases, such as making Veterans Administration health care a virtual entitlement for veterans that, while arguably worthwhile in isolation, would add many billions to federal spending. The new direction he advocates on the budget, Mr. Casey said, "is not an easy path, it's not a smooth road; it's not the path of least resistance. It's going to be difficult to reduce the deficit but we have to do it."

When pressed on the budget arithmetic, Mr. Casey continues his call for tough measures, but still largely begs the question of specifics.

"It's more than saying we can cut here; we can move this money there. A lot of it has to do with fiscal discipline over time," he said. "When you have that fiscal discipline as a regular part of how you do your budgeting, it has a disciplining effect."

Mr. Casey argues further that demands he provide a complete blueprint for deficit elimination amount to a double standard when he is running against a candidate whose party has presided over a hemorrhage of federal red ink.

"I'm still waiting for Rick Santorum to come up with $1.3 trillion," he said. "He's been there for 12 years; where's his plan. ... You can't support the case for deficit reduction and support the tax cuts for the top 1 percent; [he] has a maniacal obsession with the top 1 percent."

'New strategy' on Iraq

On the Iraq war, he has offered specifics in one sense, calling for the firing of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. He said, "We need a new strategy and that means completely new leadership if we are going to avoid a civil war, and a lot of people think it's been moving in that direction."

He has resisted the calls of some fellow Democrats for a withdrawal or a timetable for disengagement. Asked what he would do if it became clear that a civil war had emerged, he employs a typical tactical segue, deflecting the answer into an attack on his opponent, "You've got to have a long and well-informed debate in Congress. ... In the weeks leading up to the war, there were no questions. ... It was breathtaking."

The Santorum campaign constantly refers to their challenger as "Bobby Casey Jr." Using the diminutive is meant to remind voters that Mr. Casey's political career is a function of the fact that he is the son of the late governor. While it may represent an attack for some, it's one that Mr. Casey is eager to embrace. He regularly reminds audiences of his father's legacy.

"If I can be half as good as my dad, I'll be one of the best," he told a well-wisher at a union picnic who praised the former governor.

Such references are always warmly received by Democratic audiences, a fact that yields some irony given the late governor's relations with his party in his later years. All the Caseys long remembered what they saw as a deliberate snub when the governor was denied a speaking spot at the 1992 Democratic National Convention. While an unreconstructed New Dealer on economic issues, the elder Casey considered his party's drift to the left on social issues a mistake, in the case of abortion, on both moral and tactical grounds.

Reflecting on the calls he received from national Democrats courting his candidacy for this race, Mr. Casey said he thought it showed that Democrats were ready to learn a lesson from his father.

"I think it showed that some national leaders were interested in broadening the perspective of the party," he said.

Smiling, he said of his father, "I wish he was around to hear about those calls."

Mr. Santorum charged in the "Meet the Press" debate that the elder Mr. Casey would be upset by his son's endorsement of a recent Federal Drug Administration decision to allow over-the-counter sales of the Plan B contraception pill.

The day after their face-off, Mr. Casey, who characterizes the pill as contraception rather than abortion, expressed anger at his opponent's reference to his father.

"I had a feeling that, at some point in this campaign, he would use that," Mr. Casey said. "But I thought it would be at a point when he was getting particularly desperate; and I think, for whatever reason, he reached that point yesterday."

But Mr. Casey is not surprised that the race is turning tougher as the election gets closer.

A few week earlier, he stood beside the demolition derby pit at the Big Butler Fair. Minutes later a car emblazoned with his name would meet a brave but ignominious end, going down at the first blow, faster than Liston against Ali. Mr Casey, naturally, didn't dwell on the fate of his namesake. To the suggestion that he and Mr. Santorum could save a lot of time and money by getting behind the wheel themselves and settling their battle amid this cacophony of collisions, Mr. Casey gestured over his shoulder and said, "It'll be worse than this before it's over."

Primary Day A Warm-up For November Vote (AP)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, September 10, 2006

In Arizona, one House candidate called party officials idiots. In Rhode Island, ad-makers turned a Senate hopeful into a political pinata.

And that's just Republicans attacking Republicans ahead of Tuesday's nine-state primary night, the busiest of the year.

For some candidates on the ballot, Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York among them, the primaries are a warm-up of sorts in advance of the fall re-election campaign and then a possible 2008 race for the White House.

For other successful politicians, they are a winnowing process.

That is the situation in Maryland, where Rep. Ben Cardin and Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman and one-time head of the NAACP, are the best known among 18 contenders for the Democratic Senate nomination.

The primary winner will run against Michael Steele, the state's lieutenant governor who is seeking to be the Senate's only black Republican.

Republicans, facing the possibility of the loss of seats in several states, hope Steele can become their brightest star of the year, even though it has been more than a quarter-century since the GOP has won a Senate race in Maryland.

After Tuesday's primary, the Democratic nominee "will be broke and without momentum facing a strong candidate with a message of empowerment that is resonating across Maryland," said Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the Republican senatorial committee.

For the political parties, the week's primaries represent another in a dwindling number of chances to influence the lineup for the November ballot, when the GOP's continued control of the House and the Senate is at stake.

Hence, the controversy.

In a Tucson-area seat in Arizona, the National Republican Congressional Committee has run an ad supporting Steve Huffman, praising him as an advocate of lower taxes and a "common sense approach to immigration that puts security first." Huffman is "the conservative choice," said the commercial.

A recent poll showed Huffman trailing a former state lawmaker, Randy Graf.

Graf won 43 percent of the primary vote in an unsuccessful run against Rep. Jim Kolbe two years ago, but party officials have expressed concerns he may be too conservative to win the seat in November.

The decision by strategists in Washington to intervene did not impress Graf or the three other contenders for the nomination. They held a news conference to criticize the move.

"They're idiots," said one, former state party chairman Mike Hellon. He and the three other Republicans running said the GOP had split the party and they predicted Democrats would benefit.

Huffman's campaign did not seem bothered.

"It's made the choice more clear. The fact of the matter is Steve is the only Republican in the race who can win the general election," said David Steumpfle, Huffman's campaign manager.

Whether or not they benefit, Democrats appear to believe that Huffman would be the toughest Republican to beat in November. No sooner had the House Republican committee begin airing its ad supporting him than Democrats rolled out one of their own criticizing him.

It said Huffman's tough-on-immigration claims were not true, and that he had skipped votes in the Arizona Legislature on new border technology and enforcement of immigration laws.

"If we can't trust Huffman to show up for work, how can we trust him to protect us," it asks.

The most prominent Democratic contenders are Gabrielle Giffords and Patty Weiss, a former television journalist.

Republicans intervened in Rhode Island, too, but went one step further than in Arizona.

With Sen. Lincoln Chafee struggling to fend off a primary challenge, the National Republican Senatorial Committee attacked his rival on television and in mass mailings. "Mayor Steve Laffey accepts Mexican ID cards that can threaten our security. Will he put our security at risk in the Senate?" asked one recent ad that has drawn criticism from Hispanic groups.

Ironically, Laffey's views on numerous issues are more in the mainstream of the Republican Party than are Chafee's. Laffey opposes abortion, favors making tax cuts permanent and supports the war in Iraq.

But as in Arizona, party strategists fear the loss of Chafee's seat to the Democrats.

"Obviously Linc Chafee is the only one who can win in Rhode Island," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, head of the GOP campaign committee. She said that if Laffey wins the primary, her organization will not spend any money to help him in the fall.

Delaware, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Vermont and Wisconsin also have primaries on Tuesday. The District of Columbia will select mayoral candidates.

Familiar Names In Primary Races (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0060637

By Don Frederick, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Contests around the country Tuesday include members of longtime political families.

WASHINGTON — A trio of famed political names — Goldwater, Clinton and Cuomo — dot the ballots in some of the 10 primaries being held across the nation on Tuesday.

In Arizona, contenders for the Republican gubernatorial nomination include the nephew of the late Sen. Barry Goldwater — for decades the state's preeminent politician and a father of the conservative movement that dominates the national GOP.

Buoyed by his last name, Don Goldwater, 50, is given a strong shot at winning the primary. But whoever the Republicans pick will be an underdog against Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano in November's vote.

Also attracting attention is the GOP primary for an open House seat in the Tucson area. With several candidates in the race, former state Rep. Randy Graf is banking that his tough stance against illegal immigration will propel him to victory.

A Graf win would strengthen the hand of Republicans opposing any revision to immigration law that includes a path to citizenship for those in the U.S. illegally. But a Graf win also could improve prospects for Democrats gaining one of the 15 GOP seats they need to control the House. The district is politically competitive and has been represented by a moderate — Jim Kolbe, the only openly gay GOP member of Congress.

In New York, Democrats are poised to renominate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, and to name state Atty. Gen. Eliot Spitzer as their gubernatorial choice — both by overwhelming margins. The Republicans who will emerge as their opponents are seen as little more than sacrificial lambs in November.

A more competitive race features Democrat Andrew Cuomo, son of former New York Gov. Mario M. Cuomo and Housing and Urban Development secretary under President Clinton. He is attempting to resuscitate his political career by claiming his party's nod for attorney general. Cuomo's chief primary rival is Mark Green, a longtime public figure in New York.

Elsewhere, Maryland Democrats would set up a Senate race between two black candidates if they chose Kweisi Mfume as their nominee against Michael S. Steele, the presumptive GOP nominee, who is the state's lieutenant governor.

Mfume is well-known — after five terms in the House, he headed the NAACP for several years. His liberal views are in sync with the state's Democrats, and he could benefit from a crowded field. But the primary's favorite remains Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who is white. He is spotlighting his vote against the congressional resolution that authorized the Iraq war.

3rd District Voters Face A Dizzying Field (WP)

By Miranda S. Spivack, Washington Post Staff Writer

16 Candidates Are Jostling for Attention in Packed Contest for Cardin's Seat

Bob and Betty Jackson patiently listened for more than two hours as the questions bounced down the banquet table from candidate to candidate at a forum for Howard County residents trying to figure out who should succeed Benjamin L. Cardin in the House of Representatives.

After absorbing answers about the war in Iraq, health care, voting machines and education from the 11 hopefuls who had attended the evening forum in Columbia, Bob Jackson pronounced himself satisfied.

"I think I've narrowed it down to four," said the 62-year-old National Security Agency retiree and longtime Columbia resident, who plans to vote in Tuesday's Democratic primary.

He reeled off his list. Barth, Beilenson, Hollinger and Sarbanes.

Betty Jackson, 62, a part-time technical writer, said she was impressed by all seven Democrats and four Republicans who spoke. "They were very dignified," she said. "Much better than the race for governor."

In the days before the primary, voters such as the Jacksons in Maryland's 3rd Congressional District, a zigzagging urban and suburban swath that cuts across three counties and Baltimore, are about to narrow the field. It's not a simple task.

With the retirement of U.S. Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D) and Cardin's decision to seek his seat, the 3rd District voters find themselves confronting a rare political dilemma: The primary ballot will have the names of eight Republicans and eight Democrats, including many experienced politicians with polished rÃ©sumÃ©s who figured it was now or never for a seat that had not come open for a generation.

"I wasn't looking forward to this evening," Bob Jackson said. "It could have gone on and on forever." But he was pleasantly surprised by the candidates' ability to separate themselves -- more or less -- from the pack. "I really got a good sense of who they are," he said.

That's what the candidates have to hope for as primary day looms: that they can break out and convince voters that they are the best for the job.

Cardin (D) won the district in 2004 with 63 percent of the vote, but Republican Gary Applebaum, one of two physicians running, said he thought a Republican stood a reasonable chance this November. "This is a district that [Gov. Robert L.] Ehrlich won four years ago," Applebaum said. "He is a very popular governor who has bridged the political divide." Applebaum said he hoped to do the same in the district, where Democrats are firmly in the majority.

The district, which Cardin represented for nearly 20 years, runs east from Baltimore to Baltimore County, west to Howard County and east again to parts of Anne Arundel and is among the country's most affluent, with the median household income topping $62,000. There are small pockets of poverty in the district, which is within commuting distance of Washington.

As the candidates head toward the finish line, several are leading in the money race, which will help them get their names and views out through direct mail, television and radio.

Having a well-known name can help -- at candidate forums such as the one Aug. 29 in Columbia, the Democrats often said they agreed with one another. Same with the Republicans.

Among the Democrats, John Sarbanes, who as the retiring senator's son enjoys high name recognition, said at the forum that he wasn't running on his family name and cited his community service and experience as a lawyer in the private and public sectors. He has raised nearly $1 million. Peter L. Beilenson, a former Baltimore health commissioner who stresses his experience managing a multimillion-dollar budget and whose father, Anthony, was a well-known congressman from California, has raised about $845,000.

Paula C. Hollinger -- a state senator from Baltimore County who chairs a key committee with jurisdiction over health, education and the environment -- has attracted support from such state politicians as state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert). She has collected about $775,000.

Andy Barth, the longtime Baltimore television reporter whose father, Alan, was a well-known Washington Post editorial page writer, has raised about $160,000. Oz Bengur, a political operative and businessman, has raised close to $500,000. Bengur, whose son in serving with the Marines in Iraq, is among the most vocal of the Democrats about Iraq, although all say they support some version of a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. Kevin O'Keeffe, a former lobbyist for the Anne Arundel County and Baltimore City governments, who points to his rise from a family of modest means, has raised about $215,000. Mishonda Baldwin, a Persian Gulf War veteran and a lawyer, has raised about $30,000.

Among Republicans, Applebaum is the leading fundraiser, according to recent campaign reports, gathering about $270,000. John White, a marketing executive, reported raising about $200,000, much of it a loan. The other Republicans reported little or no fundraising. "It speaks to support," Applebaum said.

A few days after the forum, the Jacksons were still mulling their options among the Democrats. They planned to do more research and will attend a neighbor's gathering for Barth to learn more about him. Betty said she liked the fact that Beilenson had substantial experience running a large agency. She and her husband also liked Sarbanes -- "he's very smooth" -- but worried, as Beilenson had at the candidates' forum earlier in the week, that perhaps there are too many lawyers in Congress.

"I think we feel like we don't have to vote for John Sarbanes because a lot of others will vote for him," Betty Jackson said. As for Hollinger, she thought Annapolis might need her spunk more than Washington.

"I think we'd be happy with any of the four of them," she said.

Four DFLers Dash For Every Last Vote (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 10, 2006

The contenders reach out before Tuesday's vote, knowing that whoever advances from the primary is the favorite to win it all.

Congressional hopeful Paul Ostrow extended a hand to a rumpled patron Saturday in a south Minneapolis coffee shop, asking for his vote in the Fifth District DFL primary.

"It's too early to think about voting," said the man, who declined to give his name. "I just want to have a cup of coffee right now."

But Ostrow and his main opponents -- former state Sen. Ember Reichgott Junge, former state DFL chair Mike Erlandson and state Rep. Keith Ellison -- scrambled hard Saturday to get voters to focus. They face off Tuesday in what has been the most competitive race that the district's voters have seen in decades. The frenzy will continue until the polls close at 8 p.m.

Primaries tend to have low turnout, but this one counts big. The DFLers want to replace 28-year Rep. Martin Sabo, who is retiring. The district, including Minneapolis and inner- ring suburbs, is deeply DFL, so the primary winner is a solid favorite in November.

Ostrow, a Minneapolis City Council member, says he's got broad support, but many observing the contest say it has narrowed to a three-way match.

"The race is a tossup between Ellison, Erlandson and Ember, and it would take a major event or electoral crisis for Paul Ostrow to have a chance of winning this race," said Blois Olson, copublisher of the newsletter Politics in Minnesota.

The candidates will continue to criss-cross the district's cities from coffeehouses to the Metrodome Plaza. Reichgott Junge was at the Richfield Farmers Market wearing a shiny red track suit. "You want to stand out in the crowd," she said. Early Saturday she was on handshake 2,672 of her goal of 7,000 for the last week of the campaign.

"A familiar face from the television," said Joyce Anderson of Minneapolis as she met the former state senator. "That's a good ad. It's a go."

Reichgott Junge handed her a sticker and said, "It will help you to remember to vote on Tuesday."

Erlandson knocked on doors in Uptown with Sabo, who is supporting his 13-year chief of staff. The day was a historic final door-knocking for Sabo.

Erlandson picked up Sabo's techniques -- keep moving and keep the message short. "I've never believed you should give them a civics test at the door," Sabo said. "Say 'Hello, and I'd like your vote.' "

A few miles north, Ellison wore a pinstripe suit as he delivered an indignant stump speech to Service Employees International Union members preparing to hand out his literature. Ellison had come from the funeral of 15-year-old Courtney Brown, killed a week earlier, apparently by teenagers trying to take his jersey.

"We cannot ignore the fact that when they squeeze us for $5.15 an hour or even $10 an hour, it has social implications." When parents work so much, "the little ones are out on the street trying to figure it out for themselves," Ellison said.

Squeezing all they can

Every minute counts now in a race too close to call. The prediction is somewhere between 65,000 and 80,000 voters will cast ballots.

The candidates long ago identified tactics and issues designed to carve out the biggest piece of the primary pie.

Ellison, the DFL endorsee, is targeting the "unlikely" primary voters who tend to vote only in November. He wants to pull U.S. troops out of Iraq and has made economic and social justice a centerpiece of his campaign. "We all count. We all matter," he said. But issues from his personal life have dogged him since he won the endorsement in May. He failed to pay parking tickets, federal income taxes and file campaign finance reports.

He's considered to be strong in north Minneapolis, an area he has represented for four years but where turnout tends to be low. He focused his efforts on a get-out-the-vote and direct-mail effort. Campaign manager Dave Colling said Ellison is working to get out voters who are black, Somali, gay and lesbian, peace activists and Latinos.

Of the four main candidates, Erlandson hit the air hardest with radio and television commercials. He is focusing on his ties to Sabo and experience and has made the environment a priority in campaigning. He is also targeting voters 58 and older who make up 70 percent of those who vote in the primary. Erlandson said he believes he got a boost from a Star Tribune editorial endorsement that hit on his experience, potential for accruing seniority and DFL credentials.

He expects to do well in his boyhood turf of Fridley and Columbia Heights.

Reichgott Junge has been running a television commercial about the recent deaths of four family members and her top priority -- universal health care coverage.

Reichgott Junge is considered strong in Robbinsdale, New Hope and Crystal, an area she represented in the state Senate for 18 years.

Her opponents have questioned her liberal credibility and tagged her a Sen. Joe Lieberman Democrat. Lieberman's support of the Iraq war cost him a primary in Connecticut.

Reichgott Junge responded with an automated phone call by former Secretary of State Joan Growe on Saturday to 46,000 primary voters.

Ostrow has an army of young volunteers that has knocked on as many as 1,200 doors a night.

Although Ostrow represents northeast Minneapolis, the campaign is targeting his literature to south and southwest Minneapolis, said Ostrow's wife and campaign manager, Julie Mattson Ostrow, because they are traditionally high voter turnout areas.

Ostrow said he would be a strong voice for cities in Congress and wants to serve on the Education Committee to focus on schools.

Perry Rivals Aren't Closing The Gap (HC)

By R.g. Ratcliffe

Houston Chronicle, September 10, 2006

Polls show he's vulnerable, but crowded field has divided vote

AUSTIN - The horse race polls have varied dramatically about who is running second in the Texas governor's race, but those surveys have made one thing perfectly clear: for most of the past year, Texans have been unhappy with the job Rick Perry has done as governor.

Perry's sagging job approval also is reflected in poll numbers showing support for his re-election has hovered between 35 percent and 41 percent since February.

However, that does not mean the Republican incumbent is in immediate danger of defeat. His four challengers are dividing the discontented voters, and none of them has gained traction so far.

"They're like dogs, running around chasing each other's tails, trying to eat the same piece of the pie," said Perry pollster Mike Baselice. "Perry, meanwhile, is sitting over there with a plurality, and he wins."

Perry's main challengers are after what they call the "anti-Perry vote." But the question remains whether Democrat Chris Bell or independents Kinky Friedman and Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn or Libertarian James Werner can consolidate this vote into a winning coalition.

"There is a bloc of voters out there right now waiting to see which one of the three is most likely to get Perry out," said Friedman campaign manager Dean Barkley. "That is the battle of September, to be the alternative to Perry."

Perry's job approval ratings have lagged behind his job disapproval rating among Texans for 10 of the past 16 months in SurveyUSA polling done by television stations WOAI in San Antonio and KEYE in Austin.

Root of the issuePerry's job rating was decidedly favorable only in the month after Texas accepted Hurricane Katrina evacuees; when Perry visited troops in Iraq in January; and immediately after the Legislature passed a bill to solve public school finance problems in June.

The polls raise questions about why Perry's job approval and re-elect numbers are so low after six years in office, and they pose the problem of how he would lead the state for another four years if 55 percent to 65 percent of voters turned against him.

Perry's support for re-election was 36 percent in a February Dallas Morning News Poll. Polls last month by Zogby Interactive for the Wall Street Journal and Rassmussen Reports each set Perry's re-election support at 35 percent.

A survey the Texas Trial Lawyers Association distributed to its members last week showed Perry's re-election support at 41 percent.

"I'm not sure why people don't like him (Perry), except he's been divisive to the extreme," said Democratic political consultant Dan McClung of Houston.

McClung said Perry tailored his political agenda to his own party without worrying about his general popularity. "He has run this state based on primary election polls."

Placing the blameTexas Eagle Forum President Cathie Adams said she thinks Perry's poll numbers are down because he is taking the blame from Republicans angry at the federal government for not doing more to stop illegal immigration.

"I don't think the word has gotten out about what he's done at the border," said Adams, head of the local conservative women's political organization.

Perry last week launched a television commercial promising if re-elected to ask the Legislature for $100 million to fight crime along the border with Mexico.

Former state GOP Chairman Tom Pauken, who is heading a property tax appraisal study for Perry, said he thinks the governor's numbers reflect voter disappointment in the Bush administration and with Congress.

A CNN poll released last week found 55 percent of the likely voters surveyed nationally plan to vote against the incumbent of either party for federal, state and local offices this fall.

"This is a tough year for incumbents around the country, not just in Texas," Pauken said.

Pauken said he also thinks Perry has not gotten "the credit he deserves" for passage of a school finance plan and a new business tax that will cut property tax rates.

Connecting with votersIn the poll distributed by the trial lawyers, all the candidates, including Perry, were viewed as likable by voters — except for Friedman. Friedman was viewed negatively by 32 percent of those surveyed and positively by 22 percent. Bell was the least-known candidate among the top four. However, at the moment, none of Perry's opponents has surpassed 25 percent support in any of the polls. So how do they make the campaign jell for them?

Barkley said Friedman is trying to expand his base of voters. Friedman also last week tried to appeal to conservatives by undercutting Perry's border security television commercial by proposing to put 10,000 state National Guard troops on the border with Mexico.

"We hit a home run all week with the free media," Barkley said. "Perry's ad on the border, we trumped him."

Bell strategist, Jason Stanford, said Bell's message is simple: Perry is beatable and only a Democrat can do it. Stanford said the built-in Democratic vote and straight ticket voting for Bell means it will be impossible for any other candidate to get enough votes to win.

Two-horse race?Stanford noted that the lowest Democratic vote-getter in 2002 — Marty Akins for comptroller — received 1.4 million votes, 33 percent of the turnout. Democrat Garry Mauro got wiped out in his 1998 challenge of Gov. George W. Bush and still received 1.1 million votes.

"If Chris Bell wakes up on Election Day and he has done nothing, he's going to get in the low 30s percent of the vote," Stanford said.

Strayhorn spokesman Mark Sanders said Bell's strategy will not work because he has no money to advertise his campaign. Sanders said it will quickly become evident to the anti-Perry voters that the two-person race is between Perry and Strayhorn.

Sanders said Perry's problems are multi-fold.

"Democrats absolutely hate him. The far right hates him because of his (business) tax bill, and you've got a group in the middle that has just got Perry fatigue," Sanders said.

He noted Govs. Mark White and Ann Richards were voted out of office after one term. Gov. Bill Clements lost his re-election and then won again four years later.

The race at the moment appears to favor a victory by Perry, said Southern Methodist University political scientist Cal Jillson. Jillson said if Perry wins with a 40 percent plurality, it should not affect his ability to govern.

"Texans don't expect much from state government, and Rick Perry delivers what they expect," Jillson said.

Primary Contest For Governor Overshadowed (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

After 21 months as a candidate for governor, Eliot Spitzer entered this final weekend of campaigning for the Democratic nomination without the battle scars or empty coffers that can often hobble front-runners, and appears poised to defeat Thomas R. Suozzi in Tuesday's primary.

Mr. Spitzer, holding a 50-point lead in the latest polls, and Mr. Suozzi campaigned aggressively in and around New York City in recent days, with Mr. Spitzer seeking to energize his base of liberals and union members and acting like a confident incumbent with a ready-to-roll agenda: job creation, more money for public schools, and an overhaul of the health care system.

If the governor's race is the most consequential one of the ballot, given that Gov. George E. Pataki is stepping down after 12 years, the most compelling contests on Tuesday are further down the ballot — especially a fight between two New York political titans, Andrew M. Cuomo and Mark Green, for the Democratic nomination for attorney general. Tuesday's outcome might well end the political career of whichever man loses.

That hard-fought contest has proved fascinating to Democratic loyalists, bloggers, and political analysts: Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Green each started the race in 2005 as damaged figures seeking redemption from voters.

In conversations with consultants, reporters, and donors, each man sought to explain his past mistakes and say he had learned his lessons. Mr. Green had a grating image for some after several past bids for office, most recently as the Democratic nominee for mayor of New York in 2001. Mr. Cuomo had struck some voters as arrogant as a candidate for governor in 2002.

As newspaper endorsements and analysts have noted, the Cuomo-Green battle will partly hinge on which man is less unlikable in the eyes of voters.

"It's incredibly telling that Mark and Andrew don't speak or appear prominently in their TV commercials, because likable candidates usually do," said Ruth Sherman, a communications consultant who works with politicians and has examined their behavior. "Mark is perhaps better known, since Andrew worked in Washington, so Mark may have more to overcome there."

Polls show Mr. Cuomo with a 20-point lead. One pollster, Lee M. Miringoff, director of the Marist College Institute for Public Opinion, said that Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Green might cancel out each other when it comes to likability, yet said it was still a factor because there were few substantive issues driving the race.

"It has basically come down to these two well-known personalities slugging it out negatively, and people's feelings about each guy," Mr. Miringoff said.

A third Democratic candidate, Sean Patrick Maloney, is running far behind in the polls, but has made his mark in this campaign for his nimble performance in debates.

Both Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Green deny the charge of unlikability. Mr. Cuomo said no voters had brought up his own likability to him. Mr. Green quipped, "My wife and daughter think I'm lovable."

Mr. Green added that he felt he was enjoying a surge thanks to recent endorsements by editorials in The Daily News and The New York Times.

Mr. Cuomo had moved earlier and more quickly to lock up support from labor unions and political leaders. He counted, in particular, on two king-makers in Democratic politics: His father, former Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, and his political counselor, Jennifer Cunningham, executive vice president of S.E.I.U./1199, the health care workers' union.

Yet Mr. Green's tireless campaigning is legendary, and he released a new commercial on Friday that touted his newspaper endorsements and attacked Mr. Cuomo. Mr. Cuomo unveiled his own ad featuring praise from prominent supporters such as Ed Koch.

Probably the other most competitive Democratic race, in the 11th Congressional District in Brooklyn, has draw attention for its racial dynamic: A respected white city councilman, David Yassky, moved into the district to run for the seat, which has been a preserve of black politicians.

He is running against three black candidates, each of whom has passionate bases of support: Councilwoman Yvette D. Clarke, State Senator Carl Andrews, and Chris Owens, the son of the sitting congressman, Major R. Owens.

Those three candidates risk undercutting each other by splitting the black vote, and Mr. Yassky has won praise from some black voters.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has a primary challenger on Tuesday, Jonathan Tasini, a liberal and former union leader who has based his candidacy on opposition to the war in Iraq.

Mrs. Clinton has a huge lead, but she has still spent money on a glossy mailing pleading for a huge primary vote.

A low turnout might skew the result a bit if liberals embrace Mr. Tasini; for image, the Clinton camp wants to limit the protest vote against her to the single digits.

Turnout is a concern for all of the candidates, particularly on the Republican side, where a former Yonkers mayor, John Spencer, and a former Reagan administration aide, Kathleen Troia McFarland, are vying for the nomination to face Mrs. Clinton. Because both candidates have lacked money to get out their message, they have dwelled on personal attacks instead, especially Mrs. McFarland, resulting in a negative political atmosphere that traditionally depresses turnout.

"McFarland has had a lot of problems as a candidate, and Spencer has not overwhelmed here, so you may end up seeing a historically low turnout," said Jerry Skurnik, a political consultant who analyzes voter trends. "It could even be 10 or 15 percent."

The Republican candidates for governor, John Faso, and for attorney general, Jeanine F. Pirro, do not face primary contests on Tuesday.

For a politically voracious state like New York, it is somewhat unusual that the primary races never became especially creative or close: Mr. Spitzer, Mrs. Clinton, and Mr. Cuomo have all held double-digit leads for months, and only Mr. Green has shown ability to narrow his gap.

"This looks an awful lot like it looked like seven months ago," said Kieran Mahoney, a Republican political consultant in New York, referring to the primary political landscape.

Mr. Suozzi argued that his problem was money: He could not compete with Mr. Spitzer's television commercials — making only one large-scale advertising purchase last spring — or with the Spitzer political apparatus, which included most unions and elected Democrats.

"I would rather I was winning, but I simply haven't had enough money," Mr. Suozzi said. "Eliot's obviously very smart, but I never had enough the resources to put enough pressure to force him to tell us what he's going to do as governor."

Mr. Spitzer wrapped up a bus tour of the state late last week, and said he would campaign flat out through Tuesday night. He said he felt enthusiastic but also a little bit tired — not just from the bus tour, but the primary race that essentially began when he tried to clear the Democratic field by announcing for governor in December 2004.

He said that a great deal of hard work had made him a battle-tested candidate rather than a battle-scarred one.

"The hard work has not just been the campaign, but in the attorney general's office, where the work has reflected the values and dedication to public service that has been part of our message," he said.

Firm Tied To O'Malley Given City Contracts (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

BALTIMORE (AP) -- A law firm that has employed Mayor Martin O'Malley's campaign treasurer for the past six years has been awarded more than $1.2 million in city legal contracts since 2000, city records show.

Brown & Sheehan and its predecessor firm have won city contracts mostly for defending police officers and commanders, according to records obtained by the Baltimore Sun.

During the same time that the city's Board of Estimates voted to award many of the contracts, the firm employed the mayor's campaign treasurer, Martin Cadogan, as an attorney and later as a partner.

David Sheehan, a founding partner, defended the firm's record for obtaining city work, saying that Mr. Cadogan was not involved in the contracts.

He told the newspaper that Mr. Cadogan did not do legal work connected to them and did not benefit financially.

City officials and an attorney with the firm also said Brown & Sheehan's predecessor received its first contract with the city before Mr. Cadogan was hired.

"We're comfortable with it because we're comfortable that [Mr. Cadogan] separates out his political role from his legal role in the firm," Mr. Sheehan told the newspaper. "We're comfortable with it because it reflects such a tiny fraction of our overall business. We think the city really values our work."

Typically, professional-services contracts that are awarded to outside law firms are approved by the Board of Estimates but are not competitively bid.

Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat running for governor, sits on the five-member Board of Estimates and appoints two other voting members, the city solicitor and the head of the department of public works.

An O'Malley spokeswoman referred questions to the solicitor.

Solicitor Ralph Tyler said he did not know why Brown & Sheehan was selected, though he said that there are a limited number of firms -- particularly ones certified as a minority business such as Brown & Sheehan -- able to perform the work.

Mr. Tyler said the city's use of the firm does not represent a conflict for Mr. O'Malley.

"It's my understanding that Mr. Cadogan does not participate in the profits of the firm and therefore would derive no benefits from the firm's representation of the city or its agencies," Mr. Tyler said.

Brown & Sheehan, which has five partners and nine associates, does a wide range of legal work, including commercial litigation, corporate and employment law and government representation.

Before 2004, the firm was known as Brown, Diffenderffer & Kearney.

The firm's Web site (www.brownsheehan.com) indicates that Mr. Cadogan practices "business and corporate law, real estate development and general civil litigation with an emphasis on insurance defense."

Governor's Race Gets Down To Tactics (MINNST)

Minnesota Public Radio had to cancel its customary gubernatorial debate at the recent State Fair because first Gov. Tim Pawlenty and then DFL adversary Attorney General Mike Hatch said they wouldn't attend. The no-shows by the big names have become a pattern this year, and they reflect the front-runners' approach to Tuesday's primary election. The Sept. 12 ballot will present contests for each of the major parties' gubernatorial nominations, but the heavily favored party-endorsed candidates are ignoring their challengers. Overmatched on nearly every conventional measure of political strength, the underdogs remain unbowed and are frantically campaigning to the end.

Here are looks at the candidates' central themes and tactics:

DFL

Attorney General Mike Hatch: Hatch has said almost nothing about Lourey and has been pummeling Pawlenty on the campaign circuit, accusing him of abandoning progressive Minnesota values that were shared by Republican and DFL governors. He is emphasizing an economic revitalization plan, more funding for schools and cutting health-care costs.

On the trail most of last week in outstate Minnesota, Hatch has been hitting state college campuses, focusing on his plan to reduce tuition at state higher education campuses. Earlier he unleashed a $300,000 TV ad campaign, with the punch line, "Minnesota Tough, Making Minnesota Nice."

Sen. Becky Lourey: As one of the Legislature's more ardent liberals, Lourey has made universal health-care coverage and pulling out of the war in Iraq her campaign pillars. Last year she lost a son in combat, and she insists that there are things governors can do unilaterally and cooperatively to push for withdrawal.

Lourey has called for specific tax increases, including restoration of higher rates on the wealthy, to finance her agenda. She describes Hatch's plan on health care and revenue-raising as timid and inadequate, and she says both Pawlenty and Hatch have laid out a lot of costly policy proposals without credible plans to pay for them.

Working her home territory in northeastern Minnesota in the final week, Lourey picked up a half-dozen endorsements from labor union and party activists in and around Duluth. A big showing by anti-war liberals in the Fifth Congressional District, where turnout in a multi-candidate primary is expected to be high, and a strong showing in the northeast, will help produce an upset, her supporters say.

She's campaigning frenetically and attended another Hatch-less debate in Duluth on Friday evening.

Ole Savior, self-described poet, artist and writer: After no fewer than eight landslide losses in candidacies for top office since 1984, Savior is trying again. He's calling for a nuclear-free world and a gasoline price limit of $1.50 a gallon, and he lists as a credential the fact that he is a "certified blood donor of six gallons."

INDEPENDENCE

Peter Hutchinson, consultant to state and local governments, former state Finance Department commissioner, former superintendent of Minneapolis schools: Hutchinson's message is that both of the big parties are dysfunctional and doing a poor job of addressing the "main things," which he lists as soaring health-care and tuition costs, a decaying transportation system and declining water quality.

He has a plan to save the state more than a billion dollars in health-care spending through cutting administrative costs. The savings would be invested in early childhood education and tuition aid, and a 10-cent increase in the gas tax would help bankroll an ambitious restoration of highway and transit programs.

The candidate and his hand-picked team of IP constitutional office hopefuls are blitzing the state on a "Drive to Independence," a ground-level barnstorm through 210 cities covering 5,500 miles.

Pam Ellison, library assistant and St. Paul community activist: Her dominant theme is a call for a universal, single-payer health-care system in Minnesota. She's also calling for total funding of public schools by the state government and ending the reliance on property taxes. And she's encouraging organic agriculture and development of farmers' markets.

She's got media interviews lined up on a swing through central Minnesota and Duluth this weekend. Total funds on hand as of Aug. 21: $616.33.

REPUBLICAN

Gov. Tim Pawlenty: The early message is a classic incumbent story line, that the ship of state is shipshape, that he has balanced a huge deficit, cracked down on crime, and produced strong job growth. His primary focus, the subject of his latest ad, is a batch of public school reform proposals, including a requirement that 70 percent of funds be spent on classroom instruction.

An e-mail "blast" from his campaign office will remind tens of thousands of Republicans to turn out for the incumbent governor, but Pawlenty is not personally campaigning very hard. He's doing gubernatorial stuff instead this weekend, attending funeral services for soldiers and a National Guard send-off. But he has put $300,000 worth of TV ads on the air in the past two weeks.

Sue Jeffers, owner of Stub & Herb's Bar near the University of Minnesota, conservative activist. Jeffers' main thrust is that she's the only real conservative Republican on the ballot and that Pawlenty has violated conservative principles too many times, topped by his tobacco fee and his supporting taxpayer financing for sports stadiums and light-rail systems.

She's raised $24,000 to Pawlenty's $2 million, but the feisty Jeffers insists that her campaign is catching fire.

Democrats Working To Attract Hispanics Throughout South Florida (FLSUNSEN)

By Tal Abbady, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 10, 2006

Democrats are forming Hispanic caucuses in South Florida to bridge the quiet, clannish divisions among immigrant groups and coax more Latinos to the polls in November.

The last decade's surge in eligible voters with ties to countries as disparate as Venezuela and Peru has challenged the Cuban Republican vote, experts say. But Democrats trying to seize on the numbers and find a common Latino voice are often stumped.

Language barriers, cultural rifts, a lack of trust in the political system and an unwillingness to unite under a single label keep many immigrants eligible to vote away from the polls, activists say.

"We'll meet up to watch fútbol or have a drink. But when it comes to bringing people together for a political vision or to exercise our vote, we don't do that. We don't unify ourselves like the Haitians do," said Peter Camacho.

The Colombian-American is president of the Palm Beach Hispanic Democratic Caucus, which had its first meeting in June. In the past two months, it has held fundraisers and sent bilingual volunteers to canvass neighborhoods in West Palm Beach, Lake Worth and other cities.

There are roughly 321,000 eligible Hispanic voters in South Florida, according to the civic education and voter registration group Democracia U.S.A. in Miami. In 2004, about 40 percent of Hispanic voters were registered Republicans, 40 percent Democrats and 20 percent independents, the group said. Hispanic Republicans are predominantly Cuban-Americans.

Republican gubernatorial nominee Charlie Crist and Democratic nominee Jim Davis have both hired Hispanic outreach directors to court voters.

"There's such an influx of nationalities now. It's a good time for groups to come out from under the perception that all Florida Hispanics are going to vote lock, stock and barrel like Cuban Republicans," said Michael Rodriguez, a Cuban-American who is secretary of the Palm Beach Hispanic Democratic Caucus.

Carlos Mario Ortiz, owner of El Bodegon supermarket in West Palm Beach, has pledged his support to the caucus.

As he walked through his store on a recent morning, shoppers milled around a pyramid of gnarled, pungent chiles and ordered cuts from a barrel-sized round of palomilla steak.

Among Ortiz' customers are Colombians, Peruvians, Mexicans, Guatemalans, Venezuelans and others. He said there's a long road ahead for Democrats trying to unite Latinos.

"We're regionalists," said Ortiz, who is Colombian. "We come here and look out for our own. Colombians help other Colombians. If some Peruvian had come to my door talking about uniting, I might not have paid attention. But when Peter came as a fellow Colombian, I listened."

In Broward County, cultural niches have also stymied efforts to organize, according to Linda Alber, a Colombian who heads the 210-member Latin Democratic Club of Broward County. The group meets twice a month in Cooper City.

"When we do elect Hispanics to local offices, they do little to bring us together," Alber said.

But Mark Romero, 19, a Florida International University student with a major in political science, says the biggest problem is not group divisions, but a lack of organized, political outreach targeted to Hispanics, especially those who are eligible voters but speak little English and have not registered.

Romero, a New Yorker of Puerto Rican heritage, has teamed up with other Hispanics to form a Broward Hispanic Democratic caucus, though it is in the early stages. The effort began when Romero worked for gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis' primary campaign.

"Hispanics in Broward are simply not being reached. If you don't have outreach, you don't have issues," Romero said. "There are a lot of stereotypes out there. Not all people are going to come under one giant blanket issue like immigration."

Michelle Acuña, a Colombian-American Hollywood resident, is helping Romero start the caucus, which she said will focus on Spanish-language outreach to voters with poor English skills. That includes her mother, a citizen and voter.

"On Tuesday my mom asked me, `OK, which Democrat should I vote for?' She speaks little English and depends on me to give her the information," she said.

When language and cultural cliques are not an obstacle, Democrats must still reach voters who lived under broken political systems in their homelands and brought their disaffection to the United States.

Among them is Alcides Gil, 58, a Colombian who lives in West Palm Beach and is a regular at El Bodegon. Gil, a U.S. citizen, has not voted in any election.

"My vote would only serve to keep the privileged in power," he said. "I've seen it in Colombia, and I see it here."

Three Days Before Vote, Democrats Avidly Stump (NYT)

By Jonathan P. Hicks

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

With just three days before voters go to the polls for party primaries, candidates for a number of offices trekked to neighborhoods throughout the New York City area yesterday, to street fairs, housing complexes, outdoor markets and parades.

Many of the statewide races in Tuesday's primary are seen as being less than competitive, but in the Democratic race for attorney general, Andrew M. Cuomo and his major rival, Mark Green, began broadcasting new campaign commercials this weekend. And they continued to exchange fire yesterday.

A day after Mr. Cuomo criticized contributions to Mark Green's campaign by his brother, the Green campaign shot back with an angry demand for an apology.

"I'm awaiting Andrew's apology for attacking my family member since I wouldn't and haven't criticized his father and brother-in-law for also making perfectly lawful, generous contributions," Mr. Green said in a written statement.

The current attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, is likely to prevail easily over Thomas R. Suozzi, the Nassau County executive, in the Democratic primary for governor, polls have indicated, and United States Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is expected to have little trouble with Jonathan Tasini, a former union leader.

Nonetheless, the candidates were out in full force yesterday, particularly at the Labor Day Parade up Fifth Avenue in Manhattan.

The event began with an old-style political rally organized by the New York City Central Labor Council and the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union.

The speakers included Mrs. Clinton, State Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi and Mr. Spitzer, as well as his running mate for lieutenant governor, State Senator David A. Paterson.

"I never feel confident about victory," Mrs. Clinton said in an interview before marching in the parade. "I'm always running scared. I feel I have to reach every voter that I haven't reached."

In the attorney general's race, recent campaign finance disclosures showed that Mr. Green's campaign received another $102,000 from his brother, Stephen L. Green, a real estate executive. Mr. Cuomo, saying the situation had the makings of a conflict of interest, called on the Green campaign to return that money.

The candidate's brother is part of a group bidding on a 20-year franchise to operate three New York racetracks. The franchise is being monitored by the attorney general's office.

"What's wrong with brotherly or fatherly love?" Mark Green said. "Conflicts? Of course if a matter involving my brother or his brother-in-law hypothetically came before us as attorney general, we would each recuse ourselves. Where's the problem?"

Mr. Green's newest commercial highlighted questions that he has raised about Mr. Cuomo's ethics. The criticism followed an article in The Village Voice that reported that Mr. Cuomo, while federal housing secretary, pursued legal action against a businessman, Andrew L. Farkas, who later settled the case with federal officials, and that years later, Mr. Cuomo went to work for Mr. Farkas's new company, earning $1.2 million over two years. Mr. Farkas and his associates have also contributed $800,000 to Mr. Cuomo's campaign.

The Cuomo campaign made public a letter jointly sent by three public officials asking Mr. Green to stop broadcasting the commercial.

They contended that it had misrepresented Mr. Cuomo's role in a suit by Mr. Spitzer's office against the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Their letter noted that Mr. Cuomo had already left the department by then.

"How could you run to be the state's top law enforcement official while making such a wildly false allegation," stated the letter, sent by Christine C. Quinn, the speaker of the City Council; Scott Stringer, the Manhattan borough president; and William C. Thompson Jr., the city comptroller.

Both candidates marched in the labor parade, but while Mr. Cuomo attended the rally, Mr. Green did not. He marched with members of the Public Employees Federation, which endorsed him. The third candidate in the primary is Sean Patrick Maloney.

The statewide candidates were not the only ones crisscrossing the city yesterday. In Brooklyn, the four Democratic candidates in a hotly contested race for the House of Representatives were scurrying through the 11th Congressional District.

That race in central Brooklyn has attracted much attention because three candidates are black and one is white. The district's population is about 60 percent black, and many black officials in Brooklyn have worried that a crowded Democratic field of candidates would pave the way for the white candidate, City Councilman David Yassky, to win the seat, which has been held by black politicians for years.

The four are running to succeed United States Representative Major R. Owens, who is not running for re-election.

Yesterday, one of the candidates for the Congressional seat, State Senator Carl Andrews, was campaigning at a farmers' market in Park Slope with Mr. Spitzer, who is Mr. Andrews's most prominent political supporter.

Mr. Andrews campaigned at the market just hours after Mr. Yassky greeted voters there and before the arrival of Chris Owens, another candidate, who is the incumbent's son. The fourth candidate, City Councilwoman Yvette D. Clarke, was greeting voters at housing complexes in the district.

The Slenderized Governor, With Advice To Share (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Sept. 8 — Mike Huckabee has been the governor of Arkansas for a decade, but he is most famous for what he has done in the last three years: lose more than 100 pounds and encourage other Arkansans to follow his example.

As he contemplates a bid for the Republican nomination for president in 2008, the slenderized governor has inspired a host of imitators, including Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, who shed 33 pounds, and Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, who promised in June to go on a diet. These and other Southern politicians say they are trying to set an example for their constituents, who exhibit the highest rates of obesity in the country.

But for those who would join the health crusade, Mr. Huckabee's tale includes a cautionary thread. In the South, the fight against obesity is essentially a culture war. And while the campaign may have raised Mr. Huckabee's national profile, not everyone here appreciates a governor whose policies include weighing schoolchildren and sending home report cards on their body mass index.

Mr. Huckabee, a teetotaler who now rises before dawn to jog five miles, has been accused of nagging the populace, banning birthday cakes in schools (not true, he says) and trampling the personal freedoms of smokers with an indoor smoking ban. While he says he uses the carrot, not the stick, to encourage better health, his virtue alone has a way of making people like Pearletha David, the owner of David Family Kitchen, a soul food restaurant here, feel henpecked.

"I think it's fine for him," Ms. David said, putting her hands on her hips. "But he ain't got to make the whole state lose weight."

After the governor's nutritional guidelines for school lunches took effect, one girl wrote a letter to him demanding "real food" like nachos and pizza. A columnist for The Baxter Bulletin imagined a future of diners picking at their "sautéed soybeans with flavor-free dressing" and discussing the criminalization of cheese curls.

Despite the efforts, the state's obesity rate among adults has actually increased since last year, according to the Trust for America's Health.

Mr. Huckabee counters that changing dietary habits is a long-term, generational project, and says that in three years of recording children's body mass index and reporting it to parents, the number of children at risk of obesity has decreased — by half of 1 percent.

Mr. Huckabee knows what he is up against, namely all-you-can-eat buffets, cheese grits and a local ice cream flavor called Woo Pig Chewy. One of his own family dogs is named Sonic, after the fast-food chain whose cherry limeades are favored by his wife, Janet.

"It's not just your culture," he said, speaking in his office in the Capitol building. "It's your comfort."

But Mr. Huckabee insists that a lifestyle revolution can happen, citing four behaviors that have been reshaped over the years by concerted government effort: littering, seatbelt use, smoking and drunken driving.

"In each of those cases, in my lifetime, I have seen the needle move from one side to the other," he said. "People used to throw entire sacks of trash out of their cars without thinking it was inappropriate."

Mr. Huckabee's health obsession began in 2003, when he received a diagnosis of Type 2 diabetes, which can sometimes be controlled by diet and exercise. At the time, he weighed close to 300 pounds.

With the help of doctors at the University of Arkansas for Medical Sciences, the governor went on a strict diet and began to exercise, shedding weight so rapidly that it was as if he simply unzipped a fat suit and stepped out. He wrote a book called "Quit Digging Your Grave With a Knife and Fork." In March 2005, he ran the Little Rock marathon in 3 hours 38 minutes.

But Mr. Huckabee's change of eating habits has put him in another sort of bubble. He no longer eats at banquets and receptions. He keeps a cooler of food in his car. On a recent day, an acquaintance started to offer him a slice of homemade cheesecake, then stopped herself. "I'd give it to you, but then I'd be digging your grave with a fork and a plastic knife," she said.

The governor insists he does not want to create a "nanny state" or a "grease police." Many of his policies include incentives like exercise breaks for state employees. He has expanded state insurance coverage to cover obesity treatment. He advocated restricting access to vending machines for high school students and replacing the sugary sodas in them with juice and water. Arkansas is one of a handful of states where the nutritional guidelines for school lunches are stricter than the federal requirements.

But some critics say Mr. Huckabee's crusade has more rhetoric than substance. Part of his Healthy Arkansas initiative is to give a seal of approval to restaurants that offer healthful alternatives and nutritional information, but critics point out that the list of 106 restaurants includes a Burger King, a Pizza Hut and 52 McDonald's.

The policy that has brought the most attention to the governor, however, was not his initiative. In the spring of 2003, Herschel W. Cleveland, then the Arkansas House speaker, introduced a bill to remove vending machines from elementary schools and send home the body mass index report cards.

The bill passed easily, but the public generally did not notice until Mr. Huckabee had become the health governor. The news made national headlines and brought vehement objections from parents concerned about government intrusion and fragile young egos, recalled the sponsor, State Representative Jay Bradford, a Democrat, who spoke by telephone from his office in Pine Bluff. "I'm also thin, by the way," Mr. Bradford added.

For those who would change Southern eating habits, though, there is always the problem of tradition and identity. And though Mr. Huckabee is not naïve, his strategy for tackling the issue is optimistic. "There's much more to celebrate in a person's health than there is about just what they eat," he said.

Evangelical Author Puts Progressive Spin On Traditional Faith (WP)

By Caryle Murphy, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Lyndsay Moseley was no longer inspired by the evangelical Christian faith of her youth. As an environmental activist, she believed that it offered little spiritual support for her work and was overly focused on opposing abortion and gay marriage.

Then the 27-year-old District resident discovered Brian D. McLaren of Laurel, one of contemporary Christianity's hottest authors and founding pastor of Cedar Ridge Community Church in upper Montgomery County.

"He always talks about the environment as a priority when he talks about the church being relevant to the world," Moseley said. "He's leading a [spiritual] conversation that needs to happen," one that "I've been hungry for."

McLaren has emerged as one of the most prominent voices in an increasingly active group of progressive evangelicals who are challenging the theological orthodoxy and political dominance of the religious right. He also is an intellectual guru of "emerging church," a grass-roots movement among young evangelicals exploring new models of living out their Christian faith.

Progressives, who range from 11 to 36 percent of all evangelicals, according to various polls, are still overshadowed by the Christian right among evangelicals. But the steady popularity of McLaren's books over the past eight years signals an expanding diversity of thought in this important political constituency.

McLaren, 50, offers an evangelical vision that emphasizes tolerance and social justice. He contends that people can follow Jesus's way without becoming Christian. In the latest of his eight books, "The Secret Message of Jesus," which has sold 55,000 copies since its April release, he argues that Christians should be more concerned about creating a just "Kingdom of God" on earth than about getting into heaven.

Along with such other progressive evangelicals as Washington-based anti-poverty activist Jim Wallis and educator Tony Campolo, McLaren is openly critical of the conservative political agenda favored by many evangelicals.

"When we present Jesus as a pro-war, anti-poor, anti-homosexual, anti-environment, pro-nuclear weapons authority figure draped in an American flag, I think we are making a travesty of the portrait of Jesus we find in the gospels," McLaren said in a recent interview.

Scot McKnight, a professor of religious studies at Chicago's North Park University who has studied McLaren's career, said that "he wants there to be greater cooperation among Christians, and he thinks evangelical Christians have aligned themselves too closely with the Republican Party. He wants to see Christians . . . pursue what is right, regardless of the political party's platform."

What makes McLaren's ideas attractive to progressive evangelicals appalls the more numerous conservatives. Noting that he fails to condemn homosexuality, one conservative Web site called him "A True Son of Lucifer" for ignoring "absolute biblical truth." And last year, Baptists in Kentucky revoked a speaking invitation after McLaren said that followers of Jesus might not be the only ones to gain salvation.

"If you have some person or movement coming along calling into question the non-negotiables of Christianity, then those who espouse Christianity find such a challenge dangerous," said Donald A. Carson, professor of New Testament at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School in Illinois, who has criticized McLaren's theology.

Though a "creative, sparkly writer," added Carson, McLaren has "got so many things wrong in his analysis that his work is not going to last that long."Modernizing the Message

"Emerging church" is a loose network of mostly young evangelicals who believe the Christian message needs to be made more relevant in a time of rapid technological and societal change, particularly to those who've never been part of any church. Participants refer to their interaction as a "conversation," much of which takes place on the Internet at sites such as http://www.emergentvillage.com and blogs such as pomomusings.com.

"We are questioning a lot of presuppositions of conventional Christians: What should a church look like? How do we really understand Scripture in a modern context?" said Tony Jones, the conversation's national coordinator. "To conservatives, we seem like relativists, and to liberals, we seem like Jesus freaks."

The movement has no membership rolls, set beliefs or creed; liturgical diversity is encouraged. There is no way to know how many congregations are putting "emerging church" ideas into practice, Jones said. But "thousands of churches and pastors are . . . listening in, coming to hear Brian and reading my weekly e-mails."

McLaren said the name "emerging church" came out of a 2001 discussion he had with Doug Pagitt, pastor of Solomon's Porch in Minneapolis, about "why the megachurches were not attracting young people." The reasons, experts said, were becoming evident in the 1990s: dissatisfaction with the rightward drift in evangelical politics; worship styles so contemporary and casual they had no spiritual uplift; a lack of emphasis on social justice; and a theology that some say reduced Christianity to a recipe.

"The modern Christian formula of 'I mentally assent to the fact that Jesus died for my sins and therefore I get to live forever in heaven' . . . is entirely cognitive," said Ken Archer, 33, a D.C. software entrepreneur who is studying philosophy at Catholic University. "It's a mathematical formula [that] leaves the rest of our being unfulfilled."

McLaren's 2001 book, "A New Kind of Christian," captured the dissatisfaction. "I felt like someone had read my mind," said Michael Lamson, 31, an evangelical youth pastor in Mercersburg, Pa. Three years later, in "A Generous Orthodoxy," McLaren elaborated his theological outlook, which became a major influence on the "emerging conversation."

"What Brian is contributing is excellent questions that expose the modern roots of our spiritual angst," said Archer, who has had long conversations with McLaren. "He sees the answers coming from others, and he has encouraged thousands of people, including myself, to find the answers."A Fellowship Expands

Cedar Ridge, the congregation McLaren founded, is a far cry from the religious environment in which he was raised in Rockville. His family belonged to the ultraconservative Plymouth Brethren, which also is the childhood church of activist Wallis and radio celebrity Garrison Keillor.

As someone who loved books, music and science, "I was on the way out from the Christian faith" in his mid-teens, said the balding McLaren, who wears glasses and a closely cropped grey beard.

But that changed with the Jesus Movement of the 1970s, whose anti-establishment spirit attracted him. "I've always had the sense that Jesus's message is not a chaplaincy to the establishment," he said, "but that it is countercultural."

In 1982, while he was teaching English at the University of Maryland, McLaren and his wife, Grace, started a small "fellowship group" in their College Park apartment. "We'd have prayer, I'd do a little Bible study, then we'd have dinner. It was mostly grad students," he recalled.

The group met for several years in homes and school buildings until it ended up at Eleanor Roosevelt High School in Beltsville and took the name Cedar Ridge. McLaren left teaching -- and his unfinished doctorate studies -- to be pastor. In the late 1990s, the congregation of about 250 bought a 63-acre farm in Spencerville and moved there in January 1999.

The church now has an average attendance of 600 at Sunday services, and members say a big reason for the growth was McLaren's openness to ideas that are unconventional in evangelical circles.

"I don't see the issue of homosexuality as the simple black-and-white issue that some of my fellow evangelicals make it out to be," said McLaren, who last year was named by Time magazine among the "25 most influential evangelicals in America."

And while not happy about widespread abortions, he added, "to just say 'Okay, let's pass laws about it' seems to me to skip a number of important steps, like honest and open dialogue, persuasion and seeking to remove the conditions that make abortion so prevalent."

McLaren, who never attended seminary or divinity school, said his congregants' questions made him realize that the old answers no longer worked. "I remember thinking these are a different kind of question, and I didn't have good answers," he said. "I went through a real period of doubt . . . about the form of Christianity that I'd inherited. . . . In many ways, that struggle is what gave birth to my first book."A Bigger Mission

The scent of summer grass hung in the steamy air on a recent Sunday morning as a parade of Toyota and Honda SUVs turned off Route 198 into the bucolic compound of Cedar Ridge. The onetime farm's brick silo stood in front of the new church -- built to look like a barn, complete with loft door. No religious symbols adorned the exterior.

Volunteers stood at the door greeting young families, elderly couples, singles and teenagers with studded ears. In the lobby, coffee and bagels were available. "Make yourself a nametag," invited a sign next to pens and labels.

The sanctuary is a huge open space with folding chairs circling a platform that serves as a pulpit. Behind that is an altar covered in purple cloth with a two-foot-high wooden cross. Behind that is a stage with two electric guitars, a keyboard, drums and tambourines. Two large video screens display words to contemporary hymns. The liturgy, which includes Communion, is casual but reverent.

Beverly Farmer of Silver Spring, a traffic reporter with WUSA (Channel 9), has attended Cedar Ridge for five years. "The big, metal building, the folding chairs, was not my idea of church . . . but it appealed to me," Farmer said. "I felt I was at home."

With McLaren's books drawing increased international attention, he asked to step down last year so he could travel more. Matthew Dyer took over as pastor in February.

But McLaren returned on a Sunday in July to preach on the theme of his latest book. Farmer, who was in the congregation that day, said she misses her former pastor but understands.

"Brian's mission is bigger than just Cedar Ridge," she said. "I know he has more work to do in this world."

Activist Preacher Calls For 'Good Religion' (LAT)

By K. Connie Kang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

At a conference in Pasadena, liberal Christians are urged to create a kinder, gentler way to practice their faith and politics.

Declaring that Americans have been exposed to "too much bad religion" for too long, activist preacher and author Jim Wallis on Saturday called on more than 1,000 Christians gathered in Pasadena to join him in a national movement to create a more unifying "good religion."

"Good religion pulls our best — our hunger for justice, for peace, for connection — and our lives mean something in the world," Wallis said. "Bad religion pulls our worst stuff — our fears, our divisions, our hatreds, our selfishness."

Wallis, founder of Washington, D.C.-based Sojourner, a progressive Christian magazine, and a self-described evangelical, was among prominent liberal Christian leaders who spoke at a three-day conference on "Politics and Spirituality" at Pasadena Civic Auditorium, which concludes today. Other speakers included Father Richard Rohr, a Franciscan priest who founded the Center for Action and Contemplation in Albuquerque, N.M., and Anne Lamott, best-selling author and teacher. The conference included interactive workshops on contemplative prayer, handling the news media and waging campaigns for peace and social justice.

For Christians, good religion means heeding Christ's admonition to look after the poor, said Wallis, who in 1995 founded "Call to Renewal," a national network of churches and faith-based groups that works to influence public policy on social justice issues.

Poverty, he said, is today's slavery.

Wallis, author of "God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It," believes that many Christians feel that their faith has been stolen from them by the Christian right.

He said the Christian right's preoccupation with two issues — abortion and same-sex union — misrepresents their faith.

"How did the faith of Jesus come to be known as pro-rich, pro-war, and only pro-American?" he asked. "How do we get back to a historic, biblical, and genuine evangelical faith rescued from its contemporary distortions?"

Wallis urged the attendees — many of them pastors and Christian workers from around the country — to make a "covenant" for a new America, to overcome poverty with religious commitment and political leadership.

Wallis, who has lived in a tough inner-city Washington, D.C., neighborhood for more than three decades, said liberals and conservatives have both failed the poor.

Overcoming poverty will require personal and social responsibilities, he said.

"I want to see liberals in Washington, D.C., talk about out-of-wedlock births and the need for personal responsibility and better choices," he said. "And I want conservatives to talk about strategic investments in child care, healthcare, housing and education. If that were to happen in Washington, D.C., it would be an explosion."

In his travels around the country — he has about 200 speaking engagements a year — he sees a hunger for spirituality and a hunger for social justice, especially among young people.

The challenge for Christians is to help connect the two, he said.

He believes a change is on the way.

Mary O'Brien, a human resources executive and a Roman Catholic who came to the conference with her husband, Tim, said she found Wallis' message of "transformation in our culture," uplifting.

"It's a very hopeful message," she said. "I am just praying that it will happen."

"I really believe this country has to take a new direction," said her husband, who teaches at Schuur High School in Montebello.

The Rev. Dan Smith, senior pastor of West Hollywood Presbyterian Church, called Wallis' message "very exciting."

"He is one of the best articulators of this spiritual and theological values that can be heard by both sides," Smith said.

"For those of us who live in Los Angeles and interact every day with the poor and the homeless, it becomes a personal experience. I think he is trying to personalize the issues for us."

Among The Thugs (NYT)

By Tara Mckelvey

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

Michael G. Santos hardly seems like a reliable narrator. As a middle-class kid in Seattle, he was “a mediocre student” in high school, and then, three years after graduation, he chose drug trafficking as a profession. He lived “arrogantly,” driving Porsches and wearing Cartier diamonds, and he owned an offshore race boat called the Outlaw. He was eventually charged with distributing cocaine and, in 1987, sentenced to 45 years in prison. In his book, he presents accounts of the sex, violence and drugs found behind bars. Yet he knows that a man like him — “a long-term prisoner” — is seen as “prone to prevarication or exaggeration." Few would have believed the Abu Ghraib stories if they'd come from the prisoners, he points out. It was the pictures that made them real.

Santos deserves a hearing. More than 6 percent of Americans will find themselves behind bars at some point in their lives, according to the Justice Department. Nobody knows better than he does what it's like. "Inside" is a quasi-sociological treatise, with sections on the prison economy (it features smuggling and prostitution), educational system (one library specializes in "westerns and romance novels") and labor conditions (prisoners work in a dairy, a slaughterhouse and "a rock patch," raking "parallel lines"). Marx and Maxim both make an appearance.

Mainly, though, it's a diary of "a gladiator school," "a walled city of madness." Guards act savagely — a natural outcome in a culture where "the only thing lower than an inmate is an 'inmate lover,' a 'hug-a-thug.' " They can also be infuriatingly petty. "Guards are the only people I see throwing cigarettes on the ground," one prisoner says. "They walk across lawns and then order inmates to rake up behind them." Meanwhile, prisoners stab and rape one another and make weapons out of everything from a heavy pipe to a tube sock filled with combination locks. Violence, or the threat of it, permeates Santos's life. When he runs into an old buddy, "a hard-core gang leader" named Crip Tank, he calls out a friendly greeting: "The last time I saw you, you were leaving a guy's guts hanging out of his stomach in the corridor." Santos survives among the thugs by acting as a jailhouse lawyer for Crip Tank's friend and others, and he backs up stories of brutality by citing federal cases.

His writing is stilted (he's no Jean Genet), and the narrative jumps, jarringly, from prison to prison (he's been held in at least six). With all the blood and gore, it's hard to know where we are. Also, the book hits some false notes. Santos shows only a crude understanding of female psychology. His spicy accounts of encounters between prisoners and hot women — including an educator, a business manager and a lawyer, all with their skirts hiked up — seem based more on prison-porn fantasy than on empirical evidence: "Wendy cannot help herself," he writes, unconvincingly.

Nevertheless, he lays out a strong case for prison reform. Most inmates focus on survival, not rehabilitation. And the flaws in the system seem to create a steady stream of prisoners — namely, those who are released and then end up back behind bars. Even worse, "neither those in corrections, nor those benefiting from the enormous capital disbursements — like prison towns, suppliers, contractors, etc. — want to see material changes. Why would they? Doing so would be akin to those in Las Vegas making a call for an end to gambling." Despite a breathless style, Santos provides more than just a seamy look at prison life. He also offers a chilling, timely portrayal of a place where, as one man says, all you need to survive is "a steel ball of hate and a knife."

European Union In Last-Ditch Talks With Iran On Nuclear Plans (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 9 — Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief and Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, said Saturday that they would continue last-ditch negotiations on Sunday in Vienna to see how far Iran would go to meet United Nations Security Council demand that it freeze its uranium-enrichment program or risk sanctions.

Christina Gallach, Mr. Solana's spokeswoman, told reporters that the three hours of talks on Saturday had been "positive and constructive.'' Mr. Larijani said, "We had some good and constructive talks, we made some progress in some areas, and we shall continue tomorrow."

Diplomatic pressure on Iran to halt its enrichment of uranium has increased in recent weeks. Iran says its nuclear program is designed to generate electricity, but the United States and Europe suspect the program is meant to develop nuclear weapons.

R. Nicholas Burns, the American under secretary of state for political affairs, said Friday in Berlin that the United States hoped to begin talks next week to fashion a resolution that would seek sanctions against Iran if it did not halt its enrichment of uranium.

Mr. Burns was speaking after extensive talks with the other four permanent members of the Security Council — Russia, France, China, Britain — as well as with Germany. Talks were held separately with Canada, Italy and Japan.

He said the talks with the Europeans, Russia and China would continue Monday and would focus on the possibility of drawing up a draft on sanctions before the General Assembly convened the following week.

DOJ_NMG_0060654

But Russia and China have made it clear that they will oppose sanctions, and on Saturday, the Chinese prime minister, Wen Jaibao, warned against stepping up pressure on Iran.

"To mount pressure or to take sanctions will not necessarily bring about a peaceful solution," he told a news conference in Helsinki, Finland, after a meeting with European Union officials. He added that resolving the nuclear dispute peacefully would take time.

Mr. Wen will start a two-day official visit to Germany on Wednesday, and is expected to discuss Iran with the German chancellor, Angela Merkel.

Before arriving in Vienna, Mr. Solana said he did not want United Nations sanctions to be imposed on Iran "as long as meetings with Mr. Larijani continue."

Britain, France and Germany circulated a letter to other European capitals on Thursday warning that Iran was intent on "splitting the international community" and playing for time by declining to answer in detail a package of economic and political incentives that American, European, Russian and Chinese negotiators presented it in July.

Iran Nuke Negotiators Report Progress (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Senior negotiators for Iran and the European Union reported progress Saturday at talks meant to find common ground for resolving Tehran's defiance of a U.N. demand that the Islamic republic freeze uranium enrichment or risk sanctions.

In an encouraging sign, the two sides agreed to hold further discussions Sunday.

"We had some good and constructive talks and we have made some progress in some areas, and we shall continue ... tomorrow," chief Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said, speaking through an interpreter.

Cristina Gallach, spokeswoman for Javier Solana, the EU's foreign policy chief, confirmed that more talks would be held Sunday. "The feedback from the table is that the talks have been constructive and positive," she said.

The discussions have been billed as possibly the last chance for Iran to avoid sanctions for rejecting the U.N. Security Council's demand that it suspend its uranium enrichment processes, which can be misused to make nuclear bombs.

Being held at the Austrian chancellor's office, the talks are looking for a basis to open negotiations between Iran and six world powers that have offered a package of economic and diplomatic incentives meant to persuade Tehran to limit its nuclear program.

The five permanent Security Council members — the United States, China, Britain, France and Russia — along with Germany have demanded that Iran halt enrichment as a condition for the talks, but the Iranians have steadfastly refused to do so.

With the two side seemingly so far apart, hopes for success had been slim for the mission by Solana, who is formally authorized by the six powers to carry their message and listen to the Iranians, without actually negotiating.

Still, positions appeared to have shifted slightly.

European officials who insisted on anonymity for sharing confidential information with The Associated Press suggested that at least some of the six nations were at least ready to listen if Iran committed itself to an enrichment freeze soon after the start of negotiations instead of doing so as a condition for such talks.

The officials declined to provide details. But such a readiness would deal a blow to U.S.-led attempts to hold fast to the demand that Iran freeze enrichment before any talks commence — or face the prospect of Security Council sanctions.

One of the officials said Solana discussed the issue with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice before going into the meeting but declined to offer details.

As late as Friday, U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Washington expected the Security Council to start discussing a draft on sanctions as early as next week unless Tehran reversed course and agreed to freeze enrichment.

But there might be opposition to that within the council. Russia and China have resisted a quick move to sanctions even while agreeing to them as the ultimate punishment.

And French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy on Thursday appeared to suggest the demand on freezing enrichment first and talking later was negotiable. "The question is to know at what moment this suspension takes place compared to negotiations," he said.

He later appeared to reverse himself, saying in separate comments that suspension "is an absolute prerequisite for restoring trust and resuming negotiations."

A European diplomat told AP the mixed signals seemed to reflect that a sizable number of countries within the 24-member EU oppose a quick move to sanctions — even though Britain, France and Germany formally represent the bloc within the six-nation negotiating group.

China, meanwhile, repeated on Saturday its stance that patience was needed in dealing with Iran.

During a meeting with EU leaders in Finland, Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao urged Tehran "to make constructive steps" toward ending the standoff, but added: "Our purpose is that the nuclear issue of Iran will be settled peacefully."

Burns had dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-power coalition on when Iran should commit to enrichment Friday, a day after those six countries ended confidential discussions on Iran in Berlin.

Outlining the U.S. view of the timetable on Iran, Burns said the six nations would consult further by phone Monday and hoped to present a unified approach on sanctions to their foreign ministers by the time the U.N. General Assembly opens Tuesday.

"The American view is that following these discussions on Monday and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution" on sanctions, he said.

Iran says it wants to develop an enrichment program to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that generate electricity. But there are growing concerns it seeks enrichment technology to make weapons-grade uranium for the core of warheads.

The six powers agreed on a package of economic and political rewards in June to be offered to Tehran, but only if it stops enrichment before the start of negotiations aimed at a long-term enrichment moratorium.

But the international alliance also warned of punishments, including U.N. sanctions, if Tehran did not halt enrichment — something Iran refused to do by the Aug. 31 deadline set by the Security Council.

Associated Press writer Robert Wielaard in Helsinki, Finland, contributed to this report.

Iran, EU Negotiators Make Progress In Nuke Talks (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria -- Senior negotiators for Iran and the European Union reported progress yesterday at talks meant to find common ground for resolving Tehran's defiance of a U.N. demand that the Islamic republic freeze uranium enrichment or risk sanctions.

Video Of Iranian Missile Test Is Fake, Pentagon Says (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. military intelligence has determined that a video released by the Iranian government purporting to show a test of a new submarine missile is bogus, three Pentagon officials confirmed.

The Iranians released the video Aug. 27, one of a series of steps the Tehran government has taken in recent months to display its military potency in the midst of a confrontation with the United States and other Western nations over its nuclear ambitions.

The test apparently was designed to intimidate Iran's neighbors in the Persian Gulf, including Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which are U.S. allies and important oil-producing countries, regional experts said. The video showed what appeared to be a successful test of a submarine-fired missile that flies above the water's surface to attack ships.

But U.S. intelligence officers analyzed the plume of smoke from the missile and determined it matched a video of an earlier Chinese test.

"It's the identical launch," a Pentagon official said. "The plume, everything, is the same."

U.S. officials have been unable to confirm whether any test took place during the Iranian exercise. They say they are certain, however, that the video of the purported test is not of an Iranian sub in the Persian Gulf.

U.S. intelligence agencies have been closely tracking developments in Iran in an attempt to monitor Tehran's efforts to build up its nuclear capabilities as well as its conventional military capacity. The surveillance efforts are part of what experts see as a strategic contest of increasing complexity, with the two nations working to decipher each other's motivations and intentions.

The purported missile test was announced by Iran's official news agency a day before the video was released and just before an Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations for Iran to halt its uranium enrichment.

The Bush administration is pushing for U.N. sanctions against the country unless it stops enriching uranium. Although Iran, an oil-rich country, says it is solely pursuing civilian power, the U.S. and other countries believe Tehran is intent on building nuclear weapons.

The test video was broadcast on Iranian state television and picked up around the world, including by CNN and Fox News.

What has American military officers scratching their heads is why the Iranians would see the need to release a phony video.

"They have enough things they can do to frighten people, I don't know why they would have to fake something," a senior defense official said. "They are frightening enough as it is without faking things."

Iran said it was conducting the test as part of a summer war games exercise in the Persian Gulf that began Aug. 19. U.S. military officials believe such exercises are aimed primarily at intimidating gulf countries.

"It is like when the missiles went through Red Square in front of the Politburo," a military official said. "Their MO is to put on a media blitz."

The officials asked that their names not be used because the Defense Department had decided not to publicize the discovery. Taking on the role of superpower tattletale could exacerbate already tense relations, or provoke more, real tests.

The missile was named Sagheb, meaning "penetrating" or "piercing." After the alleged test, Adm. Sajjad Kouchaki, the top Iranian naval commander, said on Iranian television that the weapon was a long-range missile that could be fired from a variety of ships and evade radar.

"It is smart," Kouchaki said, according to a BBC transcript. "It has a very high degree of precision, taking the enemy by surprise. The missile has a massive destructive power."

Pentagon officials said Iran had several Russian Kilo-class submarines, the kind shown in the Chinese video. Iran's growing naval capability is real, said the senior official, which is what made the use of fake video seem particularly "clumsy."

"They do have a serious military capability," the official said. "They are a growing military problem."

Wayne White, the former deputy director of the State Department's Middle East intelligence office, called the news of the deception "a scream."

"I was looking at what they were showing" on the video, White said. "And it was not the kind of thing that would intimidate a military of the capabilities of the United States."

White argued that Iran wanted to intimidate Saudi Arabia and other gulf countries, saying that if the U.S. tried to destroy Iran's ability to create nuclear weapons, oil tankers in the gulf would be a likely target of an initial Iranian counterattack. And Iran may hope that the threat it poses to U.S. allies in the region is its best chance at pressuring Washington not to attack.

The video, White said, "is aimed at intimidating the Saudis and the gulf states, to get them to press Washington not to exercise the military option."

But he said that Iran's recent tactics seem to be self-defeating, only working to increase the perception in Europe that the country is becoming an ever greater world threat.

And so why highlight a video, so easily determined to be fake?

"They may not have believed that the inauthenticity would be so easily detected," said John Calabrese, a scholar at the Middle East Institute. "It's an attention-grabber. But it's bizarre."

The Roots Of Hezbollah's Clout Lie In Iran (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

The ties between the militant group and Tehran are complex and go back decades. For many in Lebanon, it's a beneficial partnership.

BAALBEK, Lebanon — Charities modeled after Iranian organizations provide healthcare to the poor. Religious schools funded with help from an Iranian bank educate thousands of children. Islamic foundations with ties to Iran make loans to home buyers.

And when a "martyr" falls in battle, posters reminiscent of the ones studding Tehran rise up in the scenery of south Beirut, southern Lebanon and here in the Bekaa Valley. They even appear to have been drawn by the same artist.

A tour of Hezbollah's state within a state in southern Lebanon reveals a replica of the distinctive institutions and styles of the Islamic Republic's ideological machinery, and offers clues to the militant group's powerful hold here.

Iran's relationship with Lebanon's Shiites is a complex web stretching back decades and spanning nearly all facets of religious, economic and social life — ties that have grown stronger since hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad came to power last year.

"The Americans and Israelis are convinced that they're fighting a terrorist organization and they'll bomb it and the people will turn against it, like you're making a coup d'etat," said a critic of Hezbollah, who asked that his name not be printed for fear of retribution. "But the Iranians have knitted a carpet. You have to have patience to unravel it."

Lebanon and Iran have had strong religious and commercial ties for centuries.

The charismatic Imam Musa Sadr came to Lebanon from Iran in the 1960s to help the then-disenfranchised Shiite plurality, financing a series of schools throughout the country. After the 1979 Iranian revolution led by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, those ties were strengthened by blood as Iran dispatched hundreds of Revolutionary Guard troops to the Bekaa Valley to help organize Shiite militants and direct their guns toward invading Israeli forces.

In return, Lebanese guerrillas trained Iranian soldiers, accustomed to American equipment, to use Russian-made weaponry during Iran's 1980s war against Sunni-dominated Iraq, said Hassan Hosseini, a Beirut researcher writing a book on relations between Iran and Lebanon.

The Islamic Republic opened its purse to Hezbollah with the group's inception in 1982, in part because the militants provided direct access to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Iran's new rulers were ideologically committed to opposing Israel and eager to prove themselves as the true champions of the Islamic nation.

Almost immediately as well, Iranians began exporting versions of their unique institutions. Jihad al Bina, which is handing out cash to homeless Shiites, was launched in 1984, an offshoot of the similarly named organization in Iran. The Imam Khomeini Foundation began operations in 1987.

Overt Iranian funding comes through Bank Saderat, a state-owned import-export bank that arrived in Lebanon in the early 1960s and expanded its presence there during the 1990s, opening branches in the Bekaa Valley and the south.

The bank was used as a tool to further Iran's foreign policy goals in Lebanon, disbursing funds for charities, social services and several networks of schools, said a former financial services industry professional and scholar who has studied Saderat's operations.

"It became a receptacle of all the goodwill activity of all the organizations that are linked to Iran," he said. "They funnel through the bank."

On Friday, the Treasury Department announced it was barring Saderat from doing business with the U.S. The bank allegedly has given one Hezbollah-controlled organization $50 million since 2001, the department said in a statement.

"Bank Saderat facilitates Iran's transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to Hezbollah and other terrorist organizations each year," said Stuart Levey, the department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence. "We will no longer allow a bank like Saderat to do business in the American financial system, even indirectly."

Indeed, Saderat practices none of the traditional banking activities in Lebanon: There are no ATMs or gifts for opening savings accounts. Its assets totaled a modest $101 million in 2004. Yet at times its receipts have careened off the map, the former industry professional said.

Lebanon is awash in cash. Although the country of 4 million has an annual trade deficit of $6 billion to $7 billion a year, it almost always ends up with a positive balance of payments, meaning more than $7 billion in cash enters the country annually, said Kamal Hamdan, a Lebanese economist.

"Nothing is really traceable," he said. "You have remittances. You have tourism. You have transfers from nonofficial sources and direct private investment."

Even after Lebanon implemented strict money-laundering laws in 2001, funds kept flowing to Hezbollah. In a 2004 study, one secular Shiite political party estimated that Hezbollah had an annual budget of $600 million to $700 million and was providing jobs to 37,000 people.

"Hezbollah is not a volunteer thing," said Ahmed Asaad, leader of Competence, a small political party with roots in Lebanon's south. "Even from day one they had a payroll system."

Iran's election of reformist President Mohammad Khatami in 1997 spurred a dramatic change in relations with Hezbollah, as the moderate cleric tried to cut off covert ties with the group or rein it in. Although Hezbollah's relations with the state faltered, it maintained strong contacts with the Iranian clerical establishment in Qom and with figures in the country's security apparatus, several experts said.

During the 1990s, Hezbollah allegedly continued to receive weapons from Iran across the Lebanese-Syrian border, including sophisticated medium-range rockets.

Hezbollah officials scoff at the suggestion that Iran supplies them with arms, saying they have built up such an economic base among Lebanese at home and abroad that they don't need Iranian largesse to equip themselves.

"It's very easy to buy arms when you have the money to get arms," said Nawar Sahili, a member of Hezbollah's 14-member parliamentary bloc.

Under Ahmadinejad's presidency, Tehran's official players and its shadow government of hard-line clerics have become one, and the rhetorical support for Hezbollah has increased.

Ahmadinejad and his inner circle include hard-core ideologues who hope to reinvigorate the Islamic Republic's revolutionary goals.

"This man means business," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a professor at the Lebanese American University who has studied Hezbollah for more than a decade. "His rhetoric means open support for Hezbollah and Hamas against Israel."

Even as Israeli warplanes wreaked havoc on Lebanese housing and infrastructure, Iranian officials promised a quick reconstruction. Jaws dropped as Hezbollah officials, acting through Jihad al Bina, began handing out wads of crisp $100 bills to homeless families, reportedly to the tune of $180 million.

"You want to tell me Lebanese investors are paying for that?" said Asaad, the Competence party leader. "This is Iranian money."

Although some argue that Lebanese Shiites have no cultural affinity with their Persian coreligionists, the money, schools, charities and attention have paid off in loyalty to Iran.

"I feel closer to Iran than to other Lebanese," said Tarek Adad, a 36-year-old iron importer and a Hezbollah supporter in the Bekaa Valley. "This is natural, because the Shiites in Iran would never betray us. The others in Lebanon have all betrayed us."

Lebanon Left To Face Most Basic Of Issues (WP)

By Edward Cody, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

War Exposes Deep Conflicts About the Nation's Identity and Its Future

BIKFAYA, Lebanon -- From the terrace of former president Amin al-Gemayel's ancestral mansion, Lebanon appeared so beautiful that it seemed it should go on forever. Traditional houses of ocher stone huddled far below in close-knit villages, and churches with tiny domes stood sentinel along the twisting roads. In the distance, the Mediterranean gleamed under a warm Middle Eastern sun.

But the recent 33-day war between Israel and Hezbollah has raised fundamental questions about Lebanon's future and its identity, straining the political institutions on which the country was built, perhaps to the breaking point. In Bikfaya, Gemayel's tranquil little town in the hills behind Beirut, and across the rest of Lebanon, people have begun to think that their country and its historic melding of Christians with Muslims may not prevail after all.

"Lebanon is at a crossroads," said Gemayel, who was president during wars from 1982 to 1988. "Either we draw the lessons from the war and build a Lebanon that is genuinely democratic and liberal, and an example of intercommunal coexistence, or we are headed for the disintegration of Lebanon."

In their own ways, Israel and the Bush administration have grappled with the same problem in Lebanon. In parallel policies, they have insisted that Hezbollah disarm and fully join in the Lebanese political process. But because Lebanon's political institutions do not reflect Hezbollah's wider support in the population, the militant Shiite Muslim movement has made it clear that greater changes will be needed before it lays down its arms.

The Gemayel family, Maronite Christians, had a lot to do with the creation of Lebanon's old landscape, a place where Christians and Muslims coexisted and business flourished while the tax man looked the other way. Amin al-Gemayel's father, Pierre, was a pharmacist who became a leader of the independence movement. His elder brother, Bashir, was president briefly in 1982 before being assassinated at the behest of the Syrian government.

The Lebanon most foreigners think of -- tolerant, easy-living, Western-oriented -- bore the imprint of Maronite families such as the Gemayels, and not by accident. France, the mandate power here until just after World War II, originally carved Lebanon off from Syria to provide a place for the Maronites in the predominantly Muslim Middle East. They made it into a "hinge country," linking East and West.

To rule the new country and preserve its unusual personality, France left behind a system under which the president and the army commander must be Maronites, giving decisive power to what was then the major community. The prime minister was to be Sunni Muslim and the speaker of parliament a Shiite.

Lebanon's demography has changed drastically since then. No official census has been taken, a reflection of how delicate the issue is here. But academics said that over the past two decades, Shiites have become a plurality -- estimates range from 32 percent to 45 percent of the population -- and Maronites a minority of less than a quarter. With Sunni Muslims and other sects counted, the overall balance has changed to more than 60 percent Muslim.

Hezbollah's emergence as a political party and armed militia was in large measure a response to that shift. In effect, the organization stepped in to represent Shiites because many of them felt the government did not, particularly in the southern hills along the border with Israel.

"We are not a replacement for the state," Hasan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, said in a recent televised interview. "But where the state is absent, we have to take up the slack."

The war with Israel further dramatized the gap between Lebanon's institutions and its new political demography. Communal strains had been swept under the rug for years under the leadership of Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri, who was assassinated in 2005. But in the crucible of a destructive, bloody war, those strains suddenly seemed glaring.

Lebanon's official, Maronite-led army sat out the conflict, for instance, while Hezbollah's militia, which was better armed, did the fighting and dying. President Emile Lahoud, the other Maronite pillar of power, was also on the sidelines because of his association with Syria, an ally of Hezbollah.

As a result, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a Sunni economist, spoke in the name of Lebanon and received foreign visitors such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice for negotiations about the war. But he had to check with Nasrallah regarding important decisions, because Hezbollah was the seat of Lebanon's real power of war or peace.

"What institutions do we have?" asked Social Affairs Minister Nayla Moawad, a Maronite and the widow of assassinated president RenÃ© Moawad. "We have inherited a non-administration. The Lebanese government is like this box," she said, holding up a silver coffee-table decoration. "There is nothing in it. It is empty."

Moawad and other Christians, along with Sunni Muslims, have stressed that the right response is strengthening the Lebanese government. Hezbollah must recognize that only the state can have the power of arms, they said, and it must turn away from Iranian-style theocracy to become part of the relaxed mix that has made Lebanon so attractive over the years to investors and Arab vacationers.

"It is up to Hezbollah to make this decision," Gemayel said. "Unfortunately, Lebanon is hanging on the choice."

Although the country's Sunni establishment fought the Maronites in the 1950s and again in the 1970s in the heyday of Arab nationalism, it has recoiled at Hezbollah's politically charged brand of Islam and its ties with Iran. In the debate over Lebanon's identity, conducted before the war in a round of meetings called the National Dialogue, most Sunnis opted for alliance with the Maronites and endorsed their demand for Hezbollah's disarmament.

"Nasrallah has been lying to us all along," sneered a Sunni minister in describing Hezbollah's participation in the National Dialogue.

Nasrallah has gone out of his way to reassure fellow Lebanese that Hezbollah has no intention of remaking Lebanon to look like Iran. In his recent interview, he pledged loyalty to the Lebanese tradition of religious and social tolerance.

"Lebanon is a pluralistic country," he declared. "It is not an Islamic country. It is not a Maronite country. It is not an Orthodox country. It is not a Shiite country. It is a country of consensus. You have nothing to fear from anybody from Hezbollah."

But Nasrallah's pledge was not well received by many Sunnis and Maronites. Hezbollah only weeks ago went to war without consulting the government, they noted, and moved as soon as the cease-fire took effect to help refugees without reference to government agencies charged with the same task.

Perhaps more important, they noted, was Nasrallah's postwar assertion that Hezbollah must be taken into account in government deliberations from here on out. The party ran for office in the last elections, gaining seats in parliament and two ministers in Siniora's cabinet. But Nasrallah seemed to be saying his group will be seeking more power now that, in his words, it has fought a war on Lebanon's behalf.

A share of power that reflects the Shiites' true place in the population would probably change Lebanon's orientation significantly, the Sunni and Maronite observers predicted. But a refusal to acknowledge the demographic change and Hezbollah's enhanced status after the war, they said, would be a recipe for more intercommunal conflict. As a result, the timeless view from Gemayel's terrace may be in for a change.

"I don't see Lebanon surviving as it is today," said Dori Chamoun, leader of the Maronite-based National Liberal party and son of a former president and longtime political figure, the late Camille Chamoun. "It is inevitable that the Christians will have a smaller share of the country. I only see one solution, cantonization. Everybody wants it. Nobody says it out loud."

In a recent book, Gemayel proposed abandoning Lebanon's current system and replacing it with election of the president by popular vote and decentralization along the geographical lines that largely define where Muslims and Christians live in any case. "The institutions of Lebanon are tired," he said. "They are drained of their blood."

The losers in such a change would largely be Sunni Muslims, Chamoun pointed out, because by and large they have not carved out sections of the country as theirs. Public Works Minister Mohamad Safadi, a Sunni who lives in Beirut, said he was discussing the problem with his wife recently and reassured her that, if worse comes to worst, they could always live in their weekend house -- in the quintessentially Christian port of Byblos.

Italy Says Syria OKs EU Border Personnel (AP)

By Zeina Karam, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Italy's prime minister said Saturday that Syrian President Bashar Assad has agreed to the deployment of European Union personnel along Lebanon's border with Syria.

Syria's official news agency denied news reports that the EU personnel under discussion would be border guards.

"The reports by some news agencies that Syria has accepted that European border guards monitor the Lebanese-Syrian borders are not true," the official Syrian Arab News Agency reported.

The positioning of European Union guards could help allay Israel's concerns about the smuggling of weapons from Syrian to Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon, which the U.N. Security Council has demanded be stopped under the nearly month-old cease-fire it brokered to end the war in southern Lebanon.

Syria and Iran are Hezbollah's main backers, and Western and Israeli officials repeatedly have said the guerrillas receive arms from the two countries, often in land convoys from Syria.

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi issued a statement Saturday saying he had spoken with Assad several times over the last few days and he has agreed "in principle" to an EU presence on the border between Lebanon and Syria.

"I reminded President Assad that the European Union has significant experience in training programs for frontier guards, and that the idea of an EU mission of assistance on the border between Syria and Lebanon would be an excellent signal of cooperation between Syria and Europe," Prodi's statement said. "President Assad gave me his accord in principle."

Prodi's statement also said "we believe that a significant quantity of arms pass through this border ... toward southern Lebanon."

The Italian news agency ANSA quoted Prodi as saying Syria had agreed to European border guards in plainclothes and without weapons to prevent arms shipments to the Hezbollah. Prodi's office earlier on Saturday confirmed the ANSA report was accurate.

But after Syria issued its denial, Prodi's spokesman Silvio Sircana clarified the prime minister's earlier statements. He said Syria's denial was accurate and quoted Prodi as saying Syria had agreed to "EU personnel." He denied Prodi had referred to them as border guards.

"I confirm that Prodi and Assad did not discuss troops or guards, but only EU personnel without uniforms or arms that will be at the disposal of the Syrian forces," Sircana told the Associated Press.

The Syrian news agency did not say whether the president had agreed to any other type of European presence on their border. It said that as part of continued consultations between Syria and Italy, Assad and Prodi spoke by telephone Saturday night during which "the talks were on technical assistance, including training, that is expected to be offered to Syrian border guards."

Until now, Syria has vehemently rejected the deploying of armed U.N. peacekeepers on the Lebanese side of the border. Assad has said he would consider such a deployment a hostile move toward his country.

In a meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in Damascus earlier this month, Assad promised to increase Syrian patrols on the border and work with Lebanese troops to enforce the arms embargo.

Prodi said Saturday that Assad told him Syria would send 500 border guards, but did not say when. The Lebanese military said Saturday there had been no changes on the Syrian side of the border.

The U.N. resolution that halted 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah on Aug. 14 laid out a delicate and complicated process for keeping the peace — but so far its provisions are slowly coming together.

Israel lifted its air and sea blockades of Lebanon this week, and Israeli troops are pulling out of the south as the Lebanese army moves in.

Some 3,250 U.N. peacekeepers have fanned out across the south as well, part of a force planned to reach 15,000. A naval force is patrolling off shore, and international officials will operate at Lebanon's seaports and airport to help Lebanese officials watch for arms smuggling.

The next test will be how the U.N. peacekeepers deal with Hezbollah as they enforce a buffer zone in southern Lebanon where the guerrillas' weapons are banned.

Another major issue remains sensitive and untouched: Hezbollah's disarmament.

The U.N. force, known as UNIFIL, does not plan to seek out hidden Hezbollah arsenals, only to deal with any weapons its troops might encounter.

"We're mandated to make sure there are no forces outside the Lebanese army and UNIFIL in south Lebanon. But I'm not a fortuneteller and we haven't been in such situations yet," UNIFIL spokesman Alexander Ivanko said.

He repeated Annan's position that "disarming Hezbollah is something for the Lebanese army."

Some 200 French soldiers landed in Beirut on Saturday to join the U.N. force, the largest French deployment so far out of 2,000 troops it has promised. The amphibious ship La Foudre delivered some 100 military vehicles and weaponry as well.

Also Saturday, Pakistan's Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz said his government would send hundreds of army engineers under the U.N. umbrella to Lebanon to help clear land mines.

The United Nations said, however, that Pakistan's participation was not a done deal, alluding to Israel's objection to UNIFIL troops coming from countries that have no diplomatic relations with the Jewish state.

Hezbollah, meanwhile, criticized the Lebanese government's decision to allow foreign ships to monitor the coast, saying that put the country under foreign sway.

Israeli Says Fatah Leader Could Help Free Soldier (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 9 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Saturday night that he was prepared to meet the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, even without the release of the Israeli soldier captured by militants in Gaza.

Mr. Olmert, after meeting with the British prime minister, Tony Blair, said that "I intend to meet Chairman Abbas" in the near future.

"I have no conditions or prerequisites for such a meeting," Mr. Olmert said, in an apparent policy shift. He added, "It may be even be helpful with regard to Gilad Shalit," referring to the Israeli corporal who was captured June 25.

In that episode, Palestinian militants, including members of Hamas, which runs the Palestinian Authority, entered Israel from Gaza through a tunnel. They also killed two soldiers.

Three days later, Israeli forces re-entered Gaza to try to force Corporal Shalit's release and weaken the Hamas government. But the Hamas political bureau leader, Khaled Meshal, in Damascus, has insisted that the corporal will only be released in a prisoner exchange.

Mr. Meshal has reportedly rejected an Egyptian proposal that the corporal be handed over to Egypt, and that hundreds of Palestinian prisoners would be released later, after Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas meet.

Faced with that stalemate, and under much criticism for Israel's recent war in Lebanon — prompted by Hezbollah's capture of two Israeli soldiers — Mr. Olmert has apparently decided to play on the obvious rift between the Hamas government and Mr. Abbas, who is known as Abu Mazen and is the elected president from Fatah.

After all, Mr. Olmert said, "I know very well that Gilad Shalit is not being held by Abu Mazen and I'm sure he would like to see his release."

But he also emphasized that there could be no political progress with the Palestinians until the corporal is free, and then only along the path of the so-called road map for peace. But with his plan to pull thousands more settlers out of the West Bank put aside for now, he is clearly trying to find an agenda in dealing with the Palestinians, as his allies are urging him to do.

The meeting with Mr. Blair drew together two war-damaged prime ministers — Mr. Olmert for the 34 days of military strikes against Hezbollah in Lebanon, and Mr. Blair for his strong support of the Bush administration's positions in Iraq and Israel.

Mr. Blair deflected questions from the British press about his political future and his reaction to criticism of his heir apparent, Gordon Brown. The prime minister said it was "kind of disrespectful" to discuss such internal matters in Israel.

He also gave a ringing defense of his support of the United States and Israel in the war against terrorism, saying, "We face a global threat." Problems in the Middle East have a direct impact on Britain, he said, adding: "I will continue to stand up for an alliance of people who believe in peace and tolerance and democracy against those who believe in terrorism. There is no bigger and more important struggle in the world today."

Mr. Olmert said Mr. Blair was a loyal but critical friend, always pressing humanitarian concerns about the Palestinians and the need to negotiate a two-state solution with them. Mr. Blair has been criticized at home for his support for the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq and for support of Israel in the war in Lebanon.

But Mr. Blair, who pressed for a robust international force in Lebanon, said the United Nations resolution that ended the fighting could be "a major strategic advance for peace in the region."

Israeli PM To Meet Palestinian President (AP)

AP, September 10, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Saturday he would meet Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and work closely with him to advance peace efforts.

Olmert, who spoke after meeting with visiting British Prime Minister Tony Blair, did not say when he would meet Abbas.

Olmert said the meet was not conditional on the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier being held captive by militants with links to the ruling Hamas party. But Olmert said no progress would be made in the peace process until the soldier is released, indicating talks with Abbas could help gain Shalit's freedom.

"I assured Prime Minister Blair that I am ready to work closely with ... Mahmoud Abbas," Olmert said at a joint news conference with his British counterpart. "I also told Prime Minister Blair that I intend to meet with him (Abbas.)" Olmert has not met with Abbas since June.

Shalit was captured on June 25 by militants in Gaza who carried out a cross-border on a military outpost in southern Israel.

Long-stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace talks hit a new obstacle in January when the Islamic Hamas group swept a Palestinian parliamentary election.

Blair expressed support for a renewal of Israeli dialogue with Abbas despite Hamas' control of the Palestinian parliament and government. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel or renounce violence.

"It's very important that we see what we can do to re-energize this process," said Blair.

Blair this week gave in to a fierce rebellion in his Labour Party, reluctantly announcing he would resign within a year. He brushed aside suggestions that his Mideast visit was an effort to distract attention from those woes.

"People can be as cynical as they like, but I've been passionate about this issue (Mideast peace) ... for many years and I'm not going to stop trying on it," he said.

Blair's handling of last month's fighting between Israel and Hezbollah militants in Lebanon is a major cause of his political troubles. Many in his party were infuriated by his refusal to break ranks with President Bush and call for a swift end to the fighting, interpreting that stance as a tacit backing of Israel's offensive.

Blair defended his position.

"We worked very hard to get the only cease-fire that was ever going to be sustainable, and that was one based on the political framework set out in (U.N.) Resolution 1701," he said.

He has also alienated many in the Palestinian territories, where a group of prominent intellectuals published a statement Thursday saying he would not be welcome in the West Bank.

He plans to meet Abbas there Sunday.

He will not see Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas or other members of his administration.

Haniyeh blasted Blair in a column published Saturday in the London-based Guardian newspaper, accusing him of having "one-sided" policies that hurt the Palestinians.

"At the heart of our region's problems is the Israeli occupation, which has brought about endless suffering and disasters. If you wish to do the right thing, Mr. Blair, then work for the end of occupation without further delay," Haniyeh wrote.

Thousands In Tel Aviv Demand War Inquiry (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

About 30,000 Israelis demonstrated in Tel Aviv to demand that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert order an independent state inquiry into his government's handling of the war in Lebanon.

It was the largest public show of dissatisfaction with Olmert since he took office in May. Polls show his popularity has tumbled amid public frustration with Israel's failure to crush Hezbollah guerrillas. Olmert has pledged only a government inquiry on the war.

Russia And The Mideast: Talk, No Walk (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

MOSCOW

IS Russia the new powerbroker — even peacemaker — of the Middle East? It certainly aspires to be.

On issue after issue this year, Vladimir V. Putin's Kremlin has thrust itself back into the thicket of Middle Eastern diplomacy, most recently, to urge caution and more talks with Iran over its nuclear ambitions. In this, it has been reasserting a Russian role that was largely abandoned when the Soviet Union collapsed.

But one thing is lacking so far: results.

In March, after Hamas won control of the Palestinian Legislature, Mr. Putin invited the new leaders to Moscow even as the United States, Europe and Israel tried to isolate them. He insisted that holding talks with the movement would nudge its leaders to the bargaining table. "I don't think Hamas would have any serious future if Hamas doesn't change," Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov said at the time.

On Thursday, Mr. Lavrov was still repeating the theme, saying that Hamas, now joined by Hezbollah, needed to renounce terrorism and recognize Israel's right to exist. Neither group has.

Mr. Lavrov included Hezbollah while he was in Beirut on a Mideast tour after the recent Israel-Hezbollah fighting was halted by an indefinite cease-fire. The truce was arranged largely as a result of efforts by the United States and France, and in the face of a Russian counterproposal for a 72-hour cease-fire, which Hezbollah and Syria would have preferred.

Now Russia is promising Lebanon support for reconstruction, but so far it has offered only $1.75 million. Its Defense Ministry has also balked at sending peacekeepers to join a new United Nations force, although officials have said they might send military engineers to help rebuild bridges.

To supplant the United States or Europe as a real broker in the region, experts say, Russia will have to do more. "Even the Germans, with all their history, are sending soldiers," one Middle Eastern diplomat said in an interview in Moscow.

Other Russian diplomatic efforts have sputtered as well. Mr. Putin, who last year became the first Russian president to visit Israel, has hinted that Russia has been reaching out through unspecified channels to free the two Israeli soldiers whose capture in July set off Israel's incursion into Lebanon. "I have reason to believe that our efforts are not in vain," Mr. Putin said.

That was a month and a half ago. The soldiers remain captives.

At the same time, Mr. Putin's tactics have frequently put Russia at odds with the United States and Israel. "We're not playing games here," the American ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, responded bitingly to Russia's cease-fire proposal.

So what exactly is Russia after? Most of all, it is a quest for prestige. And a suggestion of the strategy was contained in Mr. Putin's comment to the Group of 8 summit meeting in St. Petersburg in July. "We will not participate in any crusades, in any holy alliances," he said. Emboldened by an economic boom and seeing an opening caused by Muslim anger at America, the Kremlin seems to be using the Middle East as a forum to reach with new confidence for an independent global role. Vladimir Y. Satanovsky, the president of the Institute for Near Eastern Studies, a private research group in Moscow, put it simply: "The period of collapse is over."

Russia's deep interest in the region is also driven by economics — including arm deals with Syria, Iran and Algeria — and by hope that good relations with the Muslim world may cool any support for Russia's own Islamic insurgencies in and around Chechnya.

"The Middle East is one of their historic bastions of influence," said Clifford Kupchan of the Eurasia Group, a Washington consulting firm. "I think they see their old contacts and their history there as an opening for a resurgent Russia to return to the world stage."

That does not necessarily mean a new zero-sum confrontation with America, though almost certainly some of those advising Mr. Putin would welcome it. In fact, there are signs that the Bush administration has resigned itself to Russia's new role, at least to a point.

That is certainly the case with Iran. President Bush has welcomed Mr. Putin's proposals for a compromise in which Iranian nuclear materials would be processed in Russia, and his willingness to warn Iran of the consequences of failing to agree to U.N. demands that it halt uranium enrichment — even if the Russians now appear unwilling to take that next step.

"It's important to give Russia credit for how constructive they have been," Mr. Kupchan said.

Many here say that Russia, which has more than 20 million Muslims, has a special affinity with the Islamic world that can make Russia a mediator between it and the West. Just two weeks ago, in Kazan, the capital of the Russian republic of Tatarstan, Russian officials met with leaders of Islamic countries as part of a newly created body called the Strategic Vision Group.

"In the Islamic world, Russia is viewed as a friendly power," Veniamin V. Popov, a Russian diplomat, told Izvestia, "and our participation is a guarantee to Muslims that negotiations will produce reasonable results."

In that, the Kremlin faces some wariness. Its willingness to negotiate with Hamas and Hezbollah stands in contrast to Mr. Putin's refusal to talk with the Chechens he considers terrorists. Russia's eagerness to sell arms in the region has also revived old suspicions.

Mr. Satanovsky said that in the end what Russia feared most was instability in the region, especially if another war like the current one in Iraq spread unrest and violence much closer to Russia's border.

"The strategy is 'we don't need enemies,' " he said. "The distance between Iran and Russia is nearly the same as between Cuba and the United States."

Where Big Is Always Better (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

MOSCOW

ONCE Russia wanted the biggest dams in the world. Now it wants the biggest corporations.

Next month, if the deal goes through as expected, Russia will have the world's largest aluminum company, a step that is part of President Vladimir V. Putin's effort to create giant enterprises as a way of reviving Russia's strategic industries.

Some Russians, recalling the Soviet boasts of having the biggest rockets, the biggest steel mills, the biggest ice-breakers, were cynical. "We had a joke in the 1980's that our microchips were the biggest in the world," said Aleksei Venediktov, the editor in chief of Echo of Moscow Radio. "It's that mentality of greatness, in the sense of size, even if it doesn't make sense."

But Russian leaders say that the creation of giant enterprises makes perfect sense in a world that has seen consolidation in natural resources industries, which make up a huge portion of the country's economy.

Last month, Russian Aluminum, or Rusal for short, announced plans to merge with a smaller domestic competitor while also swallowing the mines and factories belonging to Switzerland-based Glencore, a commodity trader. The deal would create a company that would pour more aluminum than the Aluminum Company of America — roughly 4 million tons a year, compared with Alcoa's 2005 output of 3.55 million tons.

While Rusal's executives insist that size itself is not the goal, this is only one of several large-scale projects undertaken recently in industries like oil, natural gas, minerals and aerospace. The most striking example is Gazprom, which has become the second-largest publicly traded energy company in the world, after Exxon Mobil of the United States.

In the steel industry, a Russian tycoon proposed last spring to merge with the Luxembourg-based Arcelor, the world's largest steel company by volume of sales. The deal ultimately unraveled, but it suggested the sweep of Russian ambition these days, in which market capitalization is the new yardstick for comparison with the West.

Stephen Kotkin, a professor of Russian history at Princeton University and author of "Magnetic Mountain," about the archetypal Soviet steelworks at Magnitogorsk, says that ultimately Russia's new giants "will either be competitive companies or they will fail."

"That is not Soviet," he wrote in an e-mail message.

Mr. Putin, who published a doctoral dissertation in the 1990's on the role of large, state-supported companies in reviving the economy of Western Europe after World War II, says he is aware of the new climate. "This result didn't happen by itself, but as a result of focused actions of the government," he said at a news conference.

The Kremlin is clearly hoping to sell the new gigantism not just as a business strategy, but as a balm for the wounded pride of Russians who endured the economic disasters of the 1990's.

Mr. Venediktov of Echo of Moscow radio explained it this way: "We need to say we are the greatest somewhere, in something. Russia is suffering post-imperial syndrome, like England in the 40's or France in the 50's. But ah-hah! We are still the best someplace. We win more gold medals in gymnastics. And now in this: We passed America in aluminum."

Critics say these bulging new corporations trace their origins to patronage within the Kremlin's factions. Members of their boards tend to be allies of Mr. Putin. Dmitry A. Medvedev, for example, is simultaneously deputy prime minister and chairman of the board of Gazprom.

Mr. Medvedev and others cite arguments that internal competition would only lower export profits in natural resources, depriving Russia of its maximum income. Yaroslav D. Lissovolik, chief economist at Deutsche UFG, estimates that 30 percent of the Russian economy is now controlled by monopolies, both private and state-owned. Official statistics, Mr. Lissovolik said, have become suspect since an anti-monopoly committee was found to be taking bribes from companies to avoid classification as a monopoly.

"I do not see competition policy as being very important to the Russian government right now," he said. "Gigantism, just like in the past, is a popular thing that is seen as very successful."

The Rules According To Putin (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

MOSCOW -- What he has done to the once-turbulent Russian political scene Vladimir Putin would like to do to the world's equally volatile energy markets: Make them as stable and peaceful as the graveyard.

This grand ambition comes through vividly if implicitly as I listen to the Russian president outline in detail the concept of "energy security" that he had presented to world leaders in July at the Group of Eight summit. Putin wants markets built on long-term contracts guaranteeing not only adequate supply (of oil and gas from Russia) but also sustained demand (from consumers willing to pay fixed prices that would hold for decades).

His fellow leaders listened politely but did not commit to an idea that might have seemed quixotic coming from anyone else. Given the year that Putin is having, however, no one was willing to bet that he would fail at grand designs.

He has crushed the vibrant domestic opposition that flourished under Boris Yeltsin. With a 70 percent approval rating, he holds the power to name his successor. He has gained control over the flood of oil dollars pouring into Russia. And perhaps most satisfyingly for him, the political revolution lapping at Russia's frontiers a year ago has receded as reformers who accomplished Ukraine's Orange Revolution splintered and as his non-democratic allies in Belarus easily won reelection.

So the wiry former KGB colonel was chipper as he underwent an annual political checkup of sorts by a group of about 40 American, European and Asian policy and academic experts at his sprawling dacha in suburban Moscow yesterday. He took questions between servings of octopus carpaccio, baked sea bass and figs with yogurt sorbet, all prepared by his Italian chef and washed down by an unassuming pinot grigio 2005.

The clearest sign that fortune has smiled broadly on Putin since he met with the same organization, the Valdai Discussion Group, a year ago in the Kremlin was his warm praise for Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko, whom he now magnanimously terms "a serious, responsible" leader. Last September, he accused Yushchenko of allowing corruption to flourish in Ukraine while suggesting that the West was fomenting upheaval throughout the former Soviet Union.

President Bush also came in for praise and was offered a carefully hedged olive branch on Iran:

"Iran is a special case" located "in a very dangerous area," Putin said. Other nuclear-capable countries such as Brazil or South Africa "do not establish in their constitutions the goal of destroying another state," as he said Iran did with Israel.

"Iran should abandon its plans for nuclear enrichment on its soil," he continued. When asked specifically if Russia would support U.S. calls for sanctions, he declined to rule them out. Economic reprisals should be avoided if possible and adopted only after more discussions between Iran and the six-nation negotiating group that includes Russia and the United States. But Putin's remarks, delivered in simultaneous translation, lent weight to reports that Moscow has agreed to support symbolic sanctions if Iran remains adamant.

Putin, however, does not do mellow for long. He remains intense, focused and at times prickly even when munching the octopus carpaccio (quite tasty, by the way). His eyes flare when the subject turns to energy supplies and the vast infrastructure of new pipelines and producing fields that Russia intends to develop over a decade to become the world's dominant exporter of energy.

Putin and his aides insist that to justify the investment needed to build that infrastructure, consuming nations must begin to sign 20- to 30-year contracts with Russia now to avoid the boom-and-bust cycles of petroleum and natural gas prices of the past three decades.

"We have tremendous potential in energy. Not everybody appreciates that potential," Russia's president said in a waspish swipe aimed at the European Union, which is wrangling with Moscow over natural gas supplies. "But it is not their resource. It is Russia's resource," which must be developed "under clear rules of behavior."

Asked by British political theorist Anthony Giddens to consider swift changes that technology could force on energy suppliers because of global warming in that time frame, Putin turned the question away: "Stability is what the world economy needs . . . to become more predictable."

In his view, the same is true for Russia's political future. Putin promised again not to change the constitution so he could serve a third term after 2008. "Public opinion wants a country that will be stable, and stability is not assured by one man alone," Putin said. It comes instead from following Moscow rules.

As OPEC Meets, Fresh Doubts About Its Power (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

When the secretary general of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries spoke in London in October 2003, he advocated moderation in oil prices, sounding a familiar OPEC theme that extremely high prices could drive off consumers.

"OPEC knows, through both intuition and experience, that it does not operate in a vacuum," said Alvaro Silva-CalderÃ³n, then the secretary general. "If it wants to sell its oil, then it must attract buyers. And it does not attract buyers by scaring them off, or being unreliable." He added, "Producers need consumers and consumers need producers."

When he gave that speech, OPEC's price target for a barrel of crude oil ranged from $22 to $28. Three years later, the price of oil has nearly tripled. And as OPEC prepares to meet on Monday, the group is worried that high oil prices will chase consumers to alternate energy sources, weaken Western and Asian economies to the point of hurting demand and bring about a boost in supply from non-OPEC countries.

While OPEC ministers no longer forecast prices in the mid-$20s, they still talk about a sustainable price in the $50 to $55 range -- well below current market levels, which have already fallen more than $10 a barrel from the $78 peak in mid-July. Every $10 drop in the price of crude oil knocks about 25 cents off the price of a gallon of gasoline.

The 11-member organization is not expected to make changes in output or production quotas on Monday. But its very lack of action raises questions about whether the group, which produces nearly 40 percent of the world's petroleum, can still act effectively to sway prices or whether its members are simply riding the cyclical waves of the market.

"OPEC has been a hostage to fortune: to what happens on the demand side, to non-OPEC output and geopolitics," said Leo Drollas, deputy executive director and chief economist of the Center for Global Energy Studies in London. At the same time, he noted, its members are "crying all the way to the bank."

In order to act effectively as a cartel, OPEC would have to be able to cut or increase supplies to influence prices. But outside Saudi Arabia, OPEC members have virtually no excess capacity to help drive down prices. And outside Saudi Arabia, hardly any OPEC member has the political will or desire to cut production.

At the moment, the only factors reining in production by the group have nothing to do with oil policy. Nigeria's output has been cut by 600,000 barrels a day because of insurgents sabotaging pipelines in the Niger Delta. Iraq's production has been trimmed by about 800,000 barrels a day by the continuing mayhem there. Venezuela, which is busy quarreling with oil workers' unions and foreign oil companies, is falling about 600,000 barrels a day short of what it once produced. If the would-be cartel is holding back, it isn't by grand design.

And few of the members can boost production immediately -- except Saudi Arabia. The kingdom has a capacity of more than 10 million barrels a day, but it is currently producing around 9.1 million barrels. That has prompted some critics to complain that Saudi Arabia is not doing all it can to lower oil prices.

Saudi oil minister Ali Naimi, citing rising world crude oil inventories, has said that supplies are plentiful and that customers aren't interested in buying more.

Drollas called that "disingenuous." He said, "It's a question of price." The extra oil Saudi Arabia can produce is heavy, high-sulfur crude that costs more to refine and yields a lower-value range of products. Saudi Arabia provides a discount to customers, but Drollas said that isn't enough. "People will lift your oil if they can take it to a refinery and make money," he added.

At the same time, oil analysts say, prices over $70 a barrel make many OPEC members nervous. While OPEC countries sit on top of four-fifths of the world's proven oil reserves, if prices are high enough all sorts of other sources become attractive, from the icy waters off Sakhalin Island to the mile-and-a-half-deep waters in the Gulf of Mexico, from gas liquids projects in the Persian Gulf to the unwieldy oil sands in Canada.

"What's keeping them more anxious is demand," said Roget Diwan, an OPEC expert at PFC Energy, a consulting group. "They want to see China keep growing. They want a soft landing in the United States. They don't want to see a crash."

The outdated OPEC price band was suspended in early 2005, but Diwan said Saudi Arabia and others will try to keep the price around $60. "It's in their interest," he said. "They won't do it to please America."

Indeed many consultants and oil executives who have spoken to Naimi say that the Saudi was miffed earlier this year when President Bush said the United States should reduce dependence on Middle Eastern oil while his administration was urging the kingdom to boost its production capacity to ease world prices. Saudi Arabia has committed to expand its production capacity to 12.5 million barrels a day.

Other OPEC countries could also step up exploration and boost output. A Cambridge Energy Research Associates forecast issued last month predicted that oil and gas liquids production would hit 110 million barrels a day by 2015, up from 89 million barrels today, with most of that coming from OPEC nations.

By then, who knows what prices will be.

"My theory is that the reason the price of oil is very high today is that it was excessively low 10 years ago and the reason it's going to be low 10 years from now is that it is excessively high today," said Paolo Scaroni, chief executive of Italian oil giant ENI SpA. "When the price is very low no one invests in development. Prices go up and everybody invests."

Central Asia Pact Frees The Region Of Nuclear Arms (NYT)

By Ilan Greenberg

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

SEMIPALATINSK, Kazakhstan, Sept. 9 — Five nations in Central Asia signed a nuclear-free-zone treaty on Friday that commits the region's rich uranium deposits to peaceful uses but leaves open loopholes that could allow Russia to transport nuclear weapons into Central Asia.

It is the first mutual security pact among all five Central Asian nations, a group that has often quarreled about security issues.

By adopting the legally binding nuclear-free pact the signatories — the former Soviet republics of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan — agreed that they would neither acquire nuclear weapons nor allow them within their borders. But the treaty does not cancel an agreement that the Central Asian nations signed in 1992 that allows Russia to transport and deploy nuclear weapons in Central Asia under certain circumstances.

The United States, Britain and France boycotted the signing ceremony because they objected to that aspect of the treaty, said embassy officials and participants in the treaty negotiations. Only Russia and China sent representatives to Kazakhstan to observe the treaty signing.

Central Asia currently contains no nuclear weapons, but Kazakhstan was home to the world's fourth-largest nuclear missile arsenal in the wake of the Soviet Union's dissolution. Kazakhstan voluntarily decommissioned its nuclear weaponry in the mid-1990's. Nuclear-free zones often are opposed by the large nuclear powers because they can limit the movement of military assets and expose military bases to intrusive inspections. The United States has an air base in Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan allows NATO fighter planes with missions in Afghanistan to use its territory.

But zones can be crucial confidence-building measures among suspicious neighbors in a troubled region, said John Endicott, a professor of international affairs at the Georgia Institute of Technology, in a telephone interview.

"The United States' lack of support for this nuclear-free zone is a colossal mistake," said Mr. Endicott, who participated in the initial round of talks over the treaty nine years ago in Tashkent, Uzbekistan.

Rescue Darfur Now (WP)

By John McCain And Bob Dole

DOJ_NMG_0060670

In 1995, the writing was on the wall. The conflict in Bosnia was escalating. Tens of thousands of civilians had been driven from their homes and were trapped in places the United Nations had designated as "safe areas," including Srebrenica. Only a few hundred poorly equipped U.N. peacekeepers stood between those civilians and Bosnian Serb forces. The Serbs had signaled their defiance of the United Nations, their disdain for diplomatic overtures and their determination to advance on the safe areas and finish the job of ethnic cleansing in Bosnia. All the makings of a massacre were present, and, before the eyes of the world, that is what unfolded. Eight thousand Bosnian Muslims were systematically killed at Srebrenica, and history has judged severely those policymakers who failed to heed the warning signs of mass murder.

As advocates of military action in Bosnia, we will never forget those terrible days. We remember that when the United States and its allies did finally act, military intervention saved countless lives. And all of us pledged anew that, should such a situation again unfold, we would do things very differently.

Today, the Darfur region of Sudan faces its own Srebrenica moment.

The scale of human destruction thus far in Sudan has been staggering. Already, more than 200,000 civilians have been killed, with perhaps 2.5 million forced into squalid camps. This catastrophe is the result of a directed slaughter perpetrated by the Sudanese government and allied Janjaweed militias.

Faced with its moral responsibility to act, the U.N. Security Council has adopted a resolution that would replace a courageous but inadequate African Union force with a much larger U.N. force empowered to protect civilians. Last week, the Sudanese government not only rejected the resolution but demanded that the African Union withdraw from the country, leaving civilians vulnerable. Meanwhile, government forces have launched a major offensive in Darfur to finish off any rebel forces there, pushing tens of thousands more civilians into the camps.

As with Srebrenica in 1995, the potential for further mass killing in Darfur today is plain for all to see. All the warnings have been issued, including one from the United Nations that the coming weeks may see "a man-made catastrophe of an unprecedented scale." What remains unclear is only whether the world has the will to impose an outcome on Sudan different from that which unfolded so tragically in Bosnia. Make no mistake: At some point we will step in to help victims in Darfur and police an eventual settlement. The question is whether the United States and other nations will act now to prevent a tragedy, or merely express sorrow and act later to deal with its aftermath.

Urgent action is required in the coming hours and days.

First, the United States should reject out of hand Khartoum's demand that the African Union force leave and should insist that it stay, with broad international support, until the introduction of a robust U.N. force in accordance with Security Council Resolution 1706.

Second, the United States should call on the European Union to impose financial sanctions against the Sudanese leadership and to pursue the immediate imposition of similar sanctions by the U.N. Security Council.

Third, NATO should immediately establish and enforce a no-fly zone over Darfur to ensure that Khartoum ends its offensive military flights and bombing raids, as the Security Council has already demanded.

Fourth, the United States should intensify efforts to persuade U.N. members to commit troops and funds for the U.N. force in Darfur, and it should develop plans for U.S. logistical support. The administration should push the United Nations to draw up firm plans for the entrance of a robust force into Darfur and contingency plans for the force to enter without Sudanese consent.

Fifth, U.S. and allied intelligence assets, including satellite technology, should be dedicated to record any atrocities that occur in Darfur so that future prosecutions can take place. We should publicly remind Khartoum that the International Criminal Court has jurisdiction to prosecute war crimes in Darfur and that Sudanese leaders will be held personally accountable for attacks on civilians.

Finally, the United States should increase pressure on countries friendly to Khartoum -- and particularly our allies in the Arab League -- to abandon their support for Sudan's refusal to accept the U.N. force.

Some of these steps would be dramatic and difficult. But the circumstances imposed on the people of Darfur are likewise dramatic and difficult. And so would be the consequences of inaction: a humanitarian disaster that the world will in any case have to address; a massive and possibly permanent population of refugees dependent on international support; a conflict spreading to neighboring countries with prospects for settlement even more remote; and a permanent stain on our conscience.

Throughout the world, people of conscience were shocked by and ashamed of our failure to stop the genocide in Bosnia and Rwanda. We must not repeat these mistakes. In Darfur, the moment of truth is now.

John McCain is a U.S. senator from Arizona and Bob Dole was a longtime senator from Kansas and the 1996 Republican presidential nominee.

Why Genocide Matters (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

When I spoke at Cornell University recently, a woman asked why I always harp on Darfur.

It's a fair question. The number of people killed in Darfur so far is modest in global terms: estimates range from 200,000 to more than 500,000.

In contrast, four million people have died since 1998 as a result of the fighting in Congo, the most lethal conflict since World War II. And malaria annually kills one million to three million people — meaning that three years' deaths in Darfur are within the margin of error of the annual global toll from malaria.

So, yes, you can make an argument that Darfur is simply one of many tragedies and that it would be more cost-effective to save lives by tackling diarrhea, measles and malaria.

But I don't buy that argument at all. We have a moral compass within us, and its needle is moved not only by human suffering but also by human evil. That's what makes genocide special — not just the number of deaths but the government policy behind them. And that in turn is why stopping genocide should be an even higher priority than saving lives from AIDS or malaria.

Even the Holocaust amounted to only 10 percent of World War II casualties and cost far fewer lives than the AIDS epidemic. But the Holocaust evokes special revulsion because it wasn't just tragic but also monstrous, and that's why we read Anne Frank and Elie Wiesel. Teenage girls still die all the time, and little boys still starve and lose their parents — but when this arises from genocide, the horror resonates with all humans.

Or it should. But for whatever reason, Sudan's decision to kill people on the basis of tribe and skin color has aroused mostly yawns around the globe. Now Sudan is raising the stakes by starting a new military offensive in Darfur — and by eliminating witnesses.

The government charged Paul Salopek, an ace Chicago Tribune correspondent, with espionage in an effort to keep foreign reporters away (on Saturday it released him after a month in prison). And even African Union peacekeepers may be forced out of Darfur by the end of this month.

Twelve aid workers have been killed since May — more than in the previous three years. These killings are forcing aid groups to pull back, and the U.N. warns that if the humanitarian operation collapses, the result will be "hundreds of thousands of deaths." If all foreign witnesses are pushed out, the calamity is barely imaginable.

We urgently need U.N. peacekeepers, even over Sudan's objections. (If Sudan sees them coming, it will hurriedly consent.) The U.S. should also impose a no-fly zone from Chad and work with France to keep Chad and the Central African Republic from collapsing into this maelstrom.

President Bush showed an important flash of leadership on Darfur early this year, but lately he has fallen quiet again. He should appoint a special envoy for Darfur and use his bully pulpit to put genocide on the international agenda — for starters, by employing his speech to the U.N. General Assembly this month to remind the world of the children being tossed onto bonfires in Sudan. He could also announce that the U.S. will choose candidates to support for U.N. secretary general based in part on their positions on the genocide.

You can see how your member of Congress does on Darfur at www.darfurscores.org. Information about Darfur rallies next Sunday in New York and other cities worldwide is at www.savedarfur.org.

If we don't act, the slaughter may end up claiming more than one million lives, but this is about more than body count. This time the teenagers are not named Anne and Elie, but Fatima and Ahmed, but the horror is the same.

To stir up interest among young people in issues like Darfur and global poverty, I held a contest in the spring to choose a university student to take with me on a reporting trip to Africa. From 4,000 entries, I chose Casey Parks, a young woman from Mississippi who had never been outside the U.S.

We're leaving tomorrow for Equatorial Guinea. It's a backwater that has fascinated me since I first traveled through Africa in 1982 and my Lonely Planet guidebook said about it: "We've never heard of any travelers going there, so we have no details."

Casey and I then travel through remote parts of Cameroon and the Central African Republic. You can follow our journey beginning Wednesday with our daily blog entries at www.nytimes.com/kristof.

Darfur Trembles As Peacekeepers' Exit Looms (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

TAWILA, Sudan, Sept. 8 — They call this place Rwanda.

A year ago it was a collection of straw huts, hastily thrown together in the aftermath of battle, hard by the razor-wire edge of a small African Union peacekeeper base.

Today it is a tangle of sewage-choked lanes snaking among thousands of squalid shacks, an endless sprawl that dwarfs the base at its heart. Pounding rainstorms gather fetid pools that swarm with mosquitoes and flies spreading death in their filthy wake. All but one of the aid groups working here have pulled out.

Many who live here say the camp is named for the Rwandan soldiers based here as monitors of a tattered cease-fire. But the camp's sheiks say the name has a darker meaning, one that reveals their deepest fears.

"What happened in Rwanda, it will happen here," said Sheik Abdullah Muhammad Ali, who fled here from a nearby village seeking the safety that he hoped the presence of about 200 African Union peacekeepers would bring. But the Sudanese government has asked the African Union to quit Darfur rather than hand over its mission to the United Nations. "If these soldiers leave," Sheik Ali said, "we will all be slaughtered."

Tawila and the sprawling, makeshift camp of displaced people at its edge sit astride a deadly fault line in Darfur. This small but strategic town has been the front line of some of the deadliest battles in a conflict that has killed hundreds of thousands of people and sent 2.5 million fleeing.

It is a place where a grim struggle between the government and its Arab allies, and non-Arab rebel factions, has given way to a fractured struggle that pits non-Arab tribes against one another, fanning centuries-old rivalries and setting the scene for a bloodbath of score-settling vengeance should the African Union soldiers withdraw, as demanded, at the end of this month.

Tawila is an apocalyptic postcard from the next and perhaps the grimmest chapter in Darfur's agony, a preview of the coming cataclysm in the conflict the United Nations has called the world's gravest humanitarian crisis.

Thousands of people in this squalid camp fear that their annihilation will be the final chapter in this brutal battle over land, identity, resources and power, which the Bush administration and many others have called genocide.

"We beg the international community, somebody, come and save us," Sheik Ali said. "We have no means to protect ourselves. The only thing we can do is run and hide in the mountains and caves. We will all die."

The portents of violence have become so ominous, and Sudan's stonewalling of international intervention so complete, that Kofi Annan, secretary general of the United Nations, warned last week that the Sudanese government would be "held collectively and individually responsible for what happens to the population in Darfur."

Death is no stranger here. Malaria and diarrhea course through the camp, picking off children first, then the old. There are no doctors or nurses or medicine. There is no clean water. There are no toilets or latrines. And yet the conflict, unchecked even by the presence of the African peacekeeping force, drives more people from their homes into the camp each day.

Mariam Ibrahim Omar buried her son Ismail in a graveyard near here Wednesday. She was not sure what had killed him, only that he burned with fever, heaved and vomited. She took him to a clinic run by the aid organization Relief International in town, carrying him on her back swaddled in rags, only to find its doors locked and its doctors and nurses long gone. The lone aid organization still operating here is the United Nations World Food Program, usually the last to go in even the direst situation.

"We bought medicines in the market but none of them helped him," Ms. Omar said, her face swathed in black. "He died yesterday and we buried him."

Ismail was 21 months old. They buried him in a growing graveyard on a small rise above the camp. Two bricks stood atop his grave, indicating where his tiny head lay, pointed toward Mecca, as Islamic custom demands.

Next to his fresh coverlet of earth, men in white robes dug a new pit, deep and wide, to hold the camp's latest casualty. No one was sure how old Halima Batwal was — some said 80, others 90. They dug the loose sand with shovels until they hit hard-packed earth, and then switched to pickaxes to carve a narrow trench for her slender, wasted body.

The rituals of a Muslim burial are simple, easily satisfied even by the destitute — the body must be washed, then wrapped in unbleached cloth. The men gently placed her in the trench, then stacked bricks atop the body, a makeshift crypt in a makeshift graveyard.

Ms. Batwal was from Tina, a village just a few miles away, but she had to flee when rival rebel factions clashed there this spring. Her relatives said she would have preferred to be buried nearer to home, as tradition demands. But it was too dangerous to carry her body there.

"She will have to stay here," said Adam Ali, a distant relative who teaches mathematics to children at the camp. "We have no choice."

Whether the living will remain here, too, is an open question.

A United Nations Security Council resolution authorized a force of more than 22,000 troops and police officers to take over peacekeeping duties from the African Union. But Sudan has refused to allow the new force to deploy, and it says the African Union must leave by the end of this month, when its mandate ends, if it cannot work on its own.

If the African Union troops leave, the residents of the camp say, they, too, will flee. But there are few places for them to hide — in the mountains or hundreds of miles west, across the border with Chad.

For the moment the peacekeepers are still here, the contingent of 200 Rwandan troops led by a Ghanaian lieutenant colonel named Wisdom Bleboo. But there is little they can do to help the people living in the Rwanda camp.

"People are dying here," Colonel Bleboo said. "Children are dying. They come to us thinking that we can help them, but we have no means to help them."

Similarly helpless is the sole Red Cross worker still permanently based here, a slender 29-year-old with a faint goatee named Issa Ahmed Muhammad Sraj. His job is to help families separated by the war to stay in touch.

In a dusty black nylon briefcase he carries forms that camp residents fill out to send to relatives elsewhere in Sudan, simple messages of greetings — news of weddings, births and deaths. He is originally from Tawila, but like most of its residents, he had to abandon his home and move into the camp.

He has nothing else to offer but his forms, yet residents of the camp come to him anyway with their endless problems — sick children, stolen goats, leaky huts and empty food bowls.

"I have nothing to help them, so I just explain to them, 'I am living here in the camp just like you, suffering together,' " Mr. Sraj said. "I sympathize with them and listen to them. I report back to headquarters what is happening here, but no one comes." The local Red Cross headquarters is in El Fasher, the state capital.

Aid organizations have always found Tawila a difficult place to operate in. Nestled in the foothills of the rich and fertile farmland of the Jebel Marra mountains and home to a mix of Arabs and non-Arabs, herders and farmers, it sits along a crucial livestock migration route and next to the main east-west road in Darfur, stretching from Chad to the main north-south road leading to Khartoum, the capital. Tawila is a strategic prize all sides in this increasingly complicated conflict have tried to win.

On Feb. 27, 2004, hundreds of Arab tribesmen in military uniforms attacked Tawila, led by Musa Hilal, the leader of the Arab militia known as the janjaweed.

Mr. Sraj was in his house when the assault began, but at the first crack of gunfire he fled with his family to a nearby valley, where they hid for three days.

When they returned to survey the damage, much of the town was leveled, including his house. Their furniture and livestock had been stolen, their store of grain burned. Dozens of people had been killed, and many women and girls had been raped. The attack on Tawila and its surrounding villages was to become one of the most notorious of the Darfur conflict.

Mr. Sraj fled to El Fasher, where he and his family lived in the vast Abu Shouk camp. The rebels regained control of Tawila from the Arab militias, and last year its residents started to return, planting their fields and resuming their lives.

A cease-fire agreement seemed to bring some modicum of tranquillity. Mr. Sraj came back, this time as a worker for the Red Cross.

This spring the troubles started again, this time between the non-Arab tribes that had previously been the champions of the people of this area, mostly Fur villagers who lived as farmers and Zaghawa herdsmen and traders.

The Sudanese Liberation Army, the main rebel group fighting the government for greater autonomy in Darfur, split in two along tribal lines. The two sides fought for control of this crucial territory in advance of a peace agreement with the government that one of the factions, the Zaghawa-led group, signed in May.

The peace agreement has only made things worse here. The Fur-led faction of the Sudanese Liberation Army did not sign, and violence between the factions increased. The Rwanda camp, estimated in May to have had 9,000 residents, now holds perhaps double that number.

As the battle between the factions has intensified, ethnic lines in the camp have hardened. The Fur majority is suspicious of Zaghawas, who it claims have joined with the government to oppress the Fur.

Most of the displaced people at Argo, another camp just outside Tawila, have fled to the Rwanda camp to be closer to the African Union soldiers.

Those who remain at Argo are the most destitute. Under a thorn tree in the center of the camp sit a few old men, so poor that they lack the most basic furniture for any Darfurian household — a woven plastic mat on which to sit, eat and pray. They sat on empty wheat sacks, their foreheads sprinkled with dust and gravel from praying on the naked earth.

As the men talked, a dozen women on donkeys laden with water jugs, cooking pots, sacks of grain and children approached. One woman, Leimoun Ali Ahmed, said she had fled her village, Kalma, after bandits attacked to steal her livestock. She loaded her four children on two donkeys and was headed for the Rwanda camp.

"We don't have anything so we hope they will help us there," Ms. Ahmed said, referring to international aid organizations. She had heard that food, health care and clean water were available in the Rwanda camp.

But she will find little food and none of the rest. Relief International and Save the Children pulled out after attacks on their workers and vehicles. Relief International had offered health services, but its midwives, nurses, vaccinators and nutrition counselors have been evacuated to El Fasher. A dozen aid workers have been killed since May, all of them Sudanese, so aid organizations have had to curtail their activities in many areas. A World Health Organization car traveling with the World Food Program was hijacked Thursday by rebel gunmen.

That has left hundreds of thousands of people across Darfur without food, shelter, medicine and clean water. Disease and hunger are rampant.

"It is painful to think of those I left behind," said Halima Muhammad Ahmed, a midwife who had been working for Relief International in Tawila and who is now in El Fasher, waiting to return to the expectant mothers she left. Like so many of the aid workers in Darfur, she, too, is a victim — her village, Umo, was attacked by janjaweed in March 2004.

"We only think of going back," Ms. Ahmed said. "We are helpless here."

At the Rwanda camp, babies arrive, midwife or no. In a straw hut at the edge of the camp, Hasima Abakar sat with her month-old baby, a boy she named Hamid. The birth had been hard, and she lost a lot of blood. But she was more worried about Hamid — pus oozed from his navel. Radiant with fever, he squirmed and turned away from her breast.

"I don't know my future," she said, her face blank as she gazed down at Hamid. "Only God knows."

D.C. Demonstrators Call On Bush to Press for U.N. Peacekeepers

Two years after the Bush administration said genocide had taken place in Sudan, protesters marched yesterday on the White House, demanding that the president press for U.N. peacekeepers who could halt the continuing attacks in the country's Darfur region.

The United States and other members of the Security Council have endorsed a plan for U.N. peacekeepers to replace a beleaguered force of African Union soldiers in enforcing a peace agreement signed last year. But the Sudanese government has rejected the deployment, which would be bigger and better-equipped than the African Union force.

With signs that the Sudanese government and its allied militias are preparing to step up their attacks, demonstrators said time was short for President Bush to exert U.S. influence on Sudan's president.

"We need to hurry up; we need to put pressure," Fatima Mohammed Haroun, a Sudanese activist, told a crowd of a few hundred protesters massed in Lafayette Square, across from the White House.

Fresh from a trip to see family in Darfur, Haroun said her besieged homeland is desperate for the help of the international community. "The people are just waiting for someone to come and help them," she said.

Organized by Africa Action, the rally coincided with the group's release of a report comparing the restrained U.S. response to Darfur to the Clinton administration's inaction on Rwanda as hundreds of thousands of people perished there more than a decade ago.

Almost everyone in the crowd wore a shirt with the report's title: "A Tale of Two Genocides." Underneath the title were images of two bloody handprints, one above the word Rwanda, the other above the word Darfur. And below the handprints, an assertion: "The U.S. Has the Power to Protect."

In a planned act of civil disobedience, 30 protesters carrying signs marched from Lafayette Square across Pennsylvania Avenue, where they lay down on the sidewalk outside the White House fence and held up the signs.

The protesters were arrested by U.S. Park Police to the cheers of hundreds of fellow demonstrators who watched from across Pennsylvania Avenue, chanting for their cause.

"Stop the genocide! Break the deadlock! Protect the people!" the group called out as the 30 demonstrators lay, still holding up their signs.

A poor region of Sudan, Darfur has been at war since 2003, when rebels attacked government posts, triggering a massive response by the Sudanese military and the notorious government-backed militias known as Janjaweed.

Hundreds of thousands of people have died in the war, and an estimated 2 million people have been forced from their homes. Their plight has provoked protests across the country over the past couple of years, including a large demonstration in April on the Mall.

Yesterday's protest was aimed at pushing Sudan back into the broader public conscience and onto the president's agenda two years after his secretary of state made what many thought would be a seminal statement on Sudan.

"It's been two years, and Mr. Bush hasn't done anything about it," said Emily Funigiello, 17, who traveled from the University of North Carolina in Wilmington to join the demonstration.

Her friend Melissa Salvatore, 18, said the United States and the president cannot forget what happened not so many years ago.

"We can't let what happened in Rwanda happen in Darfur."

China Urges EU To End Ban On Arms Sales (AP)

By Robert Wielaard, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao urged the European Union Saturday to lift its ban on arms sales to Beijing imposed after the 1989 crackdown on pro-democracy protests in Tiananmen Square.

Beijing has lobbied repeatedly for lifting the ban, calling it a "Cold War relic." France is in favor, but others in the 25-nation EU have failed to reach agreement.

Wen told a news conference China has made significant progress in "protecting the human rights of Chinese people."

DOJ_NMG_0060676

"No country can say they can resolve all the issues related to human rights perfectly," Wen said after a summit meeting with EU officials.

The European arms ban has been a sticking point in the EU's relations with Beijing and stems from China's questionable human rights record.

Wen objected to the EU's practice of linking "economic and trade issues with the so-called human rights issues."

"China attaches great importance to the issue of human rights and we identified human rights as the basic rights of the Chinese people," he said.

Wen also urged the international community not to threaten Iran with economic and other sanctions over Tehran's nuclear enrichment program.

"It is our hope that the international community ... will exercise caution on this matter and continue to work for a peaceful solution," he said.

The permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — the U.S., Britain, France, China and Russia — plus Germany have offered Iran economic incentives to persuade Tehran from enriching uranium.

Iran has ignored an Aug. 31 U.N. Security Council deadline to suspend enrichment.

The EU and China, meanwhile, agreed to step up cooperation in nonproliferation and disarmament issues and "expressed their grave concern over (North Korea's) recent multiple launch of missiles," said a final summit statement.

The two sides called for an early resumption of six-nation talks designed to resolve North Korea's standoff with its neighbors over its nuclear arms ambitions.

In those talks, South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States have tried to persuade the North to abandon its nuclear program. North Korea has refused to negotiate since November to protest a U.S. crackdown on Pyongyang's assets abroad for alleged money-laundering and counterfeiting.

Protesters Call On Taiwan's Leader To Quit (WP)

Chen Urged to Take Responsibility for Alleged Wrongdoing by Relatives, Aides

TAIPEI, Taiwan, Sept. 9 -- Tens of thousands of protesters took to the streets of Taiwan's capital Saturday demanding the resignation of President Chen Shui-bian, whose family members and close aides have been embroiled in a string of corruption scandals.

Chanting "Step down!" and wearing red, the protesters called for Chen to take responsibility for the alleged wrongdoing and resign.

Huge red balloons, some with the Chinese characters for "honor," floated above the masses of people gathered in a main street near the Presidential Office in Taipei. Organizers of the mostly peaceful rally said the protesters' numbers swelled to 200,000, but police put the figure at 70,000.

Chen, a passionate supporter of formalizing Taiwan's independence from China, has the backing of his party and pro-independence stalwarts and is unlikely to step down before his term expires in 2008.

The months-old allegations that his wife, other relatives and key aides exploited their positions for illegal financial gain have weakened his leadership. The situation has raised questions about whether Chen will have the confidence to push for formal independence for the self-ruled island of 23 million, a move China has threatened to oppose with military force.

The rally, one of the first not to be sponsored by either Chen's party or the opposition, was led by Shih Ming-teh, former chairman of Chen's ruling Democratic Progressive Party. Shih, a former mentor of Chen's, was a prisoner for more than two decades for opposing the authoritarian rule of the Nationalist Party, or Kuomintang.

Shih announced his campaign to oust Chen last month, saying he would seek support from a million people and ask each to donate about $3. He said he reached his target of $3 million in less than two weeks.

Taiwanese intellectuals who formerly supported Chen, including artists, novelists and key members of bar associations, have joined the push for his resignation.

Shih appeared before the crowd Saturday making the "thumbs down" sign. Shih, who plans to stage a sit-in outside the Presidential Office until Chen steps down, said the protest would continue indefinitely.

Chen's son-in-law, Chao Chien-ming, was indicted on insider trading charges in July. Prosecutors are also investigating allegations that first lady Wu Shu-chen accepted millions of Taiwan dollars in gift vouchers in exchange for using her influence in a department store takeover.

The Presidential Office acknowledged in a statement Thursday that prosecutors had questioned Chen last month about the suspected use of fake receipts to account for part of secret state funds used for diplomatic activities. Chen has said that he and his wife are innocent and that no state funds went to private individuals.

Protesters said Saturday that the statement was not enough and that the president should resign.

"We hope our president can step down," said Lee Huang-ming, who works at a state-run enterprise. "He is corrupt, and his family is corrupt. He is not suited to our times."

Independent analysts said the protests could compel the judiciary to investigate the scandals more thoroughly.

Blair Warns Against Infighting, But Feud Persists (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 9 — Prime Minister Tony Blair warned Saturday that Britain's Labor Party would lose control of the government if it did not show it was "hungry for power" and halt the "irredeemably old-fashioned" personal feuds surrounding his succession.

After a week of bitter infighting and pressure from his rival and onetime ally Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair was forced Thursday to set a 12-month limit on his tenure after nine years in office.

But the feuding has continued. On Saturday, Charles Clarke, a Labor stalwart and a government minister until Mr. Blair dismissed him in May in a cabinet shuffle, said in an interview with The Daily Telegraph that Mr. Brown was an uncollegial "control freak" who had "psychological" problems with debate.

"We just don't know what he thinks on a range of issues," Mr. Clarke said. "What would his foreign policy look like? Will he pull troops out of Iraq? He wants to produce rabbits out of a hat after he becomes leader. I think he's got to produce his rabbits now. He's got to explain what his vision is."

Mr. Brown offered no public response to the attack, the second by Mr. Clarke in two days. But one Labor legislator and Brown loyalist, George Mudie, said Mr. Clarke's "abusive and offensive language" seemed to suggest an effort by Mr. Blair's supporters to discredit Mr. Brown as a potential successor. By that argument, Mr. Blair wishes to block Mr. Brown, fearing he would undo Mr. Blair's political legacy.

At a speech to the loyalist Progress research organization, Mr. Blair said "there was something irredeemably old-fashioned" about the sparring between rival camps over the past week. "The only thing we did not have is the smoke-filled rooms, and that is because we banned those," he said, referring jokingly to Britain's broad indoor smoking ban.

But, Mr. Blair said, "we are not going to win if we have personal attacks by anybody on anyone because it turns the public off and makes them think we are interested again in ourselves and not in them."

He said Labor could win a fourth term in office, "not by behaving like we did last week, but behaving like we did when we were hungry for power before 1997, when we understood that what matters is the people of the country, not ourselves."

Mr. Blair seemed relaxed and at ease among faithful followers who gave him three standing ovations before he left, heading for the Middle East on a trip likely to focus on Lebanon and the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

The speech was Mr. Blair's first since his reluctant announcement on Thursday that he would resign within 12 months. He has not specified a date, but acknowledged that "there is a stage at which it is sensible as a political leader to move on and that is just the way it is."

Mr. Blair is the first Labor leader to win three successive terms in office. He said two years ago that he would not try for a fourth election, and Mr. Brown has been pressing for a firm date for him to go.

The prime minister's less harried mood suggested that he felt the pressure had eased — if only slightly — with the spotlight now shifting to Mr. Brown, his policies and his prospects. But many in the party still seemed troubled by the high-level fighting.

"This government is becoming a wounded animal," said Diana Strongbow, a Labor Party figure who spoke during a question-and-answer session after the speech. "This has got to stop," she said of the warring camps. With young men "coming back from Afghanistan in body bags," it was an insult for politicians to go on fighting among themselves, she said.

Mr. Blair's speech seemed to persuade some loyalists that the party would survive the crisis to fight the next election, due by 2010 at the latest. "In the last few days people thought we had lost it," said Lord Clive Soley, a Labor peer who was part of the audience. "I think people will pull back."

Blair Urges Party To Stop Infighting (AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Prime Minister Tony Blair said Saturday his Labour Party risks losing the next general election if personal attacks among party members continue and the party fails to redefine itself and its goals.

Blair urged his party to stop the disputes and clearly outline its positions on complex issues such as security during the war on terrorism, immigration, pension shortfalls and global warming.

"We're not going to win if we have personal attacks by anybody on anyone," Blair said in a speech to a progressive think-tank in London.

Many party members had hoped that Blair's reluctant announcement on Thursday that he would resign within a year would quiet the bitter infighting that flared in the party last week.

But even after Blair left London for Jerusalem — where he met Saturday evening with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert — the issue refused to go away.

During a news conference with the Israeli leader, Blair was asked if he would endorse Treasury chief Gordon Brown, widely expected to be the next prime minister, as his successor.

He said he was "not going to go back into all the leadership issues" and chastised journalists for continuing to press the matter.

"I actually think it's kind of disrespectful to come here, after everything this country and this region has been through, and talk about our own internal matters," Blair said.

It is believed that Blair and Brown have reached a private understanding over the handover of power. But angry comments by Charles Clarke, formerly Britain's top law and order official, have since demonstrated how uneasy the new peace is.

In comments published Saturday in The Daily Telegraph, Clarke said Brown's "massive weakness" was that he was a "control-freak" who could not work with people and who lacked Blair's "charm."

In comments published Friday in London's Evening Standard newspaper, Clarke harshly criticized Brown for the way he handled the week's turmoil, saying that his succession as prime minister was not guaranteed.

Brown's allies have insisted he was not behind the anti-Blair plotting.

Senior party figures have publicly backed him as the next Labour leader in an effort to prevent the eventual handover of power from getting even uglier and throwing national elections expected in 2009 to a resurgent Conservative Party.

In his speech in London on Saturday, Blair said the infighting reminded him how his party's ideological disputes had kept it out of power for many years. He said the center-left party, which has been in power since 1997, could still win the next general election if it puts aside the infighting and adapts its positions on complex issues of concern to the British general public.

In a newspaper article Friday, Brown sought to ease the fears of those who worry he would veer left instead of following in Blair's centrist footsteps.

Brown praised the prime minister as courageous and promised that Britain would do whatever was necessary to battle terrorism. He said that during an upcoming trip to New York he would reaffirm to Americans that, as it did after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, Britain "stands ... shoulder to shoulder with them."

At a joint news conference with Olmert, Blair expressed his support for Olmert's decision to renew Israel's dialogue with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, despite Hamas' control of the Palestinian parliament and government.

President Bush issued a statement praising Blair's visit to Lebanon, Israel and the Palestinian territories, saying the trip is timely given the deployment of international forces in Lebanon.

"I wish him well in his efforts to promote peace and stability," he said.

Britain's Leadership Battle Years In Making (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Tony Blair's ally and enduring rival, Gordon Brown, tired of waiting to ascend. Now he has forced the issue -- and cast Labor into chaos.

LONDON — The photographs of the two men from the old days look like weathered yearbook snapshots, two fresh-faced politicians elected together to Parliament in 1983, their hair a little too long. One of them, a young man named Tony Blair, is beaming broadly; the other, Gordon Brown, looks studious and serious.

They shared an office for a time, eventually collaborating in drafting a new vision of what Britain's Labor Party should be, marrying its old trade union, socialist traditions with market principles. When the party leadership came up for grabs in 1994, both men wanted the job. Brown, especially, thought he had earned it.

"Basically, Brown was the senior partner. Brown had been in the party longer, had more sort of intellectual roots," said Nick Kochan, coauthor of "Gordon Brown: The First Year in Power." "Blair was Johnny-come-lately, trained as a barrister, had lots of charm and appeal and savoir-faire. Brown was rather retiring and awkward — brainy, but bad at people."

The two reportedly struck an agreement: Blair would take the party leadership — and soon, the leadership of the country — and Brown would inherit later, being granted responsibility for social and economic policymaking in the meantime.

More than a decade later, Brown tired of waiting. As chancellor of the exchequer — Britain's treasury chief — he has been one of Blair's most important allies and his most enduring rival during the prime minister's nine years in office. But he finally struck last week, forcing Blair to announce his departure within the year.

The move left the Labor Party in chaos and virtually guaranteed that Blair's final months in office would be marked by a bruising battle for leadership of the party both men helped to shape.

On Saturday, Blair appealed to the party to leave behind the vicious internal sniping of the last week and remake Labor's message to suit a changed Britain.

"There was something sort of irredeemably old-fashioned about it, I'm afraid: the attacks on the leader, the leader responds…. The only thing we didn't have was the smoke-filled room, and that's because we banned those," said Blair, whose entry into the room of party supporters was met with a standing ovation.

"We're three years away from an election, and we can remake ourselves," he said. "But we can only do it not by behaving like we did last week, but by behaving like we did when we were hungry for power, before 1997, when we understood that what mattered was the people and the country, not ourselves."

The story of Blair's last months as prime minister, like the years that preceded them, cannot be written without reference to his relationship with Brown, the brooding and brilliant son of a Scottish minister who both guided Blair's Britain to economic vigor and waited resentfully in Blair's shadow for the day he would be allowed to lead.

The political fortunes of Britain for years have depended on the interplay between these two powerful politicians who have worked closely together for two decades, sometimes while barely speaking to each other.

"Each of them and their acolytes spilling bile into the media [about each other] is pretty much normal behavior for them," said Tony Travers, a professor of politics at the London School of Economics.

"At one level, they're like an elderly married couple who kind of hover between a sort of final divorce, which would shock everybody, and occasionally getting back together and everything's fine. There's an element of can't live with and can't live without each other," Travers said.

The marriage of opposites seemed to work. After Blair became prime minister in 1997, Brown proceeded to take expert command of the economy, handing over responsibility for interest-rate setting to the Bank of England and charting nine years of steady growth, while Blair focused on high-profile foreign policy initiatives and plunged into overhauling healthcare and education.

But well into his third term as prime minister, Blair had steadily refused to either step aside or set a date for when he planned to, leaving Brown, aides said, feeling frustrated and betrayed — all the more so as the party's poll numbers plummeted in the face of Blair's increasingly unpopular alliance with the U.S. on the war in Iraq.

Brown's supporters have been urging him to launch an attack on Blair for months. Blair's backers warned that attacking the sitting prime minister of a successful party 16 months after he had been reelected would amount to political suicide for all involved.

"Blair's star has really waned, ever since the end of the [initial phase of the Iraq] war and the failure to find any weapons of mass destruction. And yet each time it seemed to me there was a moment where Brown might have moved, he stood back," Kochan said.

Even last week, he said, Brown fell short of demanding Blair's immediate resignation, although reports have circulated of a private deal under which Blair would step down in the spring.

"Sometimes I think maybe the reason he doesn't go for it is he's not totally convinced that he's a natural leader," Kochan said. "Is Brown really convinced he'd be the right prime minister?"

Blair has never been troubled by such doubts, and even in the current crisis, with his party threatening open revolt, he has not been cowed, say those who know him. To the contrary, they said, Blair thrives on high drama.

"His adrenaline flows in helpful ways in his body. It's fight and fight, not fight-or-flight," said Anthony Seldon, headmaster of Wellington College and one of Blair's biographers. "He also has a kind of Zen personality whereby he is able to be remarkably positive about events. To a remarkable degree, he is able to let things go and live in the present, without being dogged by regret. He just bounces back."

In the end, Blair appears to have a kind of toughness, even ruthlessness, that Brown lacks, say many who know Blair. And he is buoyed in the current showdown, some suggested, by caring less about the consequences of the infighting.

"For Gordon Brown, the longer this civil war goes on, the more likely it is that Labor will lose the election. From Tony Blair's point of view, it's much less of a problem. Because the worst that could happen from his point of view is that Labor loses the election, and that in turn would suggest that he, Tony Blair, had been the magic ingredient that had won all the elections before," Travers said.

"And it is just possible, although the Blairites would aggressively deny it, that Tony Blair thinks [Conservative Party leader] David Cameron might be a better long-term successor as prime minister than some of the Labor candidates on offer."

Yet policy differences between Blair and Brown are not substantial. Both place greater value on transatlantic relations than on those with Europe.

"Brown will want to maintain the traditional British alliance with the U.S., and while he probably will not think the current policy on Iraq is sensible, until there is a change of U.S. presidents he won't be able to do much," said Patrick Dunleavy, a professor at the London School of Economics.

In general, Brown is thought to be to the left of Blair, more at home with labor-movement roots and slightly less committed to market-based solutions for base-line public services, including healthcare.

But because of the ghost of the Blair-Brown feud, the upcoming leadership contest will involve personalities as much as policy. Some Labor deputies have acknowledged reservations about whether Brown is up to the job, or have suggested, as Labor deputy Meg Hillier has, that Brown would need a good running mate.

"Politics is about communicating," Hillier said. "Brown is very warm one-to-one, but you need someone who can go out and talk the language that people can understand on the street."

Please Don't Hire Tony Blair (WP)

By James Forsyth

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Things must be pretty bad for a trip to the West Bank town of Ramallah to seem like a chance to get away from it all. But that is where British Prime Minister Tony Blair -- hounded at home by his own party -- headed this weekend.

America's top defender abroad spent last week pulling knives out of his back, front and sides. Critics within his party insisted that he should announce the date of his resignation -- a move that would make Blair not just a lame duck but a legless one. His statement on Thursday that he would be gone by this time next year isn't enough: The rebels want a precise timetable. Even former Blair loyalists have collected signatures for letters imploring him to stand aside.

One small consolation for the prime minister: He won't be short of job offers once he takes early retirement. As long ago as 2001, the then-popular P.M. mused to the Sunday Telegraph about how "lucky" he was that he'll "get out before my working life is over. I'll have time to do something else."

That something else is likely to be on this side of the Atlantic, where Blair is in greater demand than back home and would probably earn more money -- a real concern for a man who likes the good life and must pay off a mortgage on a $6 million London townhouse. Indeed, if the London papers and rumor mills are to be believed, establishment Washington institutions such as the Carlyle Group or Georgetown University -- where Blair delivered a major foreign-policy speech in May -- could be seeking his services.

But American institutions should issue a moratorium -- a long one -- on hiring Blair. Yes, America's best friend has stood by the nation in times of war and controversy. But for that very reason, the U.S. national interest would be better served if Blair remained in Britain, where his reputation will steadily recover after he steps down, and where he could continue to make the case for the values that unite the two nations.

If Blair takes a big-bucks job over here, he will join a long line of world leaders whose support for American values has landed them in U.S. universities or think tanks. It must be nice to have friendly foreigners on hand to lionize U.S. virtues, but this pro-American brain drain is a luxury the United States can't afford as it wages a battle of ideas worldwide.

As Washington looks south at a rising tide of Hugo ChÃ¡vez-led populism, it must rue the fact that two of Latin America's most high-profile supporters of free markets now reside at U.S. universities. Former Brazilian president Fernando Henrique Cardoso, who tamed his country's inflation and transformed its economy, is now a professor at Brown University. And after serving as Mexico's budget secretary and president during the 1990s, U.S. ally Ernesto Zedillo returned to Yale, his alma mater, to direct its center on globalization. Similarly, as U.S. policymakers contemplate how India's intransigence contributed to the recent failure of the World Trade Organization to reduce trade barriers, they must wonder whether Indian free-trade guru and economist Jagdish Bhagwati could have tilted the balance back home if he still lectured at the Indian Statistical Institute or the Delhi School of Economics rather than Columbia University.

Consider the debate over Muslim radicalization in Europe. The Dutch-Somali politician Ayaan Hirsi Ali -- famous as a writer for the documentary "Submission," about the role of women in Islam -- was making the provocative but important argument that, in the Netherlands, Dutch values should trump Islamic ones when they come into conflict. But now she's at Washington's American Enterprise Institute. And former Spanish prime minister JosÃ© MarÃ-a Aznar -- who sent his country's troops to Iraq despite deep resistance at home -- isn't spending his time in Europe debating the merits of U.S. policy; instead, he's a scholar at Georgetown and sits on the board of Rupert Murdoch's News Corp.

Hiring friendly foreigners not only cuts them out of the debate in their own countries, but also taints their reputations back home, as former Harvard academic Michael Ignatieff is learning. Ignatieff is running for the Liberal Party leadership in his native Canada, where he supports involvement in the fight against terrorism and ridicules anti-Americanism as the "patriotism of fools." In short, Ignatieff is as good as Washington can get as the leader of Canada's left-wing party.

But his political opponents are using the time he spent south of the border against him. "Michael Ignatieff wants to be prime minister of our country," columnist Paul Wells wrote in the Canadian newsweekly Macleans last week. "And just in case I'm not being clear, I mean Canada ." The many years Ignatieff spent in England don't generate anywhere near as much attention as his five-year stint as a professor in Cambridge, Mass., illustrating people's sensitivity to the notion of their leaders being seduced by the Yankee dollar -- or corrupted by superpower values.

U.S. institutions should not, obviously, bar their doors to foreigners. American universities, in particular, generate goodwill toward the United States; those who spend a few years studying here are more likely to return home and foster empathy for the American predicament. In the short term, however, even the most precocious Fulbrighters are unlikely to reshape their countries' attitudes toward the United States. Leading pro-American politicians and intellectuals from abroad are a rare commodity -- one that shouldn't be wasted here on the homefront.

The United States must export more pro-Americans than it imports. Maybe it's time to round up all these sympathetic foreigners -- and send them home.

Trade Ministers Vow To Break Log Jam (AP)

By Michael Astor, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Developing nations on Saturday called on rich countries to restart global trade talks, saying the suspension of negotiations not only threatened the current round of discussions but also the multilateral trading system itself.

The Doha Round — named after the Qatari capital where they were started in 2001 — is aimed at slashing trade barriers across the planet. But the Doha talks stalled in July over the question of rich nations' subsidies for agriculture. The meeting here was the first since the World Trade Organization discussions faltered.

Developing nations are demanding greater market access for their agricultural products while developed nations complain of barriers in emerging markets for their industrialized goods and services.

"Not only is the round threatened, but the multilateral trading system itself now faces a serious crisis," said the statement issued by the emerging market nations of the Group of 20. "This is an unacceptable situation for all developing countries."

The trade representatives from nearly 30 nations seemed determined to plow ahead even though neither side seemed prepared to give much ground.

"The simple fact that we are meeting here demonstrates our engagement with the negotiations," Brazil's Foreign Minister Celso Amorim said. "We are living a unique moment where developing companies are saying, 'We need more access and less restrictions. Failure is simply not an option.'"

Analysts said the presence of U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson, WTO chief Pascal Lamy and Japanese Agriculture Minister Shoichi Nakagawa was a positive sign but that gaps between the two groups would be difficult to bridge. The four will meet with G-20 members Sunday.

Philippe de Pontet, an analyst with the Eurasia Group consulting firm, said that an immediate resumption of talks was unrealistic.

"More plausible would be a return to the negotiating table in November or early December," he said.

But the G-20 statement made clear developing nations were unlikely to back off their key demands developed nations do away with agricultural subsidies and tariff barriers for their farm products.

"Most of the world's poor make their living out of agriculture. Their livelihood and standards of living are seriously jeopardized by subsidies and market access barriers prevailing in international agricultural trade," the statement said.

Powerful farm lobbies in the United States, Europe and Japan, however, oppose an end to subsidies, which they fear will leave them unable to compete with the flood of cheap imports.

Indian Commerce Minister Kamal Nath said it was up to the developed countries to take the lead in talks.

U.S. trade representative Schwab said she was trying to take that lead.

"I am actively seeking a new way forward for the Doha Round," Schwab said in statement.

DOJ_NMG_0060683

Supporters say a successful round will boost the global economy and lift poor countries out of misery. But opponents contend a binding WTO trade treaty will simply reap more profits for multinational companies while virtually enslaving workers in developing nations.

The entire process is rapidly running out of time because President Bush's authority to "fast track" the trade deal expires in mid-2007. The fast-track mechanism enables U.S. envoys to negotiate an agreement that can be submitted to Congress for a yes-or-no vote without amendments.

The G-20, formed in 2003, includes Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, China, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paraguay, the Philippines, South Africa, Tanzania, Thailand, Uruguay, Venezuela and Zimbabwe.

Montenegro Votes, With Post-Serbia Path Unclear (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

PODGORICA, Montenegro, Sept. 9 — Montenegrins vote in parliamentary elections on Sunday and few have any doubts who will be the winner. For 15 years, Prime Minister Milo Djukanovic, the longest-serving political leader in the Balkans, has dominated Montenegrin politics and is likely to continue to do so after the votes are counted late Sunday night.

Buoyed by electoral success in May, when referendum voters backed Mr. Djukanovic's call for Montenegro to split from Serbia and form an independent state, his two-party alliance is expected to win about 45 percent of the vote to fill the 81-seat Parliament, according to recent polling.

The margin of that expected victory will dictate the exact shape of the next government. But the real mystery is how Mr. Djukanovic — whose career was initially defined by making an alliance with the Yugoslavian leader Slobodan Milosevic and was later enhanced by breaking it — will choose to lead this country into a future seemingly free of the baggage of the former Yugoslavia.

In what has turned out to be a lackluster campaign compared with the emotional independence vote, Mr. Djukanovic has portrayed his coalition as an inevitable choice and the one best-suited to lead Montenegro to full membership in the European Union.

The Parliamentary election is "the second leg of the match we played up to May 21," he told supporters last month, referring to the May independence referendum. "After winning back our home at the referendum, at these elections we should pick a responsible caretaker."

But while he has emphasized that Montenegro is free to redefine itself, diplomats and experts here say it will have a tough time doing so, in part because of Mr. Djukanovic himself.

His tenacious hold on power — indeed, few here seemed shocked that his repeated promises to step down before this vote have gone unfulfilled — has contributed to the challenges still facing this state of 650,000 people.

Montenegro's tiny size has raised a question over its capacity to complete the complex and highly technical application process for the European Union. There are, for example, no precise figures on the number of government employees.

Vanja Calovic, the executive director of a group that is lobbying for government and administrative overhaul, said, "We are a really small country, so we have a few government employees, and on the other side our system of education does not prepare people do their jobs sufficiently well."

Montenegro's involvement in organized crime has earned it one of the worst reputations in the Balkans.

Mr. Djukanovic's government has long been at the center of corruption allegations, and it was named in a European lawsuit against American tobacco makers alleging collusion in cigarette smuggling.

Philip Morris agreed to pay $ 1.25 billion over 12 years in an out-of-court settlement with the European Union in July 2004, with the money earmarked for helping to crack down on the smuggling.

Mr. Djukanovic himself faces an arrest warrant in Italy, brought by a court there in 2004 in connection with the smuggling. He dismisses the charges as politically motivated.

After he aligned himself with Western countries pitted against Mr. Milosevic and Serbia, little international pressure was initially brought against him to end the illicit trade, which was seen by some as a crucial source of revenue for the country.

Although the recent European pressure seems to have reduced the smuggling, opposition politicians charge that Mr. Djukanovic and his allies have grown rich while in power and have little interest in real economic reform.

"Djukanovic is directly linked to the financial oligarchy in Montenegro," said Nejbojsa Medojevic, the leader of the Movement for Changes, a new opposition party that has campaigned on an anticorruption platform. "Their interests are opposed to European standards. If Djukanovic wins the elections, E.U. integration will go very, very slowly."

In a twist to the Parliamentary election campaign, a state prosecutor announced Thursday an investigation into Mr. Medojevic's purchase of an apartment in Podgorica. Mr. Medojevic — who polls show is one of Montenegro's most popular politicians but is unlikely to win enough votes to rival Mr. Djukanovic — said the inquiry was designed to discredit him before the vote on Sunday.

Others suggest that corruption in Montenegro is no worse than in any other Balkan nation. Croatia and Macedonia are beset by similar problems, said James Lyon, an analyst with the International Crisis Group, and each of those countries already has European Union candidate status.

Spain To Monitor Senegalese Coast (NYT/AFP)

By AFP

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

MADRID, Sept. 9 — Spain said Saturday that it would send planes to scan the coast of Senegal for migrants trying to sail to Europe, in a bid to stem a flood of illegal immigration from Africa to its shores.

Spain's interior minister, Alfredo Pérez Rubalcaba, announced the measure after a meeting on Friday with his Senegalese counterpart Ousmane Ngom and after 90 migrants landed overnight in a vessel on Tenerife, a Spanish island.

They were the latest of more than 22,000 illegal arrivals on Spanish soil from Africa this year. Many of the migrants have landed on the Canary Islands, a Spanish-held archipelago north of Senegal off the Moroccan coast. They often risk death, traveling in small boats, to enter Spain in hopes of finding work in Europe.

Spain and Senegal also agreed to bolster the measures in place on the Canaries to identify people arriving from Senegal, one of the main countries of origin for the wave of migrants.

The two countries signed an agreement in August for Senegal to discourage people from migrating and providing logistical help for Spain to monitor the African country's coasts.

Senegal's president, Abdoulaye Wade, criticized Spain on Thursday for what he described as its government's slowness to send adequate patrols to Senegal.

Rescue services estimate that 550 people may have died this year in unsuccessful attempts to reach the Canaries.

Ownership In Cuba Becomes Hot Issue (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

With democratization possible, exiles wonder whether they'd get back the land seized decades ago -- and how, if it all, they'd be compensated.

MIAMI — In the 1950s, when Alberto Beguiristain's family owned 130,000 acres of farmland, two sugar mills and a distillery in Cuba, their 5,000 employees earned an average of $6 a day.

Now, at the dilapidated mill in Quemado de Guines that is the sole Beguiristain enterprise still functioning, it takes the average laborer almost a month to earn $6.

Beguiristain, who now lives in Miami, says he thinks his former countrymen would welcome his return to run what's left of the family business if the ailing Fidel Castro dies and Cubans turn toward a democratic government and pro-market economy.

"My cousin went back to our hometown a few years ago," the 74-year-old insurance agent recalled. Outside the mill gates, the travelers encountered some elderly peasants. "They told her, 'We need your people. When are you coming back?' "

The question of who will own what in a post-Castro Cuba has been an intoxicating subject here since the July 31 news of the president's surgery and temporary transfer of power to his brother Raul.

But few are as optimistic as Beguiristain that the question could be resolved cleanly and simply.

Beguiristain is one of more than 150,000 Cubans who initially fled the 1959 revolution that brought Fidel Castro's guerrillas to power. Each family stripped of its property for alleged collaboration with the deposed regime of Fulgencio Batista was usually allowed to take only $5 and the clothes they were wearing.

Many of the exiles have kept tabs on their properties through friends who visit the island, or, like Beguiristain, from the Google Earth program that allows them to see satellite images on the Internet. There they get a glimpse of the time, money and energy needed for restoration.

It has been nearly half a century since Castro's revolutionaries took control of the Cuban economy. Factories were put under state management, farmland handed to cooperatives, and elegant houses carved up into small apartments and doled out to the poor.

The Communist government settled claims early on with most foreign investors, though not with U.S. owners. There are about 6,000 claims valued at nearly $8 billion registered with the U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

But the vast majority of property seized in the name of Castro's revolution was from Cuban owners, large and small. Though original owners are dying, some survive on dreams of recovering family homes, replanting gardens or rebuilding businesses opened by their ancestors.

Cuban American lawyer Nicolas Gutierrez, whose family was one of the wealthiest in Cuba before the revolution, estimates that at least $100 billion in property was taken from Cuban owners.

Although there is no formal registry of Cuban claims, Gutierrez estimates that at least 2 million people on the island or in exile may have the right, as original owners or their heirs, to claim seized assets or compensation if Cuba is democratized.

"Restitution is not only a pro-exile policy, it's a pro-Cuban policy. Most former property owners are still on the island," said Gutierrez, who was born in Miami to exile parents. "We want everyone to get what they lost."

Cuba has the advantage of learning from the mistakes and successes of new democracies in Eastern Europe, said Tania C. Mastrapa, a Miami consultant on foreign property claims who did her doctoral dissertation on ownership resolution in those post-Communist countries.

How quickly any restitution or compensation program could be enacted in Cuba depends on when and what kind of change occurs, Mastrapa said.

Flocks of former owners have descended on Mastrapa's practice in recent weeks, newly encouraged that political change is coming in Cuba because of the illness and incapacitation of 80-year-old Castro.

"I try to get my clients to hope for the best but to expect the worst," she said.

Even if transition is swift and thorough, a Communist-controlled judiciary will probably still be in power during the crucial early days — and therefore in charge of administering privatization and setting terms for resolving multiple claims and ethical conflicts.

In Eastern Europe, private ownership has been restored with an array of privatization, restitution and compensation programs.

In Latvia, residential property that had been seized from owners after the 1940 Soviet takeover was occupied — sometimes for decades — by other families.

The new Latvian government crafted a seven-year property ownership transition period after the country broke from the Soviet Union in 1991, leaving original owners and occupants to negotiate rents or buyouts and providing arbitration for the few irreconcilable cases.

Mastrapa conducted an informal survey of Cuban exiles with property claims. She said she was surprised to learn that most would be willing to accept some other form of compensation if their property was irreparable or being used for a socially redeeming purpose. Only 23% insisted on restitution.

Over the years, Cuba's government has equated any steps toward capitalism with an invasion of property-grabbing exiles. Some exiles with more recent experience of life on the island warn that the property issue is hypersensitive and that owners should come to terms with their losses.

"It's a page in ancient history, and it would be sheer madness from the political standpoint to be making claims," said Domingo Amuchastegui, a former Cuban intelligence official who defected in 1994.

Restoring private property and settling outstanding claims are among the transitional issues addressed in the 2004 report by the U.S. Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba, which lays out over nearly 450 pages Washington's priorities for rebuilding democratic and free-market institutions in Cuba.

Amuchastegui criticized the Bush administration report as presumptuously advising Cubans on what reforms they should undertake, and he warned that it fed into the Castro regime's propaganda meant to frighten Cubans about change.

"The U.S. government, if requested by a transition Cuban government, could help establish a structure for addressing property expropriations," the report says, detailing a legal and judicial process for Cubans to follow.

Cuban American social leaders agree the issue is delicate and divisive.

"Cuban exiles are not going to go back and boot people out of their homes," said Alfredo Mesa, executive director of the Cuban American National Foundation.

Attorney Gaston Cantens represents the Fanjul family, which lost sugar mills, farmland and homes in Cuba but rebuilt in Palm Beach County into Florida Crystals, the state's largest sugar producer. Cantens says that recovering property is "in the back of everyone's mind," but that most exiles are more focused on seeing democracy brought to their native land.

Recalling the Eastern European success in restoring property, Cantens added: "I can't imagine in Cuba there is not going to be a similar process. But I don't think you're going to have people knocking on doors saying, 'This is my home, you've got to leave.' "

Still, it remains uncertain whether, when and what kind of change is ahead for Cuba — a Western-style democracy, the Chinese model or some hybrid.

Though most former owners are in their 70s or older, they refuse to concede that they are unlikely to live to see their properties returned to them.

That hope dies last is evident in the long-nurtured dreams of exiles like Beguiristain to once again see the land of their birth and the backdrop of their youth.

Beguiristain, who moves slowly and with a cane after knee surgery this year, said that he would never displace Cubans from the residential properties his family lost but that he would eagerly return to a free Cuba to try to breathe life into his family's dying businesses.

"I hope that it is in my lifetime," he said with a dejected glance at his swollen leg. "I think once it gets going, it's going to be almost immediately. Once they get an elected government, they'll need to reconstruct everything."

He's ready to leave his spacious home and the comforts he built for himself and his family to be part of that reconstruction, he said, noting that his son's power boat is gassed up and ready to depart for Havana at the first sign from either government that U.S. investment is welcome on the island.

Reason On Holiday In Mexico (WP)

By Ruben Navarrette Jr.

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- The long wait is over in Mexico, where the top electoral court has declared a winner in a presidential election held two months ago. The hope is that things will calm down.

Don't bet on it.

Having lost the election, a left-wing populist with a flair for the dramatic labels his opponents "criminals" and vows to set up a shadow government.

DOJ_NMG_0060687

About 150 equally dramatic legislators in Congress take control of the podium and prevent the sitting president from delivering his final state-of-the-nation address. In the streets, protesters throw rocks and bottles at police and stage sit-ins at makeshift shantytowns.

Who needs a presidential address? The state of the nation is obvious: Mexico has gone mad.

More so than usual, I mean. Our neighbor to the south is no model of stability. If that were the case, it wouldn't be hemorrhaging its best people -- the daring young men and women whose optimism leads them north in search of a better wage. There wouldn't be polls showing that nearly half of Mexicans would migrate to the United States if they could.

Still, economic instability is one thing. Political turmoil is a whole different headache. As long as the issue has a binational dimension to it, Mexican elites can dodge accountability by spinning it as Mexico vs. the United States. Concerned that Mexico can't provide opportunities for its people? What you should be concerned about, the elites say, is how los americanos treat your sons and daughters in el norte .

With political turmoil, there is no place to hide. It is Mexico vs. Mexico -- in this case, middle-class Mexico vs. poor Mexico.

Never mind the rich. They're yesterday's news. They still have resources, but their candidates don't have the popular support to win elections without dealing from the bottom of the deck. The party that many of them backed, the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), came in third in the presidential race, lost seats in Congress and teeters on the brink of extinction.

The real struggle is between those in the middle class who are afraid to lose what they have earned and the poor who have nothing to lose.

A few months ago, before Mexican voters went to the polls on July 2 to select a new president, I suggested that Mexico needed a revolution. I also said that such a thing would never come to pass if pro-business conservative Felipe CalderÃ³n got more votes than left-wing populist AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador.

I was one for two. I was right that Mexico needs a revolution; the poor have had enough of being swindled and preyed upon -- first by the rich and then by the middle class. In fact, the poor are so accustomed to this sort of treatment that it's easy to see why they have taken to the streets. But I was wrong that a CalderÃ³n victory would preserve the status quo. Instead, that victory -- and how it came to be -- may just send the country into a tailspin.

Which is not to say that LÃ³pez Obrador was the better choice. Just take a look at his loco behavior since the election, and you'll see: He's not ready for prime time.

After the initial count showed CalderÃ³n winning by about 243,000 votes out of 41 million ballots cast, LÃ³pez Obrador called for a full recount. Election officials granted a partial one.

There was nothing wrong with LÃ³pez Obrador's asking for a recount. It was a close election. Wrong was when he went on television before the recount was completed and unilaterally declared himself the president-elect. Wrong was when he accused his political opponents -- including CalderÃ³n -- of orchestrating a coup d'etat and then charged that Mexico's electoral tribunal had gone along with it. Wrong was when LÃ³pez Obrador called for democracy and then wiped his feet on the democratic outcome when it didn't go his way.

Poor CalderÃ³n. He has an uphill climb. The first goal of his presidency has to be to convince the poor and the disaffected that they have a voice and he's listening to it. The president-elect can also expect to battle rival factions in Congress.

That includes those feisty legislators from LÃ³pez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) who caused the scene last week by preventing Mexican President Vicente Fox from speaking. The lawmakers said they were protesting voter fraud and the theft of an election.

The protest wasn't supposed to happen. CalderÃ³n's supporters had hoped that the PRD would part ways with LÃ³pez Obrador over his antics and concentrate on building on its significant gains in Congress.

That approach makes sense. It is practical and reasonable and mature, which explains why some Mexicans want nothing to do with it.

Turkey At The Tipping Point (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0060688

After a Kurdish group claimed responsibility for a series of recent bombings in Turkey that killed three civilians and injured many others, the United States appointed a retired Air Force general and former NATO commander, Joseph Ralston, to work with Turkish authorities. General Ralston will be responsible for coordinating American antiterrorist efforts with Iraq and Turkey, both of which have sizable Kurdish minorities — and minorities within those minorities who have resorted to terror.

The Turkish foreign ministry hailed the appointment as a "new opportunity" for cooperation between the United States and Turkey.

The United States would be wise to create many more and varied opportunities to engage with Turkey, a longtime ally, and a uniquely important one. Turkey is a predominantly Muslim, secular democracy, situated between Europe and the Middle East. After years of trying to make amends for having suppressed its Kurdish population, often brutally, Turkey has seen violence resume of late. The United States needs to frankly acknowledge that instability in Iraq, on Turkey's southeast border, has fomented instability in Turkey. That morally obligates the United States to help with corrective action.

Equally important, a renewed focus on Turkey is in the United States' self interest. Last week, the nonprofit German Marshall Fund of the United States released the results of its annual survey of public opinion in the United States and 12 countries in Europe, including Turkey. The survey's most striking finding is the degree to which Turks now question their ties to the United States and Europe, and have warmed to Iran, their neighbor to the east.

The discontent appears anchored in Turks' overwhelming disapproval of President Bush's handling of international affairs and growing disapproval of European Union leadership. Both are manifest in waning Turkish support for the institutions that have bound Turkey to the West. Though Turkey has been a staunch NATO member since 1952, only 44 percent of Turks in this year's survey agreed that NATO was essential for Turkey's security, versus 52 percent in 2005. Even though Turkey opened official membership talks with the European Union last year — after strenuous efforts to meet the union's criteria — only 54 percent of Turks now view membership as a good thing, versus 73 percent in 2004.

As Turks see it, their support over decades for the West and for democracy has been rewarded with severe regional tension brought on by the United States, and by a cold shoulder, particularly from France and Austria, ever since Turkey qualified for European Union accession talks.

The appointment of General Ralston may help the United States to re-engage with Turkey, though ending Kurdish violence and tensions requires mainly political solutions. The United States can also help to keep Turkey's aspiration to join the European Union on track, by advocating more openly for resolution of the division of Cyprus between Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

The United States must not ever take Turkey for granted.

TERRORISM NEWS:

What Has Risen From The Rubble (CHIT)

By Alberto Gonzales, Attorney General Of The US
Chicago Tribune, September 10, 2006
Strength, solidarity will defeat terror

Anniversaries, whether celebratory or somber, are times to reflect, but more important, to look forward.

On Monday, our enemies are certain to be doing just that. We must as well.

The terrorist network views Sept. 11, 2001, as a success to be matched or exceeded. They are, we are quite certain, planning future large-scale attacks right now, today--as our nation remembers and honors the victims of Sept. 11. The killers' approach is dangerously flexible; they are always seeking new angles from which to strike.

Their flexibility makes them a considerable opponent. Our flexibility, cohesion and resolve must be stronger than theirs to win this war.

Our network--made up of federal, state, local and international law enforcement and intelligence organizations--proved itself to be quite agile after the Sept. 11 attacks shocked the conscience of the world. We quickly put into place new structures while tearing down walls that had slowed or even halted intergovernment communication. Our military moved quickly to tear down Al Qaeda's "home base" in Afghanistan.

We destroyed training camps, cut off funding channels and disrupted means of communication. We have captured or killed many of Al Qaeda's key leaders.

Our counterstrikes have forced the enemy to reorganize and take a new approach; such is the course of an extended war with a clever and patient enemy.

The Internet is an important tool for terrorists. Extremist Web sites are inspiring disaffected souls in neighborhoods all over the world to join a global fight that is a perversion of the good faith of Islam. "Recruits" are encouraged to identify and join forces with other like-minded individuals. Sometimes these "homegrown" terrorists are in communication with Al Qaeda, sometimes they are simply motivated by Al Qaeda's ideology.

This new trend is a serious threat. From London to Madrid to the U.S., we are seeing evidence of the trend, but our network has already found ways to deal with it. We have disrupted plots and put homegrown radicals behind bars. In early August, British authorities disrupted what would have been a major terrorist attack with massive casualties.

Last summer, police officers in Los Angeles uncovered a plot by local radicals to attack government buildings and a synagogue. Working with state and federal partners on an FBI-led Joint Terrorism Task Force, they were able to "connect the dots" and arrest and prosecute those would-be killers who were robbing gas stations to raise money for their plot.

As the homegrown threat continues to develop, we must outpace the terrorists' level of organization and sophistication--because when our network is really working together, we can uncover and disrupt their deadly activities. Disruption and prosecution are the keys to protecting the American people from homegrown radicals.

As terrorist leaders search for new recruits all over the world, we must add to our network, identify new partners and strengthen existing relationships, particularly in the Muslim community. Because a clear expression of opposition to acts of terrorism from Muslim leaders is an essential part of our efforts to win, and end, this war.

The U.S. government and its citizens must be good, trustworthy neighbors to Muslim communities. Building strong relationships can take years, and we are really just beginning. This step will make identifying and investigating radical elements faster and more efficient for law enforcement. Ultimately, it will help disrupt terrorist plots.

There can be no question that it takes a network to defeat a network. As we look forward on this anniversary, let's also look to each other and reinforce the ties that make our network stronger than theirs.

Bush's Detainee Plan Assailed (WP)

By Charles Babington And R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Military Lawyers and Senators Call Proposed Rules Unfair

President Bush's campaign to sharply limit the courtroom rights of suspected terrorists ran into opposition Thursday from key Republican senators and even top uniformed military lawyers, who said it would violate basic principles of justice.

The military lawyers told a House panel that they particularly object to Bush's bid to allow terrorism suspects to be convicted on secret evidence that is withheld from the defendants, an objection embraced by at least three prominent members of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

One of those is John McCain (R-Ariz.), a former Vietnam War prisoner and a 2008 presidential hopeful who faces a political dilemma. He has won acclaim for standing up to Bush on issues such as humane treatment of detainees, but he also is eager to build conservative support for the GOP primaries. Several colleagues cautioned McCain and the others to stick with Bush on the tribunals question, and House leaders scheduled a vote in two weeks on legislation likely to mirror the White House's proposal.

The day's events suggest that Republicans may spend a good portion of the 109th Congress's final weeks trying to resolve an issue that could factor heavily in the Nov. 7 elections. Earlier divisions among Senate Republicans on issues such as immigration have contributed to legislative stalemates, and party leaders are eager to avoid a similar impasse over detainee trials.

Bush placed the issue near the top of the political agenda Wednesday when he announced that several top al-Qaeda suspects have been moved from secret CIA-run prisons to the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The president suggested that Congress will be to blame if it fails to approve his proposals for prosecuting the detainees under guidelines that critics say are unconstitutional and unfair.

Lawmakers in both parties agree that enemy combatants should be afforded fewer rights than defendants enjoy in civil trials or, for the most part, in military courts-martial. But several uniformed military lawyers told the House Armed Services Committee Thursday that the White House goes too far in seeking to convict detainees on classified information never shared with the suspects.

"I am not aware of any situation in the world where there is a system of jurisprudence that is recognized by civilized people where an individual can be tried and convicted without seeing the evidence against him," said Brigadier Gen. James C. Walker, staff judge advocate to the Marine Corps commandant.

Bush's high-profile drive for his version of the legislation has been particularly awkward for the three Republican senators who circulated a different bill earlier this week: McCain; Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (Va.), a former Navy secretary; and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), a former Air Force lawyer.

A GOP Senate aide, who asked that he not be identified because of the nature of the deliberations, predicted the trio will find it difficult to hold their ground because they are defending "a bloodless legal principle" while the White House is pushing the politically popular idea of convicting those accused of the 2001 atrocities.

But virtually all Senate Democrats, and at least a few more Republicans, appear sympathetic to Warner, McCain and Graham. Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) said in an interview that he takes very seriously the testimony of the uniformed lawyers. He also said Bush was "unwise" to come close to threatening Congress in his Wednesday speech.

Under Bush's proposal, any detainees eventually put forward for trial -- a group that may or may not include all 14 suspects who figured in Wednesday's announcement -- could be convicted or acquitted under conditions that differ sharply from those in standard U.S. criminal trials. The "jury" in a trial by the commissions not involving the death penalty would consist of at least five military officers, and in death penalty cases a dozen officers. A presiding officer, dubbed the military "judge" and possessing legal training or experience, would decide all legal matters but would not vote.

Those eligible for such military trials would be any foreigners deemed "unlawful enemy combatants," a term the administration defines more broadly than Bush did in an executive order shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks. That category would include not just al-Qaeda and Taliban members, but also anyone who is affiliated with a "force or organization" engaged in hostilities against the United States and its allies, who commits hostile acts for such groups, or -- most broadly -- who "supports hostilities" that aid such groups.

Terrorism would be only one of 27 offenses that could be charged under the Bush plan; the others include conspiracy, hostage-taking, torture, rape and hijacking.

During the trials, prosecutors would be permitted to use classified information to secure convictions; defendants and their lawyers would not be told about such information. Prosecutors could also rely on hearsay, or evidence obtained indirectly, and evidence obtained by coercion if the panel's chief deemed it reliable and directly related to the accusations.

A rival set of rules circulated earlier this week by Warner, McCain and Graham would bar any use in the trials of secret evidence or information obtained from "cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment" and would admit information from coercive interrogations only if the military judge found it reliable and pertinent. The proposal would allow trials to be closed only to protect information that would damage national security, leaving out any reference to "the public interest" as a reason.

Bill Would Ease CIA Interrogation Limits (WP/AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The Washington Post/AP, September 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- To many of President Bush's allies, it is time to free intelligence officials from "legislative purgatory" and get the CIA back in the business of effective interrogations of suspected terrorists.

That chance could come this week if the Senate takes up a White House proposal limiting the punishable offenses that CIA interrogators may face when questioning "high-value" terrorist suspects. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., is expected to begin debate on the bill as early as Tuesday.

Through omissions and legal definitions, the proposal could authorize harsh techniques that critics contend potentially violate the Geneva Conventions, which govern the treatment of war prisoners. These methods include hypothermia, stress positions and "waterboarding," a practice of simulated drowning.

The bill would keep in law prohibitions on war crimes such as rape and torture that are widely accepted as illegal.

The proposal would apply back to 2001 the Bush administration's standards for treatment of detainees. That would shield CIA personnel from liability under a 1996 law intended to uphold the Geneva Conventions, since the fight against terrorism began and harsher interrogation methods were approved.

The New York Times, meanwhile, reported in a story posted Saturday on its Web site for Sunday newspapers that sharp differences arose between the CIA and the FBI over tactics used in the questioning of Abu Zubaydah at a safe house in Thailand in the spring of 2002.

In a speech last Wednesday, Bush cited the questioning of Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells, in saying that questioning of various terrorists in CIA custody has played a role in the capture or questioning of nearly every senior al-Qaida member or associate detained by the U.S. and its allies.

The Times said interviews with "nearly a dozen" officials that it did not identify showed disagreements over the interrogation methods used on Zubaydah exposed a rupture between the FBI and CIA that has yet to heal.

"It would be improper for us to comment on operational issues involving any sensitive or ongoing matters," FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko said Saturday in response to the Times story. "It is also important to note that we have a strong and vital partnership with the CIA. We work together every day to ensure the safety of Americans everywhere."

Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has developed his own plan to address concerns he has related to the military commissions that would prosecute terrorism detainees. According to a draft copy of the bill, his legislation also may amend that 1996 law, the War Crimes Act.

Bush sent his plan to Capitol Hill last Wednesday, the same day the Pentagon issued rules forbidding military personnel from using those same harsh techniques.

"The net effect is that at least some of the alternative techniques are rendered, in effect, lawful" for the CIA, said Martin Lederman, a Georgetown law professor and former legal adviser at the Justice Department during the Clinton administration.

Lederman and other legal experts, along with human rights activists, say the White House proposal would undermine the 1949 Geneva Conventions by providing a more narrow definition of objectionable treatment.

"I think that's the bombshell ... because no other country has done that," said Elisa Massimino, the Washington director for Human Rights First. "And once we do, we lower the floor and the whole structure could crumble."

But according to conservatives, the move was necessary to repair damage done to the White House's intelligence program since a Supreme Court ruling in June. The court ruled against Bush's claim that interrogators did not have to comply with the Geneva Conventions when dealing with members of al-Qaida.

The court's decision to grant suspected terrorists certain rights potentially exposed Americans to prosecution under the War Crimes Act. The result, conservatives say, was a profound cooling effect on the CIA interrogation program.

"We're interviewing, not interrogating," said Sen. Pat Roberts, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Roberts, R-Kan., said in a recent interview that he believes intelligence officials are frozen in a type of "legislative purgatory." He said that keeps them from wanting to "walk up to the line, as has been the case before where we got 50 percent of our intelligence on what the terrorists were doing."

Tom Crispell, a CIA spokesman, declined comment on the agency's program.

According to recent public opinion polls, Roberts is not alone with his concerns. In an August poll conducted by Time, 55 percent of those surveyed said they support the harsh interrogation methods sometimes used to obtain information from prisoners in Iraq and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. In a separate poll also by Time, 15 percent of respondents favored torture, even though it is against the law.

Such a willingness to be tough on terrorists could help Bush push a hard line on his legislation. At the same the president is asking Congress to amend the War Crimes Act and establish military tribunals to try detainees, he also wants lawmakers to approve the National Security Agency's terrorist surveillance program.

The effort is seen by many critics as an election-season push to expand his authorities to monitor suspected terrorists at a time when lawmakers from both parties are selling themselves as tough on terrorism.

At A Secret Interrogation, Dispute Flared Over Tactics (NYT)

By David Johnston

WASHINGTON, Sept. 9 — Abu Zubaydah, the first Osama bin Laden henchman captured by the United States after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, was bloodied and feverish when a C.I.A. security team delivered him to a secret safe house in Thailand for interrogation in the early spring of 2002. Bullet fragments had ripped through his abdomen and groin during a firefight in Pakistan several days earlier when he had been captured.

The events that unfolded at the safe house over the next few weeks proved to be fateful for the Bush administration. Within days, Mr. Zubaydah was being subjected to coercive interrogation techniques — he was stripped, held in an icy room and jarred by earsplittingly loud music — the genesis of practices later adopted by some within the military, and widely used by the Central Intelligence Agency in handling prominent terrorism suspects at secret overseas prisons.

President Bush pointedly cited the capture and interrogation of Mr. Zubaydah in his speech last Wednesday announcing the transfer of Mr. Zubaydah and 13 others to the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. And he used it to call for ratification of the tough techniques employed in the questioning.

But rather than the smooth process depicted by Mr. Bush, interviews with nearly a dozen current and former law enforcement and intelligence officials briefed on the process show, the interrogation of Mr. Zubaydah was fraught with sharp disputes, debates about the legality and utility of harsh interrogation methods, and a rupture between the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the C.I.A. that has yet to heal.

Some of those interviewed offered sharply contrasting accounts, but all said that the disagreements were intense. More than four years later, these disputes are foreshadowing the debate that Mr. Bush's new proposals are meeting in Congress, as lawmakers wrangle about what rules should apply as terrorism suspects are captured, questioned and, possibly, tried before military tribunals.

A reconstruction of Mr. Zubaydah's initial days of detention and interrogation, based on accounts by former and current law enforcement and intelligence officials in a series of recent interviews, provides the first detailed account of his treatment and the disputes and uncertainties that surrounded it. The basic chronology of how the capture and interrogation unfolded was described consistently by sources from a number of government agencies.

The officials spoke on the condition that they not be identified because many aspects of the handling of Mr. Zubaydah remain classified and because some of the officials may be witnesses in future prosecutions involving Mr. Zubaydah.

This week, President Bush said that he had not and never would approve the use of torture. The C.I.A. declined to discuss the specifics of the case on the record. At F.B.I. headquarters, officials refused to publicly discuss the interrogation of Mr. Zubaydah, citing what they said were "operational sensitivities."

Some of the officials who were interviewed for this article were briefed on the events as they occurred. Others were provided with accounts of the interrogation later.

Before his capture, Mr. Zubaydah was regarded as a top bin Laden logistics chief who funneled recruits to training bases in Afghanistan and served as a communications link between Al Qaeda's leadership and extremists in other countries.

As interrogators dug into his activities, however, they scaled back their assessment somewhat, viewing him more as the terror network's personnel director and hotelier who ran a string of guest houses in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Mr. Zubaydah's whereabouts in Pakistan had been determined in part through intercepted Internet communications, but for days after his capture his identity was in doubt. He had surgically altered his appearance and was using an alias. But when agents used a nickname for Mr. Zubaydah, he acknowledged his true identity, which was confirmed through analysis of his voice, facial structure and DNA tests.

By all accounts, Mr. Zubaydah's condition was rapidly deteriorating when he arrived in Thailand. Soon after his capture, Mr. Zubaydah nearly died of his infected wounds. At one point, he was covertly rushed to a hospital after C.I.A. medical officers warned that he might not survive if he did not receive more extensive medical treatment.

According to accounts from five former and current government officials who were briefed on the case, F.B.I. agents — accompanied by intelligence officers — initially questioned him using standard interview techniques. They bathed Mr. Zubaydah, changed his bandages, gave him water, urged improved medical care, and spoke with him in Arabic and English, languages in which he is fluent.

To convince him they knew details of his activities, the agents brought a box of blank audiotapes which they said contained recordings of his phone conversations, but were actually empty. As the F.B.I. worked with C.I.A. officers who were present, Mr. Zubaydah soon began to provide intelligence insights into Al Qaeda.

For the C.I.A., Mr. Zubaydah was a test case for an evolving new role, conceived after Sept. 11, in which the agency was to act as jailer and interrogator for terrorism suspects.

According to accounts by three former intelligence officials, the C.I.A. understood that the legal foundation for its role had been spelled out in a sweeping classified directive signed by Mr. Bush on Sept. 17, 2001. The directive, known as a memorandum of notification, authorized the C.I.A. for the first time to capture, detain and interrogate terrorism suspects, providing the foundation for what became its secret prison system.

That 2001 directive did not spell out specific guidelines for interrogations, however, and senior C.I.A. officials began in late 2001 and early 2002 to draw up a list of aggressive interrogation procedures that might be used against terrorism suspects. They consulted agency psychiatrists and foreign governments to identify effective techniques beyond standard interview practices.

After Mr. Zubaydah's capture, a C.I.A. interrogation team was dispatched from the agency's counterterrorism center to take the lead in his questioning, former law enforcement and intelligence officials said, and F.B.I. agents were withdrawn. The group included an agency consultant schooled in the harsher interrogation procedures to which American special forces are subjected in their training. Three former intelligence officials said the techniques had been drawn up on the basis of legal guidance from the Justice Department, but were not yet supported by a formal legal opinion.

In Thailand, the new C.I.A. team concluded that under standard questioning Mr. Zubaydah was revealing only a small fraction of what he knew, and decided that more aggressive techniques were warranted.

At times, Mr. Zubaydah, still weak from his wounds, was stripped and placed in a cell without a bunk or blankets. He stood or lay on the bare floor, sometimes with air-conditioning adjusted so that, one official said, Mr. Zubaydah seemed to turn blue. At other times, the interrogators piped in deafening blasts of music by groups like the Red Hot Chili Peppers. Sometimes, the interrogator would use simpler techniques, entering his cell to ask him to confess.

"You know what I want," the interrogator would say to him, according to one official's account, departing leaving Mr. Zubaydah to brood over his answer.

F.B.I. agents on the scene angrily protested the more aggressive approach, arguing that persuasion rather than coercion had succeeded. But leaders of the C.I.A. interrogation team were convinced that tougher tactics were warranted and said that the methods had been authorized by senior lawyers at the White House.

The agents appealed to their superiors but were told that the intelligence agency was in charge, the officials said. One law enforcement official who was aware of events as they occurred reacted with chagrin. "When you rough these guys up, all you do is fulfill their fantasies about what to expect from us," the official said.

Mr. Bush on Wednesday acknowledged the use of aggressive interview techniques, but only in the most general terms. "We knew that Zubaydah had more information that could save innocent lives, but he stopped talking," Mr. Bush said. He said the C.I.A. had used "an alternative set of procedures'' after it became clear that Mr. Zubaydah "had received training on how to resist interrogation.

"These procedures were designed to be safe, to comply with our laws, our Constitution and our treaty obligations,'' Mr. Bush said. "The Department of Justice reviewed the authorized methods extensively and determined them to be lawful.''

In his early interviews, Mr. Zubaydah had revealed what turned out to be important information, identifying Khalid Shaikh Mohammed — from a photo on a hand-held computer — as the chief planner of the Sept. 11 attacks. Mr. Zubaydah also identified Jose Padilla, an American citizen who has been charged with terrorism-related crimes.

But Mr. Zubaydah dismissed Mr. Padilla as a maladroit extremist whose hope to construct a dirty bomb, using conventional explosives to disperse radioactive materials, was far-fetched. He told his questioners that Mr. Padilla was ignorant on the subject of nuclear physics and believed he could separate plutonium from nuclear material by rapidly swinging over his head a bucket filled with fissionable material.

Crucial aspects of what happened during Mr. Zubaydah's interrogation are sharply disputed. Some former and current government officials briefed on the case, who were more closely allied with law enforcement, said Mr. Zubaydah cooperated with F.B.I. interviewers until the C.I.A. interrogation team arrived. They said that Mr. Zubaydah's resistance began after the agency interrogators began using more stringent tactics.

Other officials, more closely tied to intelligence agencies, dismissed that account, saying that the C.I.A. had supervised all interviews with Mr. Zubaydah, including those in which F.B.I. agents asked questions. These officials said that he proved a wily adversary. "He was lying, and things were going nowhere," one official briefed on the matter said of the early interviews. "It was clear that he had information about an imminent attack and time was of the essence."

Several officials said the belief that Mr. Zubaydah might have possessed critical information about a coming terrorist operation figured significantly in the decision to employ tougher tactics, even though it later became apparent he had no such knowledge.

"As the president has made clear, the fact of the matter is that Abu Zubaydah was defiant and evasive until the approved procedures were used," one government official said. "He soon began to provide information on key Al Qaeda operators to help us find and capture those responsible for the 9/11 attacks."

This official added, "When you are concerned that a hard-core terrorist has information about an imminent threat that could put innocent lives at risk, rapport-building and stroking aren't the top things on your agenda."

A Terror Trial, With Or Without Due Process (NYT)

By Jeffrey Rosen

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

SOME debates are so polarized, with the competing sides so certain that any compromise would be dangerous, that it's hard to imagine any middle ground emerging.

The argument over how to try the 14 terror suspects recently transferred from Central Intelligence Agency prisons to military custody at Guantánamo Bay seems to be one of them.

On one side is the Bush administration, which last week proposed that these suspects, whom it called the most dangerous in the war on terror, should be tried in military commissions under procedures that the White House asked Congress to endorse.

Under the Bush proposal, the trials would not resemble any civilian trials or courts-martial held in the United States. Hearsay evidence and evidence obtained under coercion or duress could be admitted. And suspects could be denied access to classified evidence, although it would be disclosed to their military defense lawyers.

On the other side of this debate are civil libertarians who insist that suspected terrorists can't receive fair trials unless they are given the protections of an ordinary court-martial — including the right to exclude hearsay and coerced evidence and the right to see evidence against them.

So, what's a fair trial and how much due process does it require? Can the suspected terrorists be tried by a tribunal that lacks some of the protections that military defendants ordinarily demand? Surprisingly enough, this is not a debate about what the law requires. Short of endorsing cruel and unusual punishments for terrorists, Congress can set up whatever military commissions it likes.

"The administration's proposals, if adopted by Congress, would almost surely pass muster with the Supreme Court," said Peter Spiro, who teaches international law at Temple University. "Congress may not have complete carte blanche, but in the Hamdan case last June, four of the justices who voted against the commissions stressed that the president could always go back to Congress to get the authority he wanted."

The issue, then, is more about the court of public opinion: how a trial, without the customary procedural rights, would be perceived in the United States and abroad.

Inevitably, the military commissions, whatever form they take, will be compared to the Nuremberg trials in which Nazi war crime defendants were given due process — up to a point.

"At Nuremberg, there was no secret evidence and no closed proceedings that the defendants' counsel was excluded from, although it's not clear how much physical access to the evidence the individual defendants had," said John Barrett, who teaches at St. John's University law school. "Hearsay and evidence produced by coercive methods weren't formally excluded by the Nuremberg charter, but the American interrogators didn't do rough stuff like water boarding — although there might have been a corner or two cut that the coercion standard would find troubling."

Many want the United States to meet this Nuremberg standard, which they believe gave it authority and credibility over the next half century to serve as a global model of due process.

"The trials shouldn't differ fundamentally from the fair trial provisions in any trial, especially when you have the potential death penalty or life in prison," said Richard Goldstone, the South African chief prosecutor of the United Nations International

Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. “To exclude a defendant from any part of the trial, or to withhold evidence from the defendant, seems to me, by any civilized standard, outside what is acceptable.”

He added, “The other objectionable provision is that evidence would be admitted even if obtained under duress or torture.”

But other legal scholars say that this is a different time. For one thing, they point out, the war is not over. “In a war situation, international commissions often use hearsay as long as it’s reliable,” said Jack Goldsmith of Harvard Law School, who led the Office of Legal Counsel under President Bush.

Other scholars who defend the administration argue that national security cannot be compromised.

“The issue of access to classified information is pivotal,” says John Yoo, who helped the Bush administration draft an earlier version of the proposed commissions and who now teaches law at University of California, Berkeley. In his new book, “War By Other Means,” Professor Yoo argues that in the first World Trade Center bombing case in 1993, prosecutors had to give the defense a list of 200 unindicted co-conspirators. The list, he writes, was “delivered to bin Laden” ” and “was later found during the investigation of the African embassy bombings.”

Republicans in Congress are now negotiating with the Bush administration on a series of compromises. The military commissions may operate closer to the Nuremberg standard, but give the administration some of the authority it seeks. For example, one proposal would allow the use of hearsay and evidence obtained through coercion short of torture, while refusing to allow the use of evidence not disclosed to the defendant.

Could this satisfy critics? Some legal scholars suggest that a trial conducted along these lines could have international legitimacy as well as meeting basic standards of due process. Even Mr. Goldstone, the chief prosecutor for the U.N. tribunals, says that jettisoning the use of secret evidence would remove the “most objectionable” part of the proposal.

Professor Spiro of Temple University agrees. “The Republican moderates’ proposal would come a lot closer to satisfying international opinion, and in part because it’s coming from the Senate and not the administration,” he said.

Still, the atmospherics of the trial, and the fact that the defendants face the death penalty, may make it harder for the verdict to be internationally accepted.

“Guantánamo is now a rallying cry in Europe, so any trials that take place there will be tainted by that fact alone,” Professor Spiro said. “The administration would be well advised to allow the proceedings to be televised to avoid the image of a show trial.”

But televised proceedings might give the defendants a political platform to hijack the proceedings. “There’s always a danger that this will degenerate into a political circus,” says Professor Goldsmith. “Slobodan Milosevic used the trial against him as a political platform, and Saddam Hussein is doing the same thing. The more procedural rights you give the defendant, the more you allow him to continue the war by other means.”

Professor Goldsmith says the debate about what a fair trial requires will continue throughout every stage of the terrorist trials — from the initial indictments to the actual trials to the Supreme Court appeals that would follow any death sentence. “There’s a trade-off,” he said. “You can clamp down on access, but you do so at the cost of the perception of fairness, and finding the right balance of fairness and control is very hard.”

Not Just Because Bush Says So (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

The Bush administration is marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks this week with a charm offensive touting its War on Terror. At the less charming end of the spectrum: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's nasty attacks on war critics. More charming: President Bush's new willingness to empty secret CIA prisons and put the alleged 9/11 ringleaders on trial. But what's missing from all these election-season defenses of the government's actions is the same ingredient that has always been missing: a fair-minded balancing of what's been lost against what's been gained.

Like the administration's old rationalizations for the fight against terrorism, the new ones write off critics as appeasers or suggest that the United States is foiling terrorism plots through "alternative interrogation procedures." The president claims that every suspension of the laws of war, the Geneva Conventions and domestic civil liberties is justified because it is necessary, and is necessary because he says so. There is no recognition that important freedoms are lost; that waterboarding prisoners is more than "tough, and . . . safe, and lawful" or that programs such as the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance of citizens carry a price.

That is why Richard A. Posner, a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit, is such a welcome voice in the national debate about freedom vs. security. Posner is renowned -- and not always in a good way -- for putting a price tag on everything . But whatever quibbles liberals may have with his law-and-economics approach to issues such as rape and unwanted pregnancies, they should celebrate the rigor he brings to the problem of civil liberties in wartime. In his new book, "Not a Suicide Pact: The Constitution in a Time of National Emergency," Posner approaches the wartime civil liberties problem in precisely the manner the Bush administration will not: with a dispassionate weighing of what is won against what is forsaken each time the government engages in data mining, indefinite detentions or the suppression of free speech.

Posner first quickly dispenses with the notion of an immutable Constitution; indeed, as Instapundit blogger Glenn Reynolds and his wife recently discovered in an interview with the judge, Posner may even be embracing the liberal concept of an evolving "living constitution" that keeps pace with modern life. But if one agrees that the boundaries of what is "constitutional" are almost completely mutable, one can easily appreciate Posner's approach to determining which suspensions of constitutional rights are justifiable in wartime.

Posner concludes that broader government surveillance powers, computerized data mining, zealous deterrence of media leaks and even "coercive interrogation up to and including torture" are all constitutionally permissible against an unprecedented new threat. And though I may differ with him on the balances he strikes between liberty and safety, I find his essential project -- the notion that fundamentalist terrorism is not quite a crime, and not quite a war; and that new systems require meticulous calibration -- vastly preferable to the all-or-nothing vision of Bush and his lawyers.

By virtue of his analysis, Posner even criticizes a few Bush administration decisions. He questions, for instance, the decision to suspend the right to habeas corpus of U.S. citizens or foreign terrorism suspects captured in the United States, because he thinks the cost of indefinite detention exceeds the gain in public safety. It is precisely this kind of exercise that makes Posner's book so important, as voters begin the preelection analysis of which elements of the president's surveillance, detention and prosecution strategy have made us safer -- and which have made us less free.

But if we are really to follow Posner's lead and undertake a sober national assessment of the costs and benefits of suspending civil liberties, we need better information on, well, the costs and the benefits. Surely Posner would agree that a good consumer is an informed consumer. But is anyone informed enough to engage in such an analysis?

For instance, Posner seems to share Bush's assumption that torture is, broadly speaking, worth it, that it extracts information that can disrupt terrorism plots. He goes on to argue that even in the face of anti-torture statutes, there is a moral obligation -- in, say, ticking time-bomb situations -- for leaders to exercise a form of civil disobedience and ignore the statutes.

But without fuller information on who is being tortured, and how, and for how long, and how many false confessions are elicited, how is a meaningful cost-benefit assessment possible? I am willing to be convinced, nearly five years later, that provisions of the USA Patriot Act really do make us safer. But I am not moved by assertion alone. How can I weigh the security benefits of so-called national security letters, or the subpoena of my library records, if the government refuses to disclose how that information is used and why?

If I can only assess the curtailment of my civil liberties against the government's claims that such curtailment makes me safer, then no real balancing is possible; I am merely weighing my own subjective sense of freedom against the president's promise that I am safer. Posner argues convincingly that our judges don't have the institutional capacity to decide these questions of national security. But then, using only the knowledge he has as a judge, he undertakes precisely such a balancing test. Why? Because, as he reveals, smart, "generalist" judges are still better situated to perform the kinds of assessments necessary to measure whether Freedom A is worth sacrificing for Security Measure X.

The real power of Posner's effort is that he stands back and measures whether Guantanamo Bay and wiretapping are really worth it. It's proof that the best cure for partisan shrieking is a good old-fashioned game of cost-benefit analysis. Now, if the Bush administration would follow suit and frame the debate about freedom and war in terms of security gains and civil-liberties sacrifices (rather than cheap attacks on critics or grandiose claims of unlimited wartime authority) we might begin the sort of careful debate about this possibly never-ending fight against terrorism -- a debate that is long overdue.

INFORMANTS TELL TERRORIST TALES (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa,, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 10, 2006

They have exerted unusual power

From Lodi to New York, many terrorism investigations since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, have shared a similar plot line.

An informant posing as an Islamic radical gets close to one or more Muslim men. The informant spouts anti-American rhetoric, speaks favorably of terrorism or even offers to provide supplies or weapons. If he is successful in drawing out his targets, arrests are made, even if the suspects lack a firm plan or the means to carry out an attack.

Other steps that authorities have taken since 2001 to head off terrorist strikes -- such as airport screenings and stepped-up surveillance of landmarks, ports and public transportation -- have garnered plenty of attention. But the use of informants has figured more prominently in arrests of suspected plotters.

The scenario has placed informants in an important and contentious role. Though informants have long been central to infiltrating organized crime, they have exerted unusual power in terror probes, according to experts who have followed the investigations. Many of the resulting criminal cases have rested heavily on conversations, not overt actions.

Defense attorneys say informants are often under intense pressure to deliver a case because they are either being paid or have agreed to cooperate to avoid punishment for their own crimes. Some plots wouldn't have hatched at all without an informant's provocation, say the attorneys, though they concede that such saber-rattling is not illegal.

"In order to open a dialogue with radicals, to a certain extent (the informant) has to share their rhetoric," said Brian Jenkins, a terrorism expert and senior official at the Rand Corp. think tank in Santa Monica. "The fact that an informant engages in radical rhetoric is not evidence that he is a provocateur -- it's a prerequisite to establishing his credentials."

However, Jenkins said, "the difficulty is that a lot of these angry young men who are susceptible to this ideology are constantly fantasizing about operations. They may even engage in planning attacks that in all probability are going to remain in the realm of fantasy."

The use of informants is a sore subject among many Muslims in the Bay Area. Some say the whole community should not be targeted because of the actions of a few extremists, and they worry that such scrutiny could alienate ordinary Muslims and make them reluctant to volunteer information to law enforcement.

"That's probably not the best way to do it," said Irfan Rydhan, a board member for the South Bay Islamic Association in San Jose, who compared the use of informants in mosques to the government's infiltration of activist groups in the 1960s.

"I can understand why they're thinking like that -- the main stereotype is that Muslims are causing all the problems," Rydhan said. "But we Muslims in America are the bridge to the greater Muslim community in the world. Law enforcement should be openly talking to us."

Rydhan stressed that his mosque and its imam had a strong relationship with authorities. FBI agents recently had dinner at the mosque during a monthly "family night" and took questions from members.

U.S. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, addressing the American Enterprise Institute in May, said the Justice Department had charged 435 people and had won 253 convictions in cases related to international terrorism since September 2001.

Citing a computer-aided review of data, the Washington Post reported that most of the defendants were charged with minor crimes unrelated to terrorism. But McNulty said his agency had used "the full arsenal of tools Congress has given us," including immigration charges.

Informants are a recurring theme in high-profile terrorism prosecutions. In Portland, Ore., a man posing as a Taliban supporter helped convict six Portland residents of conspiring to join the radical group in Afghanistan. In Detroit, questions about an informant's credibility helped overturn convictions of Muslims accused of being members of a suspected terror cell.

Reports indicate that informants were central to the arrests in Canada in June of 17 people suspected of planning to use fertilizer to make truck bombs.

At a federal trial earlier this year, defense attorneys argued that 24-year-old Pakistani immigrant Shahawar Matin Siraj had been radicalized over the course of a year by a 50-year-old informant before Siraj suggested blowing up a New York subway station in 2004.

The older man, posing as the son of an Islamic scholar and as a determined terrorist, showed photos to Siraj of the abuse of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib and offered to provide explosives, defense attorney Martin Stolar said.

"My client was very easily manipulated. The idea of doing something violent had been drilled into him by the informant," Stolar said in an interview. "His response was to say, 'How about this idea?' But it was never going to happen."

However, prosecutors showed that Siraj had a history of espousing violence, including in tape-recorded talks with the informant. A federal jury rejected Stolar's claim that Siraj had been entrapped and convicted him.

In Lodi, the FBI assigned 33-year-old informant Naseem Khan to infiltrate the city's only mosque, even after discovering that he had falsely told agents that he had seen three of the world's most notorious terrorists there, including al Qaeda second-in-command Ayman al-Zawahiri.

Khan, posing as a man interested in holy war, focused on two Pakistani clerics who were in Lodi on religious visas. Then in the summer of 2002, he came across Hamid Hayat, 23, who displayed enthusiasm for militant groups and kept what prosecutors called a "jihadi scrapbook" of news clippings. The men became best friends, at least in Hayat's mind.

At one point, Khan berated Hayat for not going to a terrorist training camp in Pakistan, and told him to "be a man" and "do something." Khan testified later that he had scolded Hayat "as a way to make him talk."

Hayat was convicted of providing material support to terrorists by allegedly attending a camp in Pakistan. He faces up to 39 years in prison at a sentencing later this year.

Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, argued that Hayat had not been to the camp and said the FBI had not kept a tight enough leash on Khan. She said the informant had a financial incentive to incriminate Hayat. The FBI paid Khan more than $225,000.

"The informants in these cases are being trusted more than traditional informants," Mojaddidi said. "I guess the FBI considers them to have more specialized knowledge about the culture. But what that does is give them more power than they should have in these investigations."

McGregor Scott, the U.S. attorney for California's eastern district, which includes Lodi, said agents had handled Khan legally and properly.

"Oftentimes, the best evidence is what comes from the mouth of a suspect in an unguarded moment," Scott said in a recent interview.

"In the terrorism context, typically the people we are investigating are Muslim males, and those can be self-contained communities," Scott said. "The use of an informant who fits into that self-contained community can be a very effective law enforcement tool in these investigations."

Onetime Watsonville Resident, Attorney Reflects On Work With '20th Hijacker' (SCS)

By Peggy Townsend, SENTINEL STAFF WRITER

Santa Cruz (CA) Sentinel, September 10, 2006

The trial of al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui decimated Alan Yamamoto's law practice.

It wore him down physically. It drained him emotionally.

He was so exhausted after the trial, he didn't talk about it for months.

But last week, the Watsonville High School graduate was ready to speak about the years he spent defending a man who vowed to kill Americans, despised his defense team, taunted the families of the victims of 9/11 and admitted allegiance to Osama bin Laden. A man who greeted his attorney each day with the words, "Curse you, Yamamoto."

In a telephone interview from his one-man law office in Alexandria, Va., the only member of the defense team to whom Moussaoui would talk spoke about the man behind the courtroom rantings; about a moment in the trial that surprised him; about his client's mental health; why he won't write a book about the case; and why he thought the years-long trial was a waste of taxpayer money.

His words came even as President Bush was upping the stakes with Congress over trying terror suspects through military tribunals to avoid what occurred in the Moussaoui case — the release of classified information to attorneys defending clients in those cases.

"No, I'm not bitter," the 61-year-old Yamamoto said of the years he spent helping defend Moussaoui. "I just think it was a waste of money, that's all. I was too busy to be bitter."

Getting to know Moussaoui

There is probably not a person in the United States who knew the burly 37-year-old terrorist better than Alan Yamamoto.

For almost three years, the unassuming man who likes mystery novels and volunteers at the animal shelter was the only member of the defense team to whom the French-born Moussaoui would speak.

It meant that Yamamoto spent hours locked in a windowless 6-by-6 room in the Alexandria Detention Center with a man the government once dubbed the "20th hijacker," and a man who rained insults on his other defense attorneys.

"He could be very funny. He had a terrific sense of humor. He was very bright," Yamamoto said of the man who was arrested three weeks before Sept. 11 after his behavior aroused suspicion at a Minnesota flight school.

"But he could also be a royal pain in the ass: argumentative, nasty. Just a jerk."

Most of the time, Yamamoto said, Moussaoui would lecture him about converting to Islam and rant about the sins of America and of Christianity. He would insist that his defense team, including Yamamoto, wanted to have him put to death and refuse to answer questions that would help defense attorneys in the case.

"God curse and kill you, Yamamoto," he would always say as the attorney left the meeting room.

"After awhile, it wore me down," Yamamoto said of the long harangues, the refusal to trust the attorneys who were trying to help him.

But there were also times when the two men would sit at the room's small table and Moussaoui would ask Yamamoto about his own life or tell him about growing up in France — a childhood dominated by a father who beat his sisters and mother, in a country that looked down on Moroccan immigrants like him.

It was testimony about that abusive childhood, an anonymous juror later revealed to the Washington Post, that led nine of the 12 jurors to say it was one of the mitigating factors in their decision to recommend a life sentence instead of death for the al-Qaida operative.

But Yamamoto's answers to questions about his childhood growing up in the strawberry fields outside of Watsonville puzzled Moussaoui. He could not understand how Yamamoto could continue to be an American in the face of the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki and of the internment of Yamamoto's parents in a Poston, Ariz., camp during World War II.

"He couldn't fathom how I could live like that," Yamamoto said.

So it surprised Yamamoto when Moussaoui, after listening to families of the victims of the World Trade Center attack testify that despite their pain they had found ways to move on — like establishing scholarships or working for peace — told him he was "very moved" by their words.

"The people who testified for the prosecution and just wanted him dead, he could understand that," Yamamoto said. "But what he couldn't understand was these other people coming and saying I think we should have peace."

The fact that they didn't want revenge affected Moussaoui deeply, Yamamoto said.

And while some questioned Moussaoui's sanity because of the courtroom tirades, his rambling legal briefs and paranoia, Moussaoui was not crazy, Yamamoto said.

Although Moussaoui's family was filled with mental instability — his father is in a mental institution in France and his two sisters are living in government housing for the mentally ill — Moussaoui was more like those who fall into cults, a person who was susceptible to indoctrination, Yamamoto said.

"He had mental health issues and I've told him that to his face," Yamamoto said.

"... I never thought he was crazy."

A terrible pilot

The case cast a shadow over Yamamoto's life.

His work week stretched from 60 hours to 100 hours as he huddled with Moussaoui or holed up in a cramped room in the courthouse going over boxes of classified documents that he could not even discuss with his client.

With a one-man law practice, Yamamoto was soon turning away new business and referring his regular clients to other attorneys to concentrate on the case. When it ended, he had no clients left.

"My personal life suffered the same way," he said.

"I didn't have one."

But there were a few high points — one of them when the defense team set legal precedent by winning access to senior al-Qaida operatives like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed who were being held at undisclosed sites overseas.

It was Shaikh Mohammed who said Moussaoui hadn't known about the Sept. 11 plot, and had been training for an unspecified second wave of attacks that never occurred — the same thing Moussaoui had admitted in July 2002, telling the court "he was in the United States for something else," according to Yamamoto.

In fact, Moussaoui had confided to Yamamoto that he was a terrible pilot.

"He once explained to me that he would be flying the plane and see something in the distance and start looking at it and forget to fly," Yamamoto said. "He couldn't fly to save his life."

Had Moussaoui been allowed to plead guilty to that crime, he would have received a life sentence like the one he got after years of legal wrangling, according to Yamamoto.

Instead, the government continued to press for the death penalty, saying Moussaoui's lies after his capture permitted the Sept. 11 attacks to go forward, spending tens of millions of dollars, he said.

"Prosecuting him was a waste of money, because ultimately, he Moussaoui was not really aware of what was going on," Yamamoto said. And while the government has yet to disclose the cost of the trial, according to reports in the Associated Press last week, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales admitted it was "millions of dollars," calling the trial a lesson for the government.

"The truth of the matter is, we all felt an obligation to know, was it possible to try a terrorist in a civil court where you might have to put at risk classified information, where the terrorist may insist on having direct access to someone that's being detained by the United States," Gonzales said.

The defense team's fees are also under seal. But, Yamamoto said, "It didn't make me a rich man, oh no. Nobody gets rich doing this work." And, he will not write a book about his experience, he said, "because I told him Moussaoui I wouldn't ... and I haven't."

Yamamoto was thoughtful when asked how history would look at the Moussaoui trial.

"This will probably be one of the only trials of this sort that you will see because there were so many problems that no one anticipated," he said.

"I don't think the government will want to go through that again."

Indeed, last week, the Bush administration was pushing to use military tribunals to try terror suspects.

Now Moussaoui sits in a cell in a super-maximum security prison in Florence, Colo., as Yamamoto tries to get on with his life, to restart his law practice, to finish dealing with the death of his father earlier this year.

But the belief that led him to agree to be part of the case, in the end turned out to be true, said Yamamoto, who came east for law school and who had agreed to help defend Moussaoui at U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brikema's request.

"I believe in the justice system and I believe in the way it operates; the way it is supposed to work.

"And it did in this case," he said.

From Baltimore Suburbs To A Secret CIA Prison (WP)

By Eric Rich And Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Family Learned Last Week That Man Was Among 'High-Value' Terrorism Suspects Moved to Guantanamo

BALTIMORE -- He was the studious one in Janis Sanford's social studies class at Owings Mills High School, the teenager who stood apart from his suburban Baltimore peers for his no-nonsense attitude. Majid Khan worked at the family gas station after school and, in his free time, indulged his interest in computers.

But something happened to the serious young man after he graduated in 1999, when his life took a dramatic -- and much-disputed -- turn.

Khan, now 26, is one of the 14 "high-value" terrorism suspects transferred Monday to the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, men the government considered so dangerous they had been held by the CIA at secret foreign prisons for years. Khan is expected to stand trial on terrorism charges after Congress approves a new set of rules for the special military courts that will decide the fates of the 14 suspects.

This week's allegations stunned Sanford, who said the young man she taught in her English-as-a-second-language class could not, as alleged, have plotted to blow up gas stations or poison drinking water in U.S. reservoirs.

"It doesn't make any sense to me," said Sanford, who taught many of the school's foreign students. "I can't imagine it.

"He wasn't one of these kinds of fool-around kids. He just seemed serious. . . . He wasn't a light-hearted jokester."

In brief interviews Thursday and Friday, his father said the charges are false. "He's a terrorist, my son? No!" Khan Ali said, speaking in the family's brick duplex in Windsor Mill. "I don't accept this."

The father spoke only hours after the first official confirmation of what he and others had long presumed: that his son had been held by the CIA since he disappeared in Pakistan in 2003.

The family moved to the United States in 1996 and settled in the Baltimore area, authorities said. After graduating, Khan married a woman in Pakistan and became a father. Though the child is now 2, Ali said, his son has been in custody since before her birth and has had no contact with her. Ali said his son had been in Pakistan less than a year when, in 2003, he was arrested by Pakistani authorities.

At one point, in seeming contradiction, he said of his son, "He has been brainwashed." He also acknowledged that a relative is affiliated with al-Qaeda. Authorities last week described that unidentified relative as an uncle, but Ali said the relationship is more distant.

Before Khan was detained, he and his family lived in a modest home in Catonsville. Some recalled that, for a time several years ago, the house appeared to be under surveillance. Neighbor John Owen said another resident once called him in the middle of the night to say that a person was sitting in a car outside Owen's home. Owen said he went out and tapped on the window.

"This guy holds up a shield," Owen said, referring to a law enforcement badge, "and said, 'I'm watching a house.' "

Khan's name has surfaced in other terrorism prosecutions. But until the government's disclosure this week, details about his case were sketchy.

A single-page "biography" released by the office of John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, portrays Khan as a figure who had contact with terrorist operatives from Pakistan, Indonesia and elsewhere. U.S. officials also allege that Khan took orders from Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the man accused of orchestrating the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

According to the document, Khan became involved in a "local Islamic organization" before returning to Pakistan in early 2002. The federal accusations say his radicalization proceeded rapidly once he was back. A cousin and the uncle, both of whom were al-Qaeda operatives, introduced Khan to Mohammed, the document alleges.

Before long, Khan was training to make bomb components and discussing terrorist attacks that could be conducted in the United States, according to the document and government officials.

Mohammed allegedly asked Khan to research poisoning U.S. reservoirs and considered him for an operation to assassinate the Pakistani president. The document also alleges that Mohammed orchestrated a test that "showed that Khan was committed to being a suicide operative."

Mohammed, the document says, "selected Khan as an operative for a possible attack inside the United States . . . because of his excellent English and extensive knowledge of the United States."

Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at California State University in San Bernardino, said al-Qaeda values recruits who have lived in the United States. The government asserted that Khan's familiarity with the gas station business might have given him insight into a vulnerability that could be exploited.

"His familiarity with the Baltimore-Washington area, fluency in English, as well as his study of fuel tank explosives and water reservoir vulnerabilities made him a logical choice to be on KSM's [Khalid Sheik Mohammed's] list of operatives," said Levin, who has no firsthand knowledge about Khan.

Khan also is accused of delivering money to an operative for Jemaah Islamiyah, the Indonesian extremist group affiliated with al-Qaeda, to "support terrorist attacks against Western targets," the government alleged.

Furthermore, according to the document, Khan received help from Aafia Siddiqui, a scientist accused of helping al-Qaeda. According to the government, Khan also recommended the recruitment of Iyman Faris, a naturalized U.S. citizen who was convicted of providing material support to terrorists in 2003 after allegedly plotting to take down suspension bridges in New York.

Khan's wife, Rubia, is in Pakistan, according to family and friends. Khalid Khawaja, a former member of the Pakistani intelligence service who is acting as a spokesman for her, said information obtained through interrogations in the CIA prison system is inherently unreliable.

"When you are in that kind of custody and the worst kind of human treatment, you can get them to say any kind of statement," said Khawaja, who was reached by telephone in Pakistan. "They don't have any evidence against Majid Khan as far as I know. . . . We don't believe he has done anything. He is a victim of this so-called war on terrorism by George Bush."

A central figure in Khan's case is another Pakistani national, Uzair Paracha, who was sentenced in New York earlier this year to 30 years in prison for providing material support to terrorists.

Authorities allege that Khan and Mohammed planned to use the Paracha family's textile-importing business to smuggle explosives into the United States and blow up underground gasoline storage tanks in Maryland. Paracha was accused of attempting to help Khan reenter the United States from Pakistan illegally.

Paracha denied wrongdoing, saying that he was used by Khan and Mohammed and that a confession to FBI agents was "what they wanted to hear." But he also admitted that his father, Saifullah Paracha, had told him about Khan's terrorism ties. The elder Paracha, who also had met with Osama bin Laden, is being held as an enemy combatant at Guantanamo Bay.

According to an interrogation summary filed in the case, Khan said that the younger Paracha had no knowledge of the plan to blow up gas stations and was merely "willing to help a fellow Muslim at his father's request." Khan said that while he considered recruiting Paracha for al-Qaeda, he was probably unsuitable because he "had no extremist views and was not really a practicing Muslim," according to the summary.

Edward D. Wilford, one of Paracha's attorneys, said the newly released information about Khan -- and his transfer to Guantanamo Bay -- is an important development for Paracha's case, which is currently on appeal in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit.

Lack of access to Khan and Mohammed hurt Paracha's defense, Wilford said. "It's interesting that everything we couldn't get is now part of the public record because it serves the administration's purposes," he added.

Eggen reported from Washington. Staff researchers Julie Tate and Meg Smith contributed to this report.

Names Of The Detained In Guantanamo Bay, Cuba (WP)

Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Until March 3rd, the Pentagon had declined to identify the detainees at Guantanamo Bay Military Prison, most of whom were captured in Afghanistan during and after the 2001 war there. As a result of an Associated Press Freedom of Information Act request and lawsuit, the Department of Defense released the unredacted transcripts of Combatant Status Review Tribunals and Administrative Review Boards.

Special Report

Guantanamo Prison

The Archived List

From 2002 to May 2006, Washington Post researchers compiled the names and countries of origin of detainees in Guantanamo from unofficial, public sources: news accounts, legal documents (such as habeas corpus petitions and from the CSRT tribunals), interviews with attorneys and relatives, and information from detainee support sites on the Web. The Post printed only names that it had verified from a single reputable source or multiple sources. Some names were transliterated from Arabic or had alternative spellings. The collection was the largest list of names made public at that point, encompassing: more than 550.

Many names came from two Web sites that monitor the status of Guantanamo detainees: the Arabic-language Alasra and the Britain-based CagePrisoners. The two sites, which advocate the release of the detainees, have published lists of names, photographs and documents provided by families. Alasra is registered to an unknown individual in Saudi Arabia, and CagePrisoners is registered to a group of Muslim computer programmers based in Britain.

The Archived List The Pentagon List

On May 15, 2006, the Pentagon released to the Associated Press the first comprehensive list of everyone who has been held at Guantanamo Bay, more than four years after it opened the detention center. Two-hundred and one of the names had not been disclosed by the Defense Department before. That more complete register follows below. Post researchers will continue to monitor the names on this new list to verify the information previously reported and will provide updates as they are available. See Also

False Accusation Creates A 9/11 Footnote (AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writers
AP, September 10, 2006
They were different men going in different directions — one a visiting Egyptian student on scholarship, the other an ex-cop in a dead-end job as a hotel security guard. But an aviation radio left in a high-rise hotel brought Abdallah Higazy and Ronald Ferry together in an unfortunate footnote to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.
In his zeal to fight terror, Ferry twisted the truth about the radio — capable of contacting commercial pilots from the ground — and triggered an investigation that needlessly landed Higazy in jail for a month.
Five years later, Higazy, 35, is back in Egypt, where he views his case as a parable about the false suspicions endured by innocent young Arab and Muslim men following the attacks.
"Not all the victims of 9/11 were in the twin towers and Pentagon," he said in a recent interview. "There were other victims, too."
Attempts by The Associated Press to contact Ferry, 53, were unsuccessful. There was no telephone listing for him, and his former attorney said they were out of touch.
Speaking by phone from Cairo, Higazy recalled being thrilled when he arrived in the United States on Aug. 27, 2001, to begin a graduate program in computers. His college temporarily put him up in a room on the 51st floor at the Millennium Hotel, in the shadow of the World Trade Center.
He was there on the morning of Sept. 11 when the planes struck with a force that shook the hotel. During an evacuation, he managed to grab only his student identification and cash. He later found housing in Brooklyn and began school.
Enter Ferry.
The Millennium security guard — who had quit the Newark, N.J., police force because of a drug problem — was assigned in October to inventory items left behind by guests, court papers said. He reported to a supervisor that among the belongings found in a safe in Room 5101 were the aviation radio and an Egyptian passport — Higazy's.
The discovery was troubling to investigators who believed a conspirator could have used the handheld device to coordinate with the hijackers aiming airliners at the twin towers. It was considered "an extremely important item of evidence," one government filing said.
When Higazy was summoned to the hotel in December to retrieve his belongings, the FBI confronted him with the radio.

"I'm sorry, this isn't mine," he told agents.

The FBI brushed aside his denials and arrested him as a material witness. He was sure someone would quickly realize he'd been framed — until he spotted Zacarias Moussaoui inside a jail in lower Manhattan.

The man already known as "20th Hijacker" was lodged in the same maximum-security wing. Being in Moussaoui's company — and being strip-searched, shackled and insulted by guards — was unnerving to a moderate Muslim who had never even read the Koran.

"That's when it really sunk in that I was in a very, very serious situation," he said.

Higazy agreed to a polygraph examination. He stuck to the truth, he said, until an FBI agent made veiled threats against his family in Egypt.

He broke down and responded with wild and contradictory tales: He found the radio in the subway. No, he stole it from the Egyptian military.

Citing his "confession," federal authorities charged him on Jan. 11, 2002, with making false statements. Three days later, a private pilot who was staying one floor below Higazy at the Millennium on Sept. 11, returned to the hotel looking for his aviation radio.

Ferry recanted his story on Jan. 16, court papers said. The same day, with no explanation, a deputy U.S. marshal removed Higazy's shackles and told him, "You're free to go."

About a year later, Higazy sued the hotel and the FBI agent who coerced his false confession for $20 million. He reached an undisclosed settlement with the hotel; a judge later cleared the agent — a ruling that's still being appealed.

Now married and teaching computer courses, Higazy still blames Ferry for "fooling the government." But he also has fond memories of New Yorkers who, after recognizing him from news accounts, greeted him with kind words after he was freed.

"Aren't you the Egyptian man?" he recalled some saying. "We're sorry."

Ferry, who pleaded guilty on Feb. 27, 2002, to lying to the FBI about the radio, served his sentence of weekends in jail for six months, then faded back into obscurity. His motives remain murky as well.

"That was during a time of patriotism," he said at his sentencing, "and I'm very, very sorry for that mistake."

Pakistan And Terrorism (1 Letter) (NYT)

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

To the Editor:

Re “The Wrong Battle in Pakistan” (editorial, Sept. 3):

Pakistan joined the coalition to fight terrorism because of its own conviction and vital national interest. We have killed or captured more than 680 foreign Al Qaeda terrorists. We have banned all organizations that were suspected of involvement in terrorism.

The Taliban insurgency is mainly within Afghanistan. Pakistan has deployed 90,000 troops — three times as many as fielded in Afghanistan — to interdict Al Qaeda and Taliban movement across the border. But we host 2.6 million Afghan refugees, some sympathetic to the Taliban.

Through a comprehensive military, political and economic strategy, Pakistan is succeeding in the endeavor to end support for the Taliban in our frontier regions. Exerting undue pressure on Pakistan to “do more” is unnecessary and likely to be counterproductive.

You do not mention Pakistan’s larger reality: a democratic country, regular elections, a free press, empowered women and minorities, a vibrant economy (growing at 7 percent) that has doubled output and incomes over five years, significant and profitable foreign investment and an overwhelmingly moderate and tolerant, even if conservative, Muslim population.

The American media should be doing more to support Pakistan’s economic and social success, rather than playing the blame game.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Eroded Privacy For Terrorists – And Everyone Else (COLDISP)

By Matt Tullis, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, September 10, 2006

It's there, protecting you, helping law enforcement investigate drug dealers, murderers and terrorists. It doesn't inconvenience you — unless you're evil.

Or, it's there, lurking in the background. You don't know when the government is snooping through your bank accounts and your library records. You will likely never know.

So go the arguments for and against the USA Patriot Act, the first of several laws passed under the banner of fighting terrorism after 9/11.

The American Civil Liberties Union and other privacy advocates cried foul when the act passed with only one dissenting vote in the Senate. They vowed court challenges and said American civil liberties were no longer safe.

"We didn't realize the Patriot Act was just the beginning," said ACLU spokeswoman Chris Link. "It's not about the Patriot Act anymore. It's about the Patriot Act and the expansion of presidential powers."

One month after the Patriot Act became law, Congress passed the Aviation and Transportation Security Act, which created the Transportation Security Administration, the agency that makes you take your shoes off and dump your shampoo at the airport.

As for the Patriot Act, law enforcement continues to hail it as a useful tool and, in some cases, terrorist-fighting weapon. The FBI cites Iyman Faris, the Columbus truck driver convicted in 2003 of conspiring with terrorists, including a plan to blow up the Brooklyn Bridge.

FBI spokesman Michael Brooks said the agency sent national security letters to electronic communication service providers and financial institutions to obtain information about Faris. Also, intelligence agents shared information they had on Faris with the FBI. Both steps used new powers in the Patriot Act.

Faris' attorney, David B. Smith, said it was his client's confession that he was an al-Qaida operative, not the Patriot Act, that did him in. Faris, who is serving 20 years in a federal prison, has recanted the confession and asked a federal judge to vacate his guilty plea.

Ironically, Smith said, the Patriot Act is a good law.

"Ninety-eight percent of it is really not controversial," he said. "I have problems with a lot of other government bills that haven't attracted nearly as much attention."

Faris' case is one of 212 terroristrelated convictions the Justice Department contends were possible because of the Patriot Act. However, a Washington Post analysis of those cases put the number of terrorism-related ones closer to 39. The rest were relatively minor crimes like making false statements or violating immigration law.

The ACLU has successfully challenged some provisions of the law. It helped a group of Connecticut librarians fight an FBI demand to search, without a warrant, records on who had used a computer at a library. The librarians had been given national security letters telling them they couldn't mention the search to anyone.

The provision has been amended to allow those who receive a letter to speak with a lawyer.

"You don't feel the Patriot Act at work, but it's there," Link said. "We get letters and phone calls every day from people or their lawyers who are under investigation. Perfectly innocent people are being swept up in these things."

Link pointed to the case of Osama Sabhi Abulhassan and Ali Houssaiky. The two Dearborn, Mich., men were charged in Washington County with terrorist acts.

Employees at a Radio Shack near Marietta called law enforcement, saying the men had bought several cell phones and were acting suspiciously. A deputy stopped them for a minor traffic violation and found 12 cell phones and $11,000 in cash. The men said they were buying cell phones for resale.

The county prosecutor later said he didn't have enough evidence to pursue terrorism charges against the men.

Besides terrorism, the Patriot Act has been used to investigate everything from murder to child pornography to drug trafficking, according to the Justice Department.

Locally, law enforcement has used it to investigate check forgery, fraud and bank robbery, said Lt. Jeff Spence, commander of the Gahanna Police Division's detective bureau.

"If we're looking into a financial crime, it is much easier for us to get complete information," Spence said. "In the past, we would get nothing but a signature card. Now we get a driver's license and more complete information."

According to a Financial Crimes Enforcement Network report, the Patriot Act provision allowing federal agencies to request financial records as part of terrorist-funding or money-laundering investigations was used 553 times by 16 agencies between Nov. 1, 2002, and Aug. 15, 2006.

Of those requests, about one-third involved terrorist financing while the rest were for unrelated money-laundering crimes. All of the investigations resulted in 80 arrests and 10 convictions, according to the report, although it wasn't broken down by offense.

The act also let the Treasury Department require broader suspiciousactivity reporting from banks, insurance companies, stockbrokers, check-cashing stores, even jewelers.

Since 2002, the first full year the law was in effect, reports to the financial-crimes network have jumped from 281,373 to 919,230 last year. Steve Hudak, a spokesman for the network, said reports would top 1 million this year.

"All that are related to terrorist financing receive special handling," Hudak said, adding that most reports are read by some law-enforcement agency.

What constitutes suspicious activity is vague, Hudak said. "We don't offer a checklist."

According to the instructions on a banking form, though, it can include a customer deviating from his or her normal pattern with a transaction of $5,000 or more.

If a report is filed as a result of something you have done, you likely won't find out about it. As with the national security letters, the law prohibits the institution from informing you.

"The presumption should be that people can talk about searches once they have been performed," said Peter Swire, a professor in the Moritz College of Law at OSU, former Clinton administration official and a critic of the Patriot Act. "With the gag rule, we lose crucial accountability against government overuse."

Brooks argues that the Patriot Act doesn't impact most people's lives. That includes those who are investigated but never charged, he said.

"In many instances," he said, "we're able to conduct investigations quickly or quietly without individuals knowing we're there."

That is exactly the problem, critics say.

Jennifer Nimer, legal director for the Ohio Chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said the act had a profound impact on Middle Easterners and Muslims. They are skeptical of law enforcement and afraid to come forward when they know something important for fear of being implicated, she said.

"With so much secrecy and not knowing what people's rights are, people are just very afraid," Nimer said.

CHANGING TERRAIN OF CIVIL LIBERTIES (MERCN)

By Dana Hull

The San Jose Mercury News, September 10, 2006

The Patriot Act. Airport watch lists. Special registration by the INS. Detention. Extraordinary rendition -- sending terrorism suspects outside the United States for interrogation. Torture. Surveillance. Combing through phone calls, bank records and e-mail.

The attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, led the Bush administration to declare G-WOT, government shorthand for the ``Global War on Terror."

Five years later, G-WOT is far from over, and Sept. 11 has changed the landscape of civil liberties, influencing its culture of dissent and robust political debate, and the rights to privacy and a fair trial.

The U.S. government has greatly expanded its ability to collect information about its citizens as it looks for possible terrorists in our midst. It tracks travel and spending patterns, overseas phone calls, financial donations and e-mail.

Proponents say these measures are critical to preventing further attacks on U.S. soil, and legal scholars with the Bush administration argue that they are permitted because the president has unilateral war powers. Measures like surveillance are seen as key weapons in the arsenal.

``The conflict against Al-Qaida is, in fundamental respects, a war of information," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a January speech at Georgetown University. ``We cannot build walls thick enough, fences high enough or systems strong enough to keep our enemies out of our open and welcoming country. . . . We have to collect more dots, if you will, before we can `connect the dots.' "

But critics warn the potential for abuse is enormous, because various government programs are conducted in secret with little congressional or judicial oversight.

``What's at stake are core American values: the fundamental right to freedom of expression, privacy, due process," said Dorothy Ehrlich, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California. ``The core values of our democracy are under assault."

Executive power

Recently, some federal courts are reining in the executive branch.

In June, the Supreme Court struck down President Bush's creation of military war tribunals to try Guantánamo Bay detainees suspected of belonging to Al-Qaida. The court ruled the proposed trials were illegal under both U.S. law and the international Geneva Conventions.

DOJ_NMG_0060711

And on Aug. 17, a federal judge in Detroit ruled the National Security Agency surveillance program is unconstitutional and must stop.

Bush vehemently disagreed with the ruling.

``This country of ours is at war," Bush said the next day. ``And we must give those whose responsibility it is to protect the United States the tools necessary to protect this country in a time of war."

Some polls suggest Americans are more fearful of terrorism than the erosion of civil liberties. A January survey by the Pew Research Center found one in three respondents named restrictions in civil liberties as a big concern.

``There is not an outcry or even consensus opinion about the government's monitoring, without court permission, the phone and e-mail communications of Americans suspected of having terrorist ties," says the Pew report, adding, ``48 percent feel this is generally right, while about the same number, 47 percent, think it is generally wrong."

Brian Michael Jenkins, a terrorism expert at the Rand Corp. in Santa Monica, says the United States has slowed Al-Qaida's military capability. But he warns we are losing the battle of ideas, and revelations of torture and abuse at Abu Ghurayb serve as recruiting posters for terrorist cells. The culture of fear in the United States also isn't making us stronger, he says.

``Americans have spent the past five years scaring the hell out of ourselves," Jenkins said. ``Our most effective defense against terrorism will come not from surveillance, concrete barriers, metal detectors, or new laws. It will come from our fierce determination to defend our liberties and to protect our values despite the risks."

Defending rights

Still, new measures passed at the national level have had a profound effect locally.

The first law was the USA Patriot Act, overwhelmingly passed by Congress in October 2001, which gives law enforcement expanded authority for the purpose of fighting terrorism at home and abroad. But some provisions caused enormous controversy, and cities like San Jose, Mountain View and Palo Alto are among the hundreds of municipalities that have passed local resolutions to defend the Bill of Rights and civil liberties.

In June 2002, former Attorney General John Ashcroft weakened longstanding rules that barred law enforcement agents from spying on political, religious or community groups that are not linked to any crime.

Many anti-war groups in the Bay Area and Northern California experienced the fallout first-hand. A deputy sheriff infiltrated Peace Fresno. The California National Guard monitored an anti-war protest held on Mother's Day in 2005. Plainclothes Palo Alto police videotaped a peace rally before the war in Iraq began in 2003.

Some Bay Area residents have altered their behavior since Sept. 11 in order to safeguard their privacy.

Trudy Reagan, 69, lives in Palo Alto and is active in local peace and social justice groups. She still remembers the virulent anti-communist sentiment of the McCarthy era.

An avid reader, she no longer feels comfortable buying certain books online or with a credit card because the Patriot Act allows federal agents to examine library and bookstore records.

``If I'm buying a politically sensitive book, like something about Iraq, I pay in cash at Kepler's," she said, referring to the independent Menlo Park bookstore. ``It's none of anyone's business what I'm reading."

But more than anything, the culture of the United States has shifted. In the five years since Sept. 11, we've gotten used to random airport searches, surveillance and the idea that our phones may be tapped.

``What's dangerous is the changing atmosphere," said Melissa Ngo of EPIC, the Electronic Privacy Information Council. ``People are becoming more and more used to invasive technology and invasive government actions, and the catchall reason for it is terrorism."

Radio Addresses Focus On Terror Trials And War In Iraq

(AP) President George W. Bush pressed Congress on Saturday to approve his plan for prosecuting suspected terrorists, a proposal that lawmakers could debate as early as next week.

"As soon as Congress acts to authorize these military commissions, we will prosecute these men and send a clear message to those who kill Americans: No matter how long it takes, we will find you and bring you to justice," Mr. Bush said in his weekly radio address. "As we bring terrorists to justice, we're acting to secure the homeland."

DOJ_NMG_0060712

The radio address marked the fourth time this week that Mr. Bush has delivered a message about the fight against terrorism. The series of speeches gave Mr. Bush an opportunity to buttress the Republican Party's national security credentials just two months before the critical congressional elections on Nov. 7.

In his speeches, delivered leading up to the anniversary of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Bush described the enemies and their motives and outlined the steps the administration has taken to protect the nation.

He also acknowledged for the first time that the CIA runs secret prisons overseas and uses tough interrogation techniques to get suspected terrorists to divulge information about their networks and plots. Listen: The President's Radio Address Listen to Rep. Sherrod Brown's Radio AddressMr. Bush wants Congress to support new legislation the White House drafted for prosecuting suspected terrorists for war crimes. A new plan was needed after the Supreme Court, the top U.S. court, ruled in June that an earlier plan violated U.S. and international law.

Senate leaders are backing the plan. But some Republicans support alternative legislation, and several of the military's top lawyers worry that Mr. Bush's plan could violate treaty obligations and make U.S. troops vulnerable.

Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Republican, has placed the White House proposal on the Senate calendar, allowing debate to begin as early as Tuesday, the day after the nation mourns the loss of the nearly 3,000 victims of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"On this anniversary, we also remember the brutality of the enemy who struck our country and renew our resolve to defeat this enemy and secure a future of peace and freedom," Mr. Bush said in the radio speech. He will address the nation Monday after visiting the sites of the Sept. 11 attacks in New York; Shanksville, Penn.; and the Pentagon.

Democrats, hoping to make the November midterm elections a referendum on Mr. Bush's policies in Iraq and the war on terror, argued again this week that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld be made to step down. They contend the White House has mishandled the war, failed to prosecute terrorists and mismanaged the detainee system.

Some Democrats say the first step toward making Americans safe is to chart a new course in Iraq.

"While Iraq was not part of the war on terror before we invaded, it's now a training ground for terrorists and a recruiting tool for the leaders of al Qaeda and other terrorist organizations," said Rep. Sherrod Brown of Ohio, who is running for a seat in the Senate.

"The truth is, five years after the 9/11 attacks, America is not nearly as safe as we can be and we must be," he said.

Brown, who is running for a seat in the Senate, delivered the Democrats' weekly radio address.

Brown said the U.S. needed to refocus efforts on the war on terror by "ending our open-ended commitment in Iraq and by redirecting our efforts to destroy al Qaeda."

The president's new plan for trying detainees would authorize the defense secretary to convene military tribunals to prosecute terrorism suspects and omit rights common in military and civil courts, such as the defendant's right to access all evidence and a ban on coerced testimony.

Mr. Bush has said the plan is both fair and tough enough to ensure dangerous terrorists can be brought to justice. However, some Republican moderates on defense issues, including Senators John Warner, John McCain, and Lindsey Graham, have agreed with the Pentagon lawyers that Mr. Bush's plan may go too far.

President Set To Visit All Three 9/11 Sites (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- President Bush will visit all three sites of the September 11 terrorist attacks that killed 2,973 persons five years ago and then deliver a primetime address tomorrow to tell Americans the United States is safer -- but still not safe from attack.

Mr. Bush and first lady Laura Bush will visit ground zero in New York today, where they will lay a wreath and attend a church service.

Tomorrow, the president and Mrs. Bush will begin the day at 7:40 a.m. with a breakfast with New York City first-responders at Fort Pitt Firehouse. At 8:46 a.m. -- the moment that hijacked American Airlines Flight 11 slammed into the North Tower of the World Trade Center -- they will bow their heads in a moment of silence.

At the same time, Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynne, with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, will observe a moment of silence near the spot where American Airlines Flight 77 struck the Pentagon five years ago.

Just before noon tomorrow, the Bushes will participate in a wreath-laying ceremony in Shanksville, Pa. A lush hilltop on Skyline Road now serves as a memorial for those killed aboard United Flight 93, when passengers battled terrorists likely targeting the Capitol or the White House, eventually bringing the plane down. The president also will meet with family members of those who died in the crash.

Mr. and Mrs. Bush then will return to Washington to attend a 3:30 p.m. ceremony at the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0060713

The president's address at 9:01 p.m. tomorrow "is not a political speech," Bush spokesman Tony Snow said Friday.

"It will be a reflection of what September 11th has meant to the president and to the country; the realities that it has brought to all of our attention, and how we can move forward together to try to win the war on terror," Mr. Snow said.

The president will speak just before the second part of a controversial ABC miniseries that blames in large part the Clinton administration for lapses in national security that led to the September 11 attacks, a charge that has incensed Democrats.

Mr. Bush said yesterday in his weekly radio address that a CIA detention program to interrogate terrorism suspects, which was at issue, had been "invaluable" in efforts to prevent another attack on the United States.

"This program has been invaluable to the security of America and its allies, and helped us identify and capture men who our intelligence community believes were key architects of the September the 11th attacks," he said.

Meanwhile, Democrats, seeking to win control of at least one chamber of Congress in the November elections, are highlighting an increasingly unpopular Iraq war with voters.

Five years after the September 11 attacks, "America is not nearly as safe as we can be and we must be," said Rep. Sherrod Brown of Ohio in the Democratic radio address.

"This anniversary of 9/11, we must refocus our efforts on the war on terror by ending our open-ended commitment in Iraq and by redirecting our efforts to destroy al Qaeda," Mr. Brown said.

"Democrats will fight for this goal even as the president and as congressional Republicans stubbornly insist on staying a failed course," he said.

Bush Marks Sept. 11, Says Americans Are Safer Now (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Catherine Dodge

Bloomberg, September 10, 2006

Sept. 9 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said Americans are safer now than before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks five years ago because of steps taken by his administration.

``We've acted to address the gaps in security, intelligence and information sharing that the terrorists exploited in the 9-11 attacks," Bush said in his weekly radio address today. U.S. Representative Sherrod Brown of Ohio said in the Democratic response that the country ``is not nearly as safe as we can be and we must be."

Bush's broadcast recapped four speeches the president has given in the past week covering his strategy for the war against terrorism. Bush this week confirmed for the first time the existence of secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency that held suspected terrorists, including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.

The prisoners have been turned over to the Department of Defense and transferred to the military detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Bush called on Congress to pass a law establishing military tribunals to try suspected terrorists for war crimes. The Supreme Court ruled on June 29 that Congress hadn't authorized the president to conduct such trials.

``As soon as Congress acts to authorize these military commissions, we will prosecute these men and send a clear message to those who kill Americans: No matter how long it takes, we will find you and bring you to justice," Bush said in the radio address.

Approval Waning

By delivering a series of speeches emphasizing the need for tough national security, historically a strong suit for Republicans, Bush aims to help his party hold majorities in the House of Representatives and the Senate in midterm elections in November. With public approval of the war in Iraq waning and Bush's approval ratings near record lows, Democrats have a chance at taking control in Congress and dealing a major blow to the White House.

Two senior Republican senators will travel tomorrow to the Guantanamo detention center to assess the conditions under which prisoners are held there. Majority Leader Bill Frist from Tennessee will accompany Majority Whip Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

Democrats said the administration has failed to make the nation's transportation systems and ports and its chemical and nuclear plants more secure.

``We ask our grandmothers to take their shoes off at airports, yet only 6 percent of the cargo entering our ports is inspected," Brown said in his response to Bush's speech.

Commission Recommendations

The administration has yet to fully implement the recommendations made two years ago by a bipartisan commission, Brown said in his radio address.

``It's unacceptable that this Republican government hasn't done all it can to protect Americans in the five years since the Sept. 11 attacks," said Brown, who is running for the U.S. Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0060714

On Monday's anniversary of the attacks, Bush will participate in ceremonies in New York, at the Pentagon and in Shanksville, Pennsylvania, to honor those killed in the attacks. He'll end his day with a televised address to the nation from Washington at 9 p.m. local time.

``The war on terror will be long and difficult," Bush said in the radio broadcast. ``And more tough days lie ahead."

Yes, We Are Better Prepared (WP)

By John D. Negroponte

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Surprise is what intelligence is intended to prevent, but on Sept. 11, 2001, our nation was surprised, and the results were tragic. Now the fifth anniversary of those horrific events raises anew the question: Is our nation's intelligence community better prepared to keep America safe? The answer is yes. U.S. intelligence has made major advances since that Sept. 11.

First and foremost, we better understand, and are aligned to meet, the threat of transnational terror. Although our enemy is constantly changing and remains deadly, our collectors and analysts are carefully tracking the evolution of al-Qaeda and its ideological allies. Today, we have several times as many "all source" analysts -- those who look at all types of intelligence -- focusing on the terrorist threat as were in place on Sept. 11. And as we build up analytic insight and expertise, we also are devoting resources to increased human intelligence collection on targets of primary concern. One important indicator of effectiveness: We and our partners have captured or killed a majority of the al-Qaeda leadership involved in planning and directing the Sept. 11 attacks.

Second, we know that intelligence does little good if those who need it don't see it. Over the past five years we have made great progress in breaking down information "stovepipes." The results are tangible.

Without good intelligence in the right hands, coalition forces in Iraq could not have located and killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, whose bloody attacks took so many Iraqi and coalition lives. More recently, British intelligence performed spectacularly in enabling British law enforcement to shut down last month's airline plot. All credit goes to the British, but U.S. and Pakistani intelligence-sharing -- among U.S. intelligence agencies and with the British -- supported their efforts.

These are concrete examples of how we have changed and are changing the way we do business. We continue to strengthen the National Counterterrorism Center, which integrates 28 intelligence networks. In addition, we have created the National Security Branch at the FBI, expanding and connecting the bureau's intelligence, counterterrorism and counterintelligence capabilities. In 2005 only a few hundred employees at the FBI had access to the National Counterterrorism Center's secret-level online information sources. Now that figure is in the thousands. At the same time, we are weaving state and regional fusion centers, as well as more than 100 FBI Joint Terrorism Task Forces, into a national network designed to ensure that actionable threat information gets where it needs to go in a timely fashion. Although sharing information between agencies and with allies is a demanding process, it is critical to countering transnational threats.

We are also more vigilant than ever concerning the threat posed by weapons of mass destruction in the hands of terrorists. We located the National Counterterrorism Center and the newly created National Counterproliferation Center together. We have worked closely with the FBI to establish a WMD Division to ensure that our domestic counterterrorism efforts include expertise on weapons of mass destruction. And we created a "WMD Innovation Fund" for intelligence community analysis, collection, and science and technology projects.

Of course, we continue to improve our efforts against other, more traditional challenges. We have enhanced our focus on North Korea and Iran -- in particular those nations' WMD programs. North Korea's recent long-range missile launch tested the intelligence community's integration, and we ensured that military and civilian intelligence agencies, in concert with our international partners, provided policymakers with the intelligence they needed to fashion an appropriate diplomatic response.

That's good, but we can do even better. We know this because we have already completed an intelligence community-wide "lessons learned" review to see how we can improve. We will not allow ourselves to become complacent; every success affords us an opportunity to prepare better for the next challenge, which will surely come.

In the decades leading up to Sept. 11, America's intelligence community was configured to focus on the major threats presented by the Cold War. We now live in a different era, challenged by a radically different set of threats that have crossed our borders.

Both the Sept. 11 commission and the Robb-Silberman WMD commission accurately and eloquently detailed these new challenges. These commissions also offered a vision for 21st-century intelligence that we have fully embraced. We are "connecting the dots" both nationally and internationally, integrating counterterrorism analysis across the intelligence community, and removing bureaucratic barriers to information-sharing. This is a tall order. But the American people should understand that the components of the nation's intelligence community are working together in ways that were almost unimaginable before Sept. 11.

Through a new focus and better techniques, U.S. intelligence is collecting more information, analyzing it more rigorously and sharing it more broadly. Intelligence is not a panacea, but there are ways to ensure that the intelligence contribution to national security gets stronger, helping thwart our adversaries before they bring us more harm.

Support For Bush's Handling Of War On Terror Rises (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, September 10, 2006

His blitz of speeches, interviews may erode Dems' gains on security issues

WASHINGTON — Just about a week into his drive to highlight terrorism and national security, President Bush appears to be getting some new political traction.

A CBS News/New York Times poll found 55 percent of Americans approve of how Bush is handling the anti-terrorism campaign, a slight increase from last month.

In recent days, Bush delivered four major speeches and a national radio address on terrorism, bolstered by a quick round of network television interviews.

If Bush's strategy for reminding Americans about the threat of terrorism helps Republicans in November's congressional elections, it will be in part because he's mining a deep vein of lingering public anxiety. A recent Pew Research Center poll found 67 percent are either very or somewhat worried about another attack.

"I actually think it's likely to be fairly good for him politically," said John Fortier, a political scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "Obviously, things are very bad — he is not popular and the Republicans are not popular, and the direction right now is toward the Democrats. But arguments for national security still work for Bush."

Bush's grim rhetoric on terrorism, echoed and in some cases amplified by Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials, also could serve the GOP by eroding gains Democrats have made recently on their handling of national security issues.

A Fox News poll last week found 33 percent said they trust Democrats to protect the country from terrorism, and 37 percent said they trust Republicans.

For the 9/11 anniversary, Bush plans to visit all three attack sites, in New York, Arlington, Va., and Shanksville, Pa.

Polls show what most people probably know: memories of the attacks are still very potent for Americans. According to the Pew poll, 95 percent said they remember exactly where they were or what they were doing when they heard of the attacks.

A Time magazine poll found that 18 percent said they think about the attacks every day; 35 percent said a few times a week or a few times a month. Only 13 percent said they hardly ever think about it.

"Many Americans look at these events and ask the same question: Five years after 9/11, are we safer? The answer is, yes, America is safer," Bush said last week in Atlanta. "We are safer because we've taken action to protect the homeland."

Of course, many security experts and voters disagree.

Asked why they think the U.S. hasn't been hit again since 2001, 39 percent in the Pew poll credited the government's efforts and 40 percent said it was luck.

Terrorism is a strong issue for Bush, but the administration's secret weapon in the campaigns remains first lady Laura Bush.

She has a 69 percent public approval rating, and she is in constant demand by candidates to headline fundraisers and other events.

Last month she checked in at five events for Republican candidates, and is expected to step up her schedule as November approaches.

Bush also mentions her frequently in campaign speeches — generally to apologize that he's there instead of her. Bush's public approval rating is about 40 percent.

Nevertheless, in an interview last week with ABC News, the president downplayed the notion that Republican candidates are shying away from him.

"I frankly haven't had that many say, 'I don't want you around.' " Bush said. "Uh, now some of them are wisely saying, 'I'd rather have Laura than you.' "

Adding Up The Ounces Of Prevention (NYT)

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

THERE are few counterterrorism success stories more compelling than that of Raed al-Banna, a 32-year-old Jordanian turned away by wary border officers who found "multiple terrorist risk factors" and refused him entry at O'Hare Airport in Chicago in July 2003.

Given Mr. Banna's fluent English and education as a lawyer, the next chapter in his story might conceivably have been a civil rights complaint. But events took a starkly different turn.

After a suicide car bombing killed 132 people in Hilla, Iraq, in February 2005, the bomber's severed hand, still chained to the steering wheel, was found in the wreckage. Fingerprints identified the bomber as Mr. Banna, said Robert C. Bonner, who led United States Customs and Border Protection until last year.

"We've put some things in place, you bet, that make it more difficult for Al Qaeda to get terrorist operatives in the United States," Mr. Bonner said. The absence of new attacks, even as terrorist violence worldwide has increased and bombers have struck in Madrid, London and beyond, he said, "is not pure luck."

If the Banna case appears to show government vigilance at its best, critics say the case of seven men arrested in June in Miami's Haitian community illustrates government overzealousness in the campaign against terror.

Announced with dual news conferences in Washington and Miami, the indictment accused the men of planning to "levy war against the United States," targeting the Sears Tower in Chicago and federal office buildings in Florida.

But if some terrorism defendants charged after 9/11 had ties to Al Qaeda, in the Miami case, the F.B.I. itself supplied Al Qaeda. Its informer, posing as a member of Al Qaeda, bought the men military boots and promised money and weapons even as the group began to crumble.

"The Miami case is nonsense," said Marc S. Sageman, a former Central Intelligence Agency officer and consultant on terrorism, who said the group showed little ability to execute any plot. "Those are absolute jokers."

There is a consensus among counterterrorism officials and independent experts that the government's actions over the last five years — from the dismantling of camps run by Al Qaeda and the decimation of its leadership, to the tightening of visa and border controls, to the scores of terrorism-related prosecutions — have made the country a harder target.

The Age of Terror, at least inside the United States, has morphed into the Age of the Foiled Plot. But this very success has led to a new debate. The government says the record vindicates its prevention strategy — to intervene long before an attack is imminent. Its critics assert that officials have exaggerated the threat posed by some accused plotters, painting hapless misfits as Qaeda operatives.

None of this means that a serious plot isn't being hatched now, invisible even to a counterterrorist bureaucracy hugely expanded since 2001. But five years of evidence suggests that the terrorist threat within the United States is much more modest than was feared after 9/11, when it seemed quite possible that there were terrorist sleeper cells in American cities, armed with "weapons of mass destruction" and awaiting orders to attack.

Even as some European immigrant communities have emerged as caldrons of jihadist anger, American Muslims have turned out to be a loyal group whose affluence and diversity offer infertile ground for plotting. And the Iraq war, even as it has deepened Muslim hostility to the United States, has most likely diverted anti-American terrorists to a more convenient target.

"The idea that we are surrounded by terrorists who could strike anywhere, anytime, is a complete misconception," said Karen J. Greenberg, director of the Center on Law and Security at New York University.

That misconception, she said, is fueled in part by the Justice Department's much-publicized pursuit of what it calls "terrorism-related" cases. But a new study of all such prosecutions since 9/11, conducted by the university center, found that of 417 people charged in the cases — including some involving anti-abortion violence and other crimes unrelated to the threat from Al Qaeda — the overwhelming majority faced immigration or other lesser charges. Just 39 have been convicted so far on terrorism-related charges, and only three of actual terrorism.

And some antiterrorism successes claimed by the government seem distinctly underwhelming.

The four "examples of W.M.D. cases" described in a June Justice Department report on counterterrorism efforts over five years include accounts of two Texas survivalists caught with hazardous chemicals, two Chinese-born American citizens who offered shoulder-fired missiles to an undercover F.B.I. agent, a Washington State engineer who wanted to use poisonous ricin to kill his wife, and an Arizona man whose attempt to make ricin failed but who wore the harmless powder he did make in a vial around his neck.

As time has passed without a new attack, the voices of skeptics who believe that 9/11 was more a fluke than a harbinger are beginning to be heard.

"A perfectly plausible explanation is that there are no terrorists here," said John Mueller, a political scientist at Ohio State University who advances the doubters' case in an article in Foreign Affairs. "I don't say there's no threat, but the threat has been massively exaggerated."

Even Thomas H. Kean, chairman of the national 9/11 commission, who believes that the terrorist threat to the United States is extremely serious, says that the F.B.I. has sometimes squandered huge resources on minor domestic cases.

Some 400 investigators from 23 federal, state and local agencies were mobilized in Los Angeles last year to look for a suspected prison-based terror cell tied to several gas station robberies, a case held up in April by the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III, as a prime example of the homegrown terrorist threat.

But Mr. Kean said the case threatened small-scale violence and should have been a routine police concern.

"We're going to have those things and always have had," Mr. Kean said. Al Qaeda, he said, is an international network "that has announced they want to do us harm and kill as many Americans as possible, that has technology to support them, and has some very intelligent people who are working to do us harm."

"That is the enemy," Mr. Kean said. "We've got to always keep our focus on that."

F.B.I. officials protest that such remarks misread a clear and successful strategy. Excoriated for failing to detect the 9/11 hijackers before they acted, agents now are finding and arresting people the government describes as extremists from Lackawanna, N.Y., to Lodi, Calif., before they can get close to mounting an attack, the officials say.

"People criticize us for having counterterrorism cases that result in relatively modest criminal prosecutions," said Philip Mudd, second in command of the F.B.I.'s new National Security Branch. "I look at that and applaud it. I'd prefer to bust conspiracies so early that someone doesn't have access to a weapon."

That certainly describes the alleged plots uncovered in the United States. Consider the new schemes unearthed in 2006 to attack Washington and New York. In April, two young Atlanta men were accused of making a "casing video" of the United States Capitol and the World Bank and sending it to a London extremist active on jihadist Web sites. In July, the authorities revealed that a Lebanese business professor had been arrested after discussing over the Internet the notion of placing suicide bombers aboard commuter trains to Manhattan, hoping to flood the submerged tunnels.

Both cases briefly made headlines before blurring with all the rest of the unconsummated mayhem reported since 2001. But neither had progressed beyond the fantasy stage. None of the people exchanging messages about the tunnel scheme had set foot in the United States. The "casing video" of Washington, according to one person who has seen it, amounted to shaky images totaling less than a minute that would have been useless in planning a real attack.

Evan F. Kohlmann, a terrorism researcher and author who has consulted for the F.B.I. and Scotland Yard, said the F.B.I.'s policy of rapid intervention often makes sense.

"We look at some of these guys and say, 'If this is the threat, what do we have to worry about?' " Mr. Kohlmann said. "But a lot of the 9/11 hijackers were not exactly brain surgeons either. If they get in contact with people who have more sophistication and money, they can become very dangerous."

But John Arquilla, who studies terrorism at the Naval Postgraduate School, said that it sometimes makes more sense to continue monitoring the would-be plotters than to arrest them. The greatest value of such primitive conspirators as the Miami men is as bait for more sophisticated terrorists who might try to use them as cannon fodder, he said.

By cutting off insights into future contacts, Mr. Arquilla said, "I think making arrests in the Florida case actually made us less secure."

Experts: U.S. Likely To Be Hit Again (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

The threat of terrorism against the United States remains chillingly lethal five years after 9/11, and officials predict another massive attack is not a matter of if — but when.

Despite a government overhaul and more than $250 billion spent to bolster security on airlines, at borders and in seaports, few doubt al-Qaida's intent to strike the U.S. again. That the nation hasn't been hit since Sept. 11, 2001, may say as much about terrorists' patience as it does about steps taken to stop them.

"I know of nobody in the intelligence field who doesn't believe there will be another attack," said Thomas Kean, former New Jersey governor and Republican chair of the 9/11 Commission that investigated the government's security missteps leading up to the 2001 hijackings.

"There's going to be another attack," Kean said. "They just can't tell you when."

In a new age of rapid and widespread ID checks, locked and bulletproof cockpit doors in airliners, armed pilots, tracking foreigners' visas and monitoring Muslim and Arab communities, few expect a precise repeat of the plot that used airline hijackings to bring down big buildings.

The unsettling reality of terrorism, however, is that it is always in search of new ways to accomplish mass death and destruction. And always in search of the weakest link.

Authorities have disrupted a number of high-profile plots, including last month's bombing scare on as many as 10 Britain-to-U.S. flights. The CIA has helped ensnare some 5,000 terror suspects around the world. And the government has imposed hundreds of security measures on foreign visitors and U.S. residents alike, from making travelers take off their shoes at airport checkpoints to eavesdropping on phone and e-mail conversations.

But glaring gaps in the security net remain.

Undercover inspectors testing the nation's security system have repeatedly sneaked weapons through airport checkpoints, entered the country with fake identification and foiled detectors that catch the trace amounts of radiation in kitty litter and bananas, but not always nuclear materials. Air testers to sniff out biological agents are becoming obsolete. And not all port or airline cargo is rigorously inspected.

And, as Hurricane Katrina showed last year, disaster response systems at all levels of government are woefully unprepared for a catastrophe.

"No matter what you do, it's not enough," said Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., co-chair of a congressional 9/11 caucus. "But the systems we've worked hard on to put in place are not working."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, whose department was created in 2003 as a result of 9/11, points to strides made in sharing intelligence and screening passengers and cargo on flights and at seaports as proof that the country has been made safer without shutting down commerce. Yet he acknowledges more needs to be done in his agency that largely grapples with reacting to past crises while also thinking about what terrorists might try next.

The intelligence community spends a significant amount of time doing what Chertoff described as "putting ourselves in the heads of terrorists — looking at emerging techniques and trying to figure out how terrorists might exploit our systems."

In one example, Chertoff said, the department last year relaxed its ban on scissors and small innocuous tools from being carried on planes to give inspectors more time to look for explosive devices. Screeners also are now being trained to interpret facial expressions and other behavioral patterns to pick out suspicious travelers.

"We will live with some form of this problem for a very long time," Chertoff said in an hour-long interview last month wedged between a phone call with British Home Secretary John Reid about the foiled flight plot and a meeting with FEMA director David Paulison about the hurricane season.

Several government-appointed panels — including the 9/11 Commission — have concluded over the last five years that the nation was vastly unprepared for the deadly attacks.

Their findings triggered a massive reshuffling of the government's counterterror missions, the largest since the Defense Department was created in 1947. In addition to merging 22 agencies into the new Homeland Security Department, a new position of intelligence director to oversee the nation's 16 spy agencies was established.

Congress approved policies such as the USA Patriot Act, allowing more surveillance in counterterrorism investigations. Federal spending on domestic security programs has more than tripled since 2001, to $55 billion this year, almost equal to what is spent on education.

The results have been mixed. Criticism for Homeland Security has run from sweeping (for cutting emergency responder funding to New York and Washington) to nitpicky (the color-coded threat alert system is too vague to be meaningful).

"Everything the department was supposed to do is still, at best, a work in progress," said Clark Kent Evin, Homeland Security's former inspector general.

Meanwhile, the government's once-greatest target in the war on terror — Osama bin Laden — remains on the loose. Michael Scheuer, the former head of the now-defunct CIA unit dedicating to finding the al-Qaida leader, said catching him now is mostly a matter of luck. "He's going to have to zig when we zag and we'll end up in the same place at once," Scheuer said.

With or without bin Laden, authorities expect al-Qaida's threat won't dim in coming years.

Some sympathizers — including small pockets of homegrown Islamic extremists already in the United States — may not even be directly linked to al-Qaida but aim to carry out its mission. Those who make up al-Qaida's core will wait years, and even decades, for the chance to attack when America least expects it.

"I'm convinced they're prepared to wait centuries if they have to," former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge said. "They're looking much longer term than we are. So we have to match their patience with our persistence and our continued focus. We can never let our guard down."

Is The U.S. Winning This War? (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Al Qaeda has suffered setbacks, but America may have lost ground in the long-term fight, experts say. Statistics can't tell the full story.

DOJ_NMG_0060719

WASHINGTON — Five years after Sept. 11, is the United States winning the war against Al Qaeda? President Bush says yes, but most experts — including many inside the U.S. government — say no.

An all-out effort by the United States and its allies has succeeded in making life difficult for Al Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and Ayman Zawahiri, and has probably disrupted any plans they had for further terrorism on the scale of the attacks in 2001, the experts say.

But as even Bush acknowledged last week, Al Qaeda is far from dead.

"In the five years since our nation was attacked, Al Qaeda and terrorists it has inspired have continued to attack across the world," the president said. "The terrorist danger remains."

In a series of recent speeches to mark the anniversary of the attacks, Bush has declared: "America is winning the war on terror" and cited a list of achievements: "We've removed terrorist sanctuaries, disrupted their finances, killed and captured key operatives, broken up terrorist cells in America and other nations, and stopped new attacks before they're carried out."

But terrorism experts worry that those successes have been mostly tactical, short-term gains — the equivalent of winning the first few battles in a long war. On longer-term strategic issues, they warn, the U.S. may have lost ground since 2001:

· Al Qaeda, the initial focus of the "global war on terror," has been disrupted and dispersed. But it has been succeeded by a looser network of affiliates and homegrown terrorists — like those who carried out bombings in Madrid in 2004 and London in 2005 — who could grow to be just as dangerous.

· The war in Iraq has become a training ground for Islamic extremists from Saudi Arabia and other countries, and some have returned home with expertise in urban warfare and explosives. Some experts fear the Persian Gulf's oil terminals could be among their next targets.

· Wars in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon have damaged the image of the U.S. in much of the Muslim world and made it easier for terrorist organizations to win recruits. The wars and controversies over U.S. treatment of detainees also have made it more difficult for allied governments to cooperate with American counterterrorism programs, diplomats say.

· When Foreign Policy magazine surveyed more than 100 experts earlier this year, 84% said they did not believe the United States was winning the war on terrorism. In a Los Angeles Times poll, fewer than one-fourth of Americans said they believed the nation was "winning"; more than half said it was too soon to tell.

"Even the most sanguine optimist cannot yet conclude we are winning," John F. Lehman Jr., a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, warned in a recent article for the U.S. Naval Institute.

"It looks worse to me," said Bruce Hoffman, a former director of terrorism studies at the Rand Corp. who teaches at Georgetown University and the U.S. Military Academy. "Al Qaeda is still alive and kicking. It's just changed its modus operandi. We've often painted a picture of Al Qaeda in retreat. I'm not sure it isn't Al Qaeda on the march."

When asked for his report card on the war on terrorism, Henry A. Crumpton, the State Department's top counterterrorism officer, paused and said: "It's uneven…. It's hard for me to give it an A or an F. It's a real mixed bag."

At first glance, the experts' gloom may seem odd. There haven't been any successful terrorist attacks inside the U.S. since Sept. 11, although law enforcement officials say there have been several close calls.

"It's been five years, and the U.S. homeland has not been hit," said Daniel Byman, director of Georgetown's security studies program. "I don't know any terrorism experts who called this…. We were all wrong."

As a result, he said: "My assessment is that we're doing reasonably well. If the test is reducing catastrophic violence that can change our lives, we're doing rather well. If it's reducing the overall climate of violence, we're doing fairly poorly. If 30 or 40 Americans die from terrorism each year, that's a tragedy, but it's different from losing 3,000 a year. It's a problem, but it's probably not a strategic problem."

Indeed, some national security experts — like John Mueller of Ohio State University — argue that the terrorist threat has been overblown and that a terrorist industry of consultants, government contractors and politicians is hyping the problem out of self-interest.

"For all the attention it evokes, terrorism, in reasonable context, actually causes rather little damage," Mueller said, noting that automobile accidents kill many more Americans than terrorists do. "The likelihood that any individual will become a victim in most places is microscopic."

But the consensus of government officials and nongovernmental experts is that the terrorist threat remains real, and the respite from violence is temporary.

"Why have we not suffered [another] attack?" asked Lee H. Hamilton, co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission, which exhaustively studied the 2001 attacks. "The honest answer is: We don't know. We simply don't know. Because we don't know the minds of the terrorists."

Paul Pillar, a former top CIA analyst, said: "The line between an attack that occurs and one that doesn't can be very thin. It comes down to luck and circumstance with regard to any particular operation."

One theory on the lack of homegrown Islamic terrorism inside the U.S. — especially in contrast to Europe, where police have foiled several planned attacks — is that Muslims in this country are more assimilated and less alienated.

"There are a lot of possible explanations," Byman said. "But they're all conjecture."

In any case, most Bush administration officials have been careful to avoid taking credit for the fact that there has been no second Sept. 11 attack — because, they say, they still expect one.

"We have hurt Al Qaeda severely, I think, but they continue to work toward another 9/11 or something even more spectacular," Crumpton said.

Although there have been no other attacks inside the United States, terrorism as a worldwide phenomenon has not diminished since 2001.

The National Memorial Institute for the Prevention of Terrorism, which maintains an exhaustive database, reports that terrorism has killed more than 2,300 people every year since 2001.

Most of those fatalities resulted from domestic terrorism — attacks that stemmed from strife within a single country — rather than international attacks like Sept. 11. But the institute's research director, James O. Ellis III, notes that domestic terrorism often gives birth to the international kind.

The number of civilian deaths from terrorism in 2005, as defined by the institute, swelled to more than 8,000, mostly because of sectarian violence in Iraq. But even outside Iraq, 1,952 civilians died in terrorist attacks last year.

"In international terrorism, we've seen a decrease in the number of incidents but a rise in lethality; more people are dying," Ellis said. "In domestic terrorism, we've seen a rising number of incidents and rising lethality too."

Those numbers don't measure the likelihood of more attacks on the United States; they merely confirm that terrorism as a tactic for radical insurgent groups around the world is thriving.

The statistics are part of a broad debate on how best to gauge progress in the larger battle — a measure the Pentagon calls "metrics."

In October 2003, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote a memo to his closest aides, asking: "Are we winning or losing the global war on terror?"

"Today, we lack metrics to know," Rumsfeld complained. "Are we capturing, killing or deterring and dissuading more terrorists every day than the madrasas [Islamic religious schools] and the radical clerics are recruiting, training and deploying against us?"

He told his aides he wanted better measuring sticks and a clearer strategy.

Almost three years after Rumsfeld's memo, the Bush administration last week issued a long-range plan, the "National Strategy for Combating Terrorism," most of the details of which remain classified.

But the Pentagon concluded it just wasn't possible to keep accurate track of terrorist recruiting trends, as Rumsfeld had asked — especially as Al Qaeda evolved from a close-knit organization into an amorphous, radical movement.

"It's a hard thing to measure," said Stephen A. Cambone, the undersecretary of Defense for intelligence, who oversees much of the Pentagon's counterterrorism effort. "It's … more difficult than an observer might think."

Said Raphael Perl of the Congressional Research Service, who has monitored the issue for lawmakers: "There are metrics we could use," but not all parts of the government can agree on them.

He listed some measurements, beginning with the size and strength of terrorist organizations, their levels of technology and weaponry, and their access to state sponsors or havens. "Is radical Islam growing or shrinking? We aren't measuring it," he said.

Some criteria, he added, are domestic: "Our ability to recover [from terrorist attacks]. Our ability to damage ourselves through overreaction."

Perl said an important gauge was how much money was being spent to combat potential terrorism.

"9/11 has cost the world economy more than a trillion dollars in added security spending," he said. "If you can tear down the global economy, people are going to be much more receptive to other ideologies."

Before Rumsfeld's 2003 memo, the Bush administration focused its efforts and its metrics on the campaign to destroy or dismantle the leadership of Al Qaeda and its allies. That campaign, which ranged from detective work to capture suspects to "targeted killing" strikes against terrorist leaders, was largely successful.

The Bush administration maintains that three-fourths of Al Qaeda's known leaders have been removed. Other experts have disputed the figure but agree that what was known as "Al Qaeda Central" — Al Qaeda in its 2001 form — at least was reduced in size and effectiveness.

But in response, the terrorist organization has changed, the State Department's Crumpton noted. "Al Qaeda and affiliates are learning organizations," he said. "They evolve. If we make changes in our efforts and we have success — and we have — then they will make changes and counter what we have done."

"The core group of people around Bin Laden are weaker. The angry young sympathizers are more numerous," Hoffman said.

Hoffman said the new mix would mean fewer complicated, large-scale attacks like the bombing of the U.S. destroyer Cole in Yemen in 2000. "But you can still have something like the Madrid terrorist attacks," he said. "Is that progress?"

As homegrown anti-American terrorist groups have sprung up from Spain and Britain to Indonesia and Canada, the Bush administration has augmented its "kill and capture" strategy with a longer-term drive to spread democracy, stabilize Muslim societies and win hearts and minds around the globe.

The aim, officials say, isn't to persuade the world's Muslims to like the U.S. — the focus of the administration's unsuccessful early "public diplomacy" efforts.

"That turned out to be Mission: Impossible," one official said.

Instead, the main goal is to delegitimize terrorism — to convince Muslims that Bin Laden and his followers threaten Muslim communities as much as they threaten New York or Washington.

Bush calls this "the war of ideas," and compared it last week to the 20th century battle between communism and democracy in the Cold War.

The newest effort is still in its early stages. Some parts, officials acknowledge, have met with what one called "rough going": anti-American insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan. Others have been painfully slow at best: encouraging democracy in Egypt and Saudi Arabia. But some, officials say, have gone well: keeping countries like Indonesia, Malaysia and the Philippines from turning into havens for terrorist groups.

One metric that administration officials don't like talking about involves how people in other countries view the U.S. The results of a multi-country poll sponsored this year by the Pew Charitable Trusts are sobering.

When people in largely Muslim nations were asked whether they approved of "U.S.-led efforts to fight terrorism," 82% in Egypt said no, as did 74% in Jordan, 77% in Turkey and 50% in Pakistan. Some European countries showed similar results: 76% of those surveyed in Spain and 57% in France said they did not approve.

"When the United States is that unpopular in countries we count on as our closest allies, we have a real uphill struggle," said Paul B. Stares of the U.S. Institute of Peace, a congressionally funded nonpartisan think tank.

One senior U.S. official, speaking on condition he not be identified so that he could speak more candidly, acknowledged that the unpopularity of the U.S. had made it harder for allied governments — like Pakistan and India — to cooperate with U.S. counterterrorism efforts.

In response, the Bush administration has significantly increased the amount of money it is spending on "public diplomacy" to more than $1.4 billion this year, double the funding level before Sept. 11.

But improving the U.S. image abroad will be an uphill battle.

"There is a certain amount of anti-Americanism which exists just because we're the world superpower," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). "But in addition to that, deserved or undeservedly, the American image of hubris and condescension is damaging to our efforts. We should be more humble; we should be more considerate."

Asked whether Bush had made that problem worse, McCain smiled.

"I think sometimes the president's passion is interpreted as hubris…. [But] I think he fully recognizes that we have a problem, and I think he's working at trying to help improve America's image."

The additional attention and money for nation-building and public relations is increasingly seen as a key to winning the war against Al Qaeda.

"It's not so much a question [of] whether you're able to … capture or kill or otherwise drive off" terrorists, said Cambone, the Pentagon intelligence chief. "That we know we can do. It's whether the confidence of those who stand in opposition [to terrorism] is going up … and that of the terrorists is going down.

"Then you're succeeding," he said. "And then the issue isn't how many successive terrorist cells you've undone. They will disband."

Tracking terror

Despite military operations to fight terrorism in Iraq and Afghanistan, terrorism incidents and fatalities are on the rise worldwide, especially in Iraq. Meanwhile, U.S. spending on domestic security and funding for military operations overseas has risen steadily since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Citizens Can Aid FBI By Keeping Eyes Open (HC)

Houston Chronicle, September 10, 2006

U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle and Roderick Beverly, special agent in charge of the Houston FBI office, are top federal officials in the area's anti-terrorism efforts. Chronicle reporter Harvey Rice spoke separately to the two and asked how ordinary citizens can play a role in combating terrorism five years after the Sept. 11 attacks. Here are their responses.

· On whether authorities still urge people to call about suspicious activities:

BEVERLY: Absolutely. You know, I think the greatest threat to the American people today is the threat of complacency. We continue to encourage people to be vigilant and report suspicious activities to their local police and the FBI.

DeGABRIELLE: Fortunately, a lot of (tips) turn out to be nothing. But we would rather err on the side of caution.

· On their reaction to people who refrain from calling for fear a tip might sound silly:

BEVERLY: If we don't know there is a potential problem out there, there is no way we can fix it. I would err on the side of being vigilant.

DeGABRIELLE: I would hope they would check their feelings at the door and go ahead and make the call and, hopefully, we can make an informed decision about whether a response is necessary. I'm certainly not encouraging crank calls, and I'm not encouraging people to call when there is absolutely no reason to do so. But people in neighborhoods know what is normal in the area, and they sometimes are best suited to seeing something out of the ordinary.

· On the kinds of activities that people should look for:

BEVERLY: Anything that's out of the ordinary, anything that looks to be criminal in nature should be reported to (the FBI) and/or the local police. We always encourage people to kind of follow their instincts.

DeGABRIELLE: As many activities as there are people to conduct them. I know that's a rather vague direction to give to people, but they perhaps best know what is unusual, or out of the ordinary, or suspicious.

· On whether people should be especially vigilant around places like airports, ports and refineries:

DeGABRIELLE: Certainly. Law enforcement pays greater attention to those areas, and it would be a good idea for people also to be aware of things that are out of the ordinary.

· On the number of tips received since Sept. 11, 2001:

BEVERLY: The first couple of months after 9/11, we were easily over 100 a month. Now it's kind of leveled off, and we're around 75 a month probably.

· On whether any tips have panned out:

BEVERLY: I certainly think there have been tips that we have taken to a second level or otherwise made the subject of an investigation. Probably the overwhelming majority will not result in any type of an arrest or much beyond a cursory check of identity.

DeGABRIELLE: I have to say yes, but I can't be specific. Obviously, there is information that we cannot share publicly. What might, on the one hand, seem to be a rather benign federal prosecution, can and has been on occasion coupled with intelligence that, for reasons of classification, could not be and was not shared.

· On phone numbers that people should call:

DeGABRIELLE: The main number at the FBI is one obvious number, but, frankly, any law enforcement agency that they are familiar with. The main number at the FBI, 713-693-5000, would be a good place to start.

· On what people should do when the national system of color-coded alerts is raised to a higher level:

BEVERLY: This is a visual stimulus, if you will. All things being equal, they should take that into consideration for their personal security habits.

DeGABRIELLE: Generally speaking, they should be even more vigilant.

· On whether asking people to be vigilant, in effect, asks them to keep an eye on their neighbors:

BEVERLY: We're not asking them to spy on their neighbors per se or do anything distasteful. It's just like we do on neighborhood watch: Be a good neighbor and take care of your neighbors.

DeGABRIELLE: I don't think we are asking people to spy on one another, certainly. It's only in those circumstances when people see something that's unusual, they can make the phone call and, if law enforcement deems it appropriate, that agency will follow up with an appropriate investigation.

Unanswered Questions Of September 11 (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

Five years after the deadliest enemy attack ever on the United States, questions linger about the terror plot that toppled New York's World Trade Center, damaged the Pentagon and ignited the ongoing war on terrorism.

The killing of nearly 3,000 people on September 11, 2001, is not a "cold case."

But it also is not a closed case, and despite the huge body of evidence collected, unanswered questions remain. Among them:

·Who did the airliner hijackers meet as they spent months in the U.S. planning -- and traveling to places such as Las Vegas and Los Angeles?

·What was the ultimate source of money for the terrorist operation?

·What motivated 19 relatively well-off Arab men, all Muslims, to become such horrific suicide bombers?

Lee Hamilton, vice chairman of the national September 11 commission, says motivation was the "big question" the panel could not answer.

"We were never able to answer why the 19 were willing to kill themselves. What was the motivation? I am talking in a very personal way," Mr. Hamilton, a Democrat who represented Indiana's 9th District in the House for 34 years, said in an interview wih The Washington Times.

"What was the motivation for each one of these hijackers? I think the question of motivation was opaque to us. We just could not nail it. They were dead, of course."

He said investigators guessed at a religious motive or a political grievance against the West, or more specifically the United States.

"Why do they hate us? It's one of the fundamental questions raised again and again," Mr. Hamilton said. "We couldn't pin it down for the 19."

Fourth target

The attack spurred the FBI to open the largest criminal investigation in its history.

Penttbomb, as the probe was code-named, culled the depths of radical Islam and the al Qaeda network to construct an authoritative chronology of the terrorists' four years of planning to drive fuel-packed jetliners into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and an unidentified Washington symbol of political power.

The FBI followed more than a half-million leads and conducted more than 165,000 interviews.

The national September 11 commission, with former New Jersey Gov. Thomas H. Kean, a Republican, as chairman, examined the FBI's work and coaxed huge amounts of documents from the nation's intelligence agencies.

The commission produced a narrative on the attack. So did journalists who dug up additional facts on events leading up to the September 11 assault on America's financial and military brain center.

But the deaths of all 19 hijackers denied probers interrogations that likely would have produced even more information on the planning and on militant Islamist Osama bin Laden's global terrorist organization, al Qaeda.

Mr. Hamilton said another part of the plot remains a mystery. The hijackers devoted one plane, United Flight 93, to a target in Washington, D.C. But which one?

The answer is important because al Qaeda tends to revisit targets, such as the World Trade Center, on which a previous attack in 1993 failed.

"We know they want to attack symbols of American power," Mr. Hamilton said. "It would be interesting to know which symbols they put at the top, the top of their list."

The commission's report says bin Laden, who is still on the run from the U.S. military, wanted the fourth plane to hit the White House.

But Mohammed Atta, a key plot organizer and hijacker, thought the target too difficult and preferred the U.S. Capitol. Officials also speculated that CIA headquarters in McLean was the target.

Because of all this painstaking detective work, it is part of the historical record that Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, a Kuwaiti living in Pakistan, dreamed up the September 11 scheme and sold the plan to bin Laden.

It is known that bin Laden and his No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahri, personally recruited some of the 19 hijackers. Atta, who flew American Flight 11 into the trade center's North Tower at 8:46 a.m., was radicalized in a mosque in Hamburg, Germany.

Others found jihad at Islamic centers around the Middle East. All passed through bin Laden's fiefdom in Afghanistan before making their way to America, using passports and visas.

'Odd travel patterns'

A U.S. intelligence official, who asked not to be named, said the CIA still doesn't know with whom the hijackers met as they traveled across the United States.

Intelligence agencies would like to know "the nature and extent of support the hijackers had while in the United States, not to mention the nature and support in Germany and elsewhere," the official said in an interview. "We can't rule out as a possibility people who either knowingly or unwittingly" aided the conspirators.

The official asked, "What was behind their odd travel patterns? Why all the trips to Las Vegas? What exactly may have happened there? There are still some unanswered questions."

September 11 commissioner Fred Fielding, White House counsel to President Reagan, has his own pet mystery.

"The one thing that always bothered me, and we never got to the bottom of," Mr. Fielding said, was why Atta and fellow hijacker Abdulaziz Alomari drove from Boston to Maine to catch a flight back to Boston to connect with American Flight 11.

"What doesn't make sense to me is, this plot had to be perfect," Mr. Fielding said in an interview. "Everything had to work right for these guys, and unfortunately, it did. They couldn't have any mistakes.

"Atta and his team went up to Portland, Maine, and they flew back and had to go through two security checks. ... I've never figured it out. Why did he go to Portland, and what [did they do] in Portland, because it doesn't make any sense. He put the whole plan in jeopardy."

FBI Special Agent James N. Fitzgerald told the September 11 commission that the bureau has not figured out why Atta went to Maine.

"So the best indication we have of why he did what he did is from that detainee reporting, indicating that he probably did so to minimize the amount of people who would be arriving at Flight 11 at one time," Mr. Fitzgerald said.

Why it matters

Some of the unsolved mysteries -- such as with whom the hijackers met -- are important in understanding the plot's true breadth and whether any conspirators remain at large in the U.S., planning the next attack.

Other questions asked by the FBI, the commission and lawmakers would, if answered, shed more light on how al Qaeda terrorists operate in the days leading up to an attack. Such a profile might tip off the next attempt at mass murder.

Among other unanswered questions:

·More conspirators. Investigators believe there were other September 11 plotters. For instance, Atta took several trips to Europe after first arriving in the United States. The presumption is he met with jihadist allies -- but who? When Atta returned to Florida from one trip, fellow conspirator Marwan Al-Shehhi went to Casablanca, Morocco, for eight days. But why?

·Money. Investigators estimate the total cost of executing the attack at about $500,000, but do not know the ultimate source. Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who is in CIA custody, handled most of the funds, but apparently cannot cast much light on its original source.

·The 20th hijacker. Three of the hijacked jets carried five jihadists; four hijackers were aboard the fourth, United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed in a field near Shanksville, Pa., after passengers attempted to retake the plane. The FBI's theory is that Mohammed planned for a 20th, but who?

The bureau initially said that Zacarias Moussaoui was to be that man. Moussaoui took flight lessons in Oklahoma and received $14,000 from conspirator Ramzi Binalshibh. But the government didn't present any evidence when Moussaoui pleaded guilty to conspiracy. He was sentenced to life in prison.

The September 11 commission said as many as eight other al Qaeda members attempted to enter the country but failed, including Mohammed al-Kahtani. The U.S. later captured al-Kahtani in Afghanistan and shipped him to a detention facility at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Binalshibh, another captured al Qaeda member, was denied entry into the U.S. four times. Authorities eventually captured him in 2002.

Debunking myths

Conspiracy theorists have had a field day with the September 11 attacks. Exploiting gaps in knowledge, fuzzy photographs and mistaken eyewitnesses, Internet bloggers circulated reams of unsubstantiated assertions.

Among these unlikely claims:

·The U.S. government planned and carried out the hijackings. How else to explain why none of the four planes was shot down by the military?

·The plane that hit the South Tower was not a Boeing 767 but a military refueling jet. Bombs must have caused the collapse of the twin towers because burning jet fuel is not hot enough to melt steel.

·A missile, not a Boeing 757, hit the Pentagon. French author Thierry Meyssan even knows what kind. He wrote in a book that it was a satellite-guided missile.

Now, a new book from Popular Mechanics magazine takes on the conspiratorialists. "Debunking the 9/11 Myths" examines 20 of the most persistent conspiracy theories and counters them with facts.

Reporters and editors say they consulted with more than 300 specialists and organizations to reach their conclusions. The book does not look at the al Qaeda plot, per se, but instead focuses on the major events that day, such as the fall of the twin towers.

For example: Maybe burning jet fuel is not hot enough to melt steel, but it did create an inferno hot enough -- when coupled with burning rugs, furniture and curtains -- to significantly weaken the frames, leading to the collapse.

About the Pentagon strike, "Debunking the 9/11 Myths" starts with the fact that dozens of persons actually saw American Flight 77 slam into the building's "E Ring" and bore toward the center courtyard. Then there is the plane's debris, scattered on the lawn.

"I held parts of uniforms from crew members in my hands, including body parts. OK?" structural engineer Allyn E. Kilsheimer told the book's authors.

Flight 93

"We are not attempting to tell the story of September 11," said James B. Meigs, Popular Mechanics editor in chief. "What we are doing is fact-checking the factual claims made by conspiratorial theorists themselves.

"They ignore the vast body of evidence. They ignore the huge accumulation of historical facts that confirms the mainstream view."

Critics of that view discount the entire story of United Flight 93, in which passengers talked on cell phones to authorities and loved ones before mounting an assault on the hijackers. The critics contend cell phones do not work in high-flying jet airliners.

But Mr. Meigs' reporters went to specialists who explained: "Cell phones work pretty well in airplanes, especially in rural areas."

Bloggers also wrote that World Trade Center building No. 7 must have been felled by demolition professionals because it received little damage in the attack. An early government report seemed to substantiate the damage angle.

Popular Mechanics discovered that report was wrong. The building's facade had been damaged significantly from falling debris, subsequent examinations showed.

And, skeptics ask, how could NORAD (North American Aerospace Defense Command) fail to launch intercepts to shoot down the four planes in the minutes after the Federal Aviation Administration determined they were hijacked?

NORAD, however, was ill-equipped to quickly respond and shoot down a civilian airliner. The command lacked streamlined communications with the FAA.

"The way the conspiracy theorists work is, they exploit the way they think things ought to work," Mr. Meigs said. "I call it the 'myth of government hyper-competence.'"

Body count

One glaring gap at the World Trade Center crime scene is the body count. Some victims simply vanished. The extensive fireball incinerated some to dust, making recovery impossible.

Of the 2,749 persons killed, the remains of 1,151 have not been identified.

Last spring, nearly 500 human remains were found on the roof of the Deutsche Bank building at ground zero by workers preparing the site for demolition, offering hope that the remains of more of those killed might yet be identified.

The grisly discovery prompted a coalition of September 11 survivors' organizations to ask that demolition of the building be halted until after a thorough search of the site.

"The huge amount of human remains recently found after nearly five years, and the prediction from experts that large amounts will continue to be discovered, is cause for great concern," the coalition announced. "Now is the time to take action to recover the over 40 percent of victims still missing."

Federal, state and local authorities made a massive effort to identify the remains of missing victims until New York officials suspended the process.

The last official identification took place in January: New York firefighter Keithroy M. Maynard, 30, of Engine Co. 33. His family had held off having a funeral until DNA testing identified his remains -- four years after the attack.

City and state officials have said they expect to find more remains as demolition and construction work near ground zero continues.

Despite the use of advanced DNA techniques, the remains of nearly 42 percent of those killed at the World Trade Center have not been found. Of the more than 19,900 separate remains recovered from ground zero, 4,735 were identified.

Only 293 intact bodies were found, authorities said, of which only 12 could be identified by sight. Nearly 10,000 remains have been frozen for future analysis.

Case open

Dr. Robert C. Shaler doubts that all those killed will be accounted for. As the director of forensic biology at the New York City Office of Chief Medical Examiner, he was responsible for overseeing DNA identification of the World Trade Center victims.

Some of the victims likely were incinerated amid the burning rubble, Dr. Shaler said in an interview with The Washington Times. Others were so decomposed that DNA testing may not be possible.

Dr. Shaler is now a professor of biochemistry and molecular biology at Penn State University, where he is director of the forensics science program.

In his book, "Who They Were," Dr. Shaler writes that New York City was unprepared for such mass fatalities. The Office of the Chief Medical Examiner, he says, had to be reconfigured to process and identify the dead.

Authorities say the September 11 plot will remain an open case for years. One key reason: Any new tidbit can help stop the next conspiracy.

"This has been and continues to be an area of focus for the CIA and other intelligence agencies, because the answers could help deter or disrupt future terrorists attacks," the intelligence official said.

"Some questions may be answered with the passage of more time. But others may not be, because the precise details might be known only by the hijackers themselves."

And Mr. Hamilton, the commission vice chairman, cautions that his panel's voluminous report and archive of documents are not the final word on how the attack was carried out.

"We understood that we were writing a first draft of history," he said. "We tried very hard to make it factually accurate.

"Commissioners asked again and again and again, 'What are the facts?' We didn't claim to be infallible here. This will be an event, like the Kennedy assassination, that will be examined by generations to come."

Bin Laden Trail 'Stone Cold' (WP)

By Dana Priest And Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

U.S. Steps Up Efforts, But Good Intelligence On Ground is Lacking

The clandestine U.S. commandos whose job is to capture or kill Osama bin Laden have not received a credible lead in more than two years. Nothing from the vast U.S. intelligence world -- no tips from informants, no snippets from electronic intercepts, no points on any satellite image -- has led them anywhere near the al-Qaeda leader, according to U.S. and Pakistani officials.

"The handful of assets we have have given us nothing close to real-time intelligence" that could have led to his capture, said one counterterrorism official, who said the trail, despite the most extensive manhunt in U.S. history, has gone "stone cold."

But in the last three months, following a request from President Bush to "flood the zone," the CIA has sharply increased the number of intelligence officers and assets devoted to the pursuit of bin Laden. The intelligence officers will team with the military's secretive Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC) and with more resources from the National Security Agency and other intelligence agencies.

The problem, former and current counterterrorism officials say, is that no one is certain where the "zone" is.

"Here you've got a guy who's gone off the net and is hiding in some of the most formidable terrain in one of the most remote parts of the world surrounded by people he trusts implicitly," said T. McCreary, spokesman for the National Counterterrorism Center. "And he stays off the net and is probably not mobile. That's an extremely difficult problem."

Intelligence officials think that bin Laden is hiding in the northern reaches of the autonomous tribal region along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border. This calculation is based largely on a lack of activity elsewhere and on other intelligence, including a videotape, obtained exclusively by the CIA and not previously reported, that shows bin Laden walking on a trail toward Pakistan at the end of the battle of Tora Bora in December 2001, when U.S. forces came close but failed to capture him.

Many factors have combined in the five years since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to make the pursuit more difficult. They include the lack of CIA access to people close to al-Qaeda's inner circle; Pakistan's unwillingness to pursue him; the reemergence of the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan; the strength of the Iraqi insurgency, which has depleted U.S. military and intelligence resources; and the U.S. government's own disorganization.

But the underlying reality is that finding one person in hiding is difficult under any circumstances. Eric Rudolph, the confessed Olympics and abortion clinic bomber, evaded authorities for five years, only to be captured miles from where he was last seen in North Carolina.

It has been so long since there has been anything like a real close call that some operatives have given bin Laden a nickname: "Elvis," for all the wishful-thinking sightings that have substituted for anything real.

After playing down bin Laden's importance and barely mentioning him for several years, Bush last week repeatedly invoked his name and quoted from his writings and speeches to underscore what Bush said is the continuing threat of terrorism.

Many terrorism experts, however, say the importance of finding bin Laden has diminished since Bush first pledged to capture him "dead or alive" in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. Terrorists worldwide have repeatedly shown they no longer need him to organize or carry out attacks, the experts say. Attacks in Europe, Asia and the Middle East were perpetrated by homegrown terrorists unaffiliated with al-Qaeda.

"Will his capture stop terrorism? No," Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), vice chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said in a recent interview. "But in terms of a message to the world, it's a huge message."

Despite a lack of progress, at CIA headquarters bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are still the most wanted of the High Value Targets, referred to as "HVT 1 and 2." The CIA station in Kabul still offers a briefing to VIP visitors that declares: "We are here for the hunt!" -- a reminder that finding bin Laden is a top priority.

Gary Berntsen, the former CIA officer who led the first and last hunt for bin Laden at Tora Bora, in December 2001, says, "This could all end tomorrow." One unsolicited walk-in. One tribesman seeking to collect the $25 million reward. One courier who would rather his kids grow up in the United States. One dealmaker, "and this could all change," Berntsen said.Bin Laden Still Alive

On the videotape obtained by the CIA, bin Laden is seen confidently instructing his party how to dig holes in the ground to lie in undetected at night. A bomb dropped by a U.S. aircraft can be seen exploding in the distance. "We were there last night," bin Laden says without much concern in his voice. He was in or headed toward Pakistan, counterterrorism officials think.

That was December 2001. Only two months later, Bush decided to pull out most of the special operations troops and their CIA counterparts in the paramilitary division that were leading the hunt for bin Laden in Afghanistan to prepare for war in Iraq, said Flynt L. Leverett, then an expert on the Middle East at the National Security Council.

"I was appalled when I learned about it," said Leverett, who has become an outspoken critic of the administration's counterterrorism policy. "I don't know of anyone who thought it was a good idea. It's very likely that bin Laden would be dead or in American custody if we hadn't done that."

Several officers confirmed that the number of special operations troops was reduced in March 2001.

White House spokeswoman Michele Davis said she would not comment on the specific allegation. "Military and intelligence units move routinely in and out," she said. "The intelligence and military community's hunt for bin Laden has been aggressive and constant since the attacks."

The Pakistani intelligence service, notoriously difficult to trust but also the service with the best access to al-Qaeda circles, is convinced bin Laden is alive because no one has ever intercepted or heard a message mourning his death. "Al-Qaeda will mourn his death and will retaliate in a big way. We are pretty sure Osama is alive," Pakistan's interior minister, Aftab Khan Sherpao, said in a recent interview with The Washington Post.

Pakistani intelligence officials also say they think bin Laden remains actively involved in al-Qaeda activities. They cite the interrogations of Ahmed Khalfan Ghailani, a key planner of the bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa in 1998, and Abu-Faraj al-Libbi, who served as a communications conduit between bin Laden and senior al-Qaeda operatives until his capture last year.

Libbi and Ghailani, who was arrested in Pakistan in July 2004, were the last two people taken into custody to have met with and taken orders from Zawahiri and to hear directly from bin Laden. "Both Ghailani and Libbi were informed that Osama was well and alive and in the picture by none other than Zawahiri himself," one Pakistani intelligence official said.

Two Pakistani intelligence officials recently interviewed in Karachi said that the last time they received firsthand information on bin Laden was in April 2003, when an arrested al-Qaeda leader, Tawfiq bin Attash, disclosed having met him in the Khost province of Afghanistan three months earlier.

Attash, who helped plan the 2000 USS Cole bombing, told interrogators that the meeting took place in the Afghan mountains about two hours from the town of Khost.

By then, Pakistan was the United States' best bet for information after an infusion of funds from the U.S. intelligence community, particularly in the area of expensive NSA eavesdropping equipment.

"For technical intelligence ISI (Inter-Services Intelligence) works hand in hand with the NSA," a senior Pakistani intelligence official said. "The U.S. assistance in building Pakistan's capabilities for technical intelligence since 9/11 is superb."

Since early 2002, the United States has stationed a small number of personnel from the NSA and the CIA near where bin Laden may be hiding. They are embedded with counterterrorism units of the Pakistan army's elite Special Services Group, according to senior Pakistani intelligence officials.

The NSA and other specialists collect imagery and electronic intercepts that their CIA counterparts then share with the Pakistani units in the tribal areas and with the province of Baluchistan to the south.

But even with sophisticated technology, the local geography presents formidable obstacles. In a land of dead-end valleys, high peaks and winding ridge lines, it is easy to hide within the miles of caves and deep ravines, or to live unnoticed in mud-walled compounds barely distinguishable from the surrounding terrain.

The Afghan-Pakistan border is about 1,500 miles. Pakistan deploys 70,000 troops there. Its army had never entered the area until October 2001, more than a half century after Pakistan's founding.Pakistani Sources Lost

A Muslim country where many consider bin Laden a hero, Pakistan has grown increasingly reluctant to help the U.S. search. The army lost its best source of intelligence in 2004, after it began raids inside the tribal areas. Scouts with blood ties to the tribes ceased sharing information for fear of retaliation.

They had good reason. At least 23 senior anti-Taliban tribesmen have been assassinated in South and North Waziristan since May 2005. "Al-Qaeda footprints were found everywhere," Interior Minister Sherpao said in a recent interview. "They kidnapped and chopped off heads of at least seven of these pro-government tribesmen."

Pakistani and U.S. counterterrorism and military officials admit that Pakistan has now all but stopped looking for bin Laden. "The dirty little secret is, they have nothing, no operations, without the Paks," one former counterterrorism officer said.

Last week, Pakistan announced a truce with the Taliban that calls on the insurgent Afghan group to end armed attacks inside Pakistan and to stop crossing into Afghanistan to fight the government and international troops. The agreement also requires foreign militants to leave the tribal area of North Waziristan or take up a peaceable life there.

In Afghanistan, the hunt for bin Laden has been upstaged by the reemergence of the Taliban and al-Qaeda, and by Afghan infighting for control of territory and opium poppy cropland.

Lt. Gen. John R. Vines, who commanded U.S. troops in Afghanistan in 2003, said he thinks bin Laden kept close to the border, not wandering far into either country. That belief is still current among military and intelligence analysts.

"We believe that he held to a pretty narrow range of within 15 kilometers of the border," said Vines, who now commands the XVIII Airborne Corps, "so that if the Pakistanis, for whatever reason, chose to do something to him, he could cross into Afghanistan and vice versa."

He said he thinks bin Laden's protection force "had a series of outposts with radios that could alert each other" if helicopters were coming or other troop movements were evident.

Pakistani military officials in Wana, the capital of South Waziristan, described bin Laden as having three rings of security, each ring unaware of the movements and identities of the other. Sometimes they communicated with specially marked flashlights. Sometimes they dressed as women to avoid detection by U.S. spy planes.

Pakistan will permit only small numbers of U.S. forces to operate with its troops at times and, because their role is so sensitive politically, it officially denies any U.S. presence. A frequent complaint from U.S. troops is that they have too little to do. The same complaint is also heard from U.S. forces in Afghanistan, where there were few targets to go after.

Although the hunt for bin Laden has depended to a large extent on technology, until recently unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) were in short supply, especially when the war in Iraq became a priority in 2003.

In July 2003, Vines said that U.S. forces under his command thought they were close to striking bin Laden, but had only one drone to send over three possible routes he might take. "A UAV was positioned on the route that was most likely, but he didn't go that way," Vines said. "We believed that we were within a half-hour of possibly getting him, but nothing materialized."

Faced with the most sophisticated technology in the world, bin Laden has gone decidedly low-tech. His 23 video or audiotapes in the last five years are thought to have been hand-carried to news outlets or nearby mail drops by a series of couriers who know nothing about the contents of their deliveries or the real identity of the sender, a simple method used by spies and drug traffickers for centuries.

"They are really good at operational security," said Ben Venzke, chief executive officer of IntelCenter, a private company that analyzes terrorist information and has obtained, analyzed and published all bin Laden's communiques. "They are very good at having enough cut-outs" to move videos into circulation without detection. "It's some of the simplest things to do."

Uncertain Command Structure

Bureaucratic battles slowed down the hunt for bin Laden for the first two or three years, according to officials in several agencies, with both the Pentagon and the CIA accusing each other of withholding information. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's sense of territoriality has become legendary, according to these officials.

In early November 2002, for example, a CIA drone armed with a Hellfire missile killed a top al-Qaeda leader traveling through the Yemeni desert. About a week later, Rumsfeld expressed anger that it was the CIA, not the Defense Department, that had carried out the successful strike.

"How did they get the intel?" he demanded of the intelligence and other military personnel in a high-level meeting, recalled one person knowledgeable about the meeting.

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, then director of the National Security Agency and technically part of the Defense Department, said he had given it to them.

"Why aren't you giving it to us?" Rumsfeld wanted to know.

Hayden, according to this source, told Rumsfeld that the information-sharing mechanism with the CIA was working well. Rumsfeld said it would have to stop.

A CIA spokesman said Hayden, now the CIA director, does not recall this conversation. Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said, "The notion that the department would do anything that would jeopardize the success of an operation to kill or capture bin Laden is ridiculous." The NSA continues to share intelligence with the CIA and the Defense Department.

At that time, Rumsfeld was putting in place his own aggressive plan, led by the U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM), to dominate the hunt for bin Laden and other terrorists. The overall special operations budget has grown by 60 percent since 2003 to $8 billion in fiscal year 2007.

Rows and rows of temporary buildings sprang up on SOCOM's parking lots in Tampa as Rumsfeld refocused the mission of a small group of counterterrorism experts from long-term planning for the war on terrorism to manhunting. The group "went from 20 years to 24-hour crisis-mode operations," one former special operations officer said. "It went from planning to manhunting."

In 2004, Rumsfeld finally won the president's approval to put SOCOM in charge of the "Global War on Terrorism."

Today, however, no one person is in charge of the overall hunt for bin Laden with the authority to direct covert CIA operations to collect intelligence and to dispatch JSOC units. Some counterterrorism officials find this absurd. "There's nobody in the United States government whose job it is to find Osama bin Laden!" one frustrated counterterrorism official shouted. "Nobody!"

"We work by consensus," explained Brig. Gen. Robert L. Caslen Jr., who recently stepped down as deputy director of counterterrorism under the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "In order to find Osama bin Laden, certain departments will come together. . . . It's not that effective, or we'd find the guy, but in terms of advancing United States power for that mission, I think that process is effective."

But Lt. Gen. Stanley A. McChrystal, the JSOC commander since 2003, has become the de facto leader of the hunt for bin Laden and developed a good working relationship with the CIA to the extent that he recently was able to persuade the former station chief in Kabul to become his special assistant. He asks for targets from the CIA, and it tries to comply. "We serve the military," one intelligence officer said.

McChrystal's troops have shuttled between Afghanistan and Iraq, where they succeeded in killing al-Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and killed or captured dozens of his followers.

Under McChrystal, JSOC has improved its ability to quickly turn captured documents, computers and cellphones into leads and then to act upon them, while waiting for more analysis from CIA or SOCOM.

Industry experts and military officers say they are being aided by computer forensic field kits that let technicians retrieve information from surviving hard drives, cellphones and other electronic devices, as was the case in the Zarqawi strike.

McChrystal, who has commanded JSOC since 2003, now has the authority to go after bin Laden inside Pakistan without having to seek permission first, two U.S. officials said.

"The authority," one knowledgeable person said, "follows the target," meaning that if the target is bin Laden, the stakes are high enough for McChrystal to decide any action on his own. The understanding is that U.S. units will not enter Pakistan, except under extreme circumstances, and that Pakistan will deny giving them permission.

Such was the case in early January, when JSOC troops clandestinely entered the village of Saidgai, two officials familiar with the operation said, and Pakistan protested.

A week later, acting on what Pakistani intelligence officials said was information developed out of Libbi's interrogation, the CIA ordered a missile strike against a house in the village of Damadola, about 120 miles northwest of Islamabad, where Pakistani and American officials thought Zawahiri to be hiding.

The missile killed 13 civilians and several suspected terrorists. But Zawahiri was not among them. The strike "could have changed the destiny of the war on terror. Zawahiri was 100 percent sure to visit Damadola . . . but he disappeared at the last moment," one Pakistani intelligence official said.

Tens of thousands of Pakistanis staged an angry anti-American protest near Damadola, shouting, "Death to America!"

"Once again, we have lost track of Ayman al-Zawahiri," the Pakistani intelligence official said in a recent interview. "He keeps popping on television screens. It's miserable, but we don't know where he or his boss are hiding."

Al Qaeda Finds Its Center Of Gravity (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

OVER the last year, as Iran, Iraq and Lebanon have dominated headlines, hopes of gaining firmer control of a largely forgotten corner of the war on terrorism — the lawless Pakistan-Afghanistan border region — have quietly evaporated.

On Tuesday, the Pakistani government signed a “truce” with militants who have resisted Pakistani military efforts to gain control of the region, which is roughly the size of Delaware. The agreement, which lets militants remain in the area as long as they promised to halt attacks, immediately set off concern among American analysts.

Al Qaeda’s surviving leadership is suspected of using the border areas as a base of operation to support international terrorist attacks, including possibly the July 2005 London subway bombings. Meanwhile, the Taliban leadership is widely believed to be using another border area to direct spiraling attacks in Afghanistan.

“There’s a link with broader international terrorism,” said Robert Grenier, the former top counterterrorism official for the Central Intelligence Agency. “There’s a link with what is happening in Afghanistan. Al Qaeda, such as it is now, really has its center of gravity in the area.”

Last week’s truce agreement covers North Waziristan, an area on the Pakistani side of the border. After the Taliban fell in 2001, senior Qaeda and Taliban leaders are believed to have fled there from Afghanistan and to other remote border areas in Pakistan.

The locations of Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri remain unknown. But American officials suspect that they are somewhere along the border.

After two attempts to assassinate President Pervez Musharraf in December 2003 were linked to the tribal areas, Pakistani officials expanded the military effort to subdue the region. But after suffering heavy casualties in 2004 and early 2005, they began negotiating with local militants. Last year, Pakistan signed a separate agreement with militants in South Waziristan, but the move failed to slow the killing of government supporters.

“If you look at the number of deaths in the region, it’s not clear that they’ve dropped,” said Xenia Dormandy, former director for South Asia for the National Security Council. Signing such truces, she said, “is a potentially dangerous route to take because there is little pressure that you can bring to bear to make sure they can follow through on the agreements.”

Two hundred miles to the south, the Taliban leadership is believed to have established a base of operations in and around the Pakistani city of Quetta, according to American analysts. Afghan officials say the Taliban used the area to plan and carry out sweeping attacks in southern Afghanistan in the spring.

Pakistan has largely turned a blind eye to Taliban activities, American officials say, because it sees the group as a tool to counter growing Indian influence in Afghanistan. The Pakistanis have longed viewed a friendly Afghanistan as critical to their survival and fears India may be trying to encircle their country.

At the same time, a separate uprising in Baluchistan province has tied up Pakistani soldiers. Ethnic Baluch tribesmen complain that Pakistan’s military government is not sharing enough of the profits from natural gas exploration with the locals. The killing last month of a charismatic tribal elder who was a rebel leader set off riots in several cities.

"Pakistan is essentially trying to put down a civil war in Baluchistan," said Ms. Dormandy, now an analyst at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. "At the same time, it's trying to monitor its border with India, monitor the border of Afghanistan and bring down the Taliban and Al Qaeda."

In Afghanistan, NATO forces that took control of security in the south from American forces this summer have been surprised by the size and strength of the Taliban insurgency. Roadside bomb attacks have doubled this year, and suicide bombings have tripled. Yesterday, a suicide bombing in Kabul killed at least 2 American soldiers and 14 Afghan civilians.

All told this year, heavy clashes in eastern and southern Afghanistan have killed more than 100 American and NATO soldiers, roughly twice the number killed in the same period in 2005. Since Aug. 1 alone, 28 NATO soldiers have been killed.

Analysts say the problem in the border region is an explosive mix of conditions: a lack of government authority, a vast amount of weaponry and the rise of Islamic militancy. Until the 1980's, the area was ruled by local tribes, whose brute self-government kept the population isolated and impoverished but allowed for a degree of stability.

In the 1980's, the American-backed anti-Soviet jihad unfolded in the region and began to wear away longstanding tribal structures. Huge piles of weapons and cash empowered Islamist organizations to open dozens of training camps, hard-line mosques and conservative religious schools along the border. In the 1990's, the Taliban emerged there.

Today, said Mr. Grenier, the former C.I.A. official, the only way to increase government authority in the rural areas on both sides of the Pakistan-Afghanistan border was to develop the impoverished rural areas over time. "But that's a generational process," said Mr. Grenier, now a managing director at Kroll Inc., a security firm based in New York.

This summer, local people interviewed in southern Afghanistan said they were unsure that the United States and NATO would remain committed to the long, expensive process of stabilizing the border region. This year, the United States cut its aid to Afghanistan by 30 percent.

Al Qaeda and the Taliban are no doubt betting that time is on their side.

The Taliban, Regrouped And Rearmed (WP)

By Peter Bergen

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan

The interpreter's hand-held radio crackled with the sound of intercepted Taliban transmissions, and he signaled the infantry patrol to wait while he translated. At 7 a.m. one morning late in the summer, peasants were already out scything wheat, with their children tending fields of pink and white poppies that would soon add to Afghanistan's record-setting opium and heroin supplies. We were 9,000 feet up, in the hamlet of Larzab, in a remote part of Zabul province -- the heart of Talibanland.

Our interpreter, Mohammed, estimated that the Taliban fighters were less than half a mile away. We walked through the fields for 20 more minutes before stopping next to a small hill. The chatter revealed that the Taliban were "watching us and waiting for us to get closer," Maj. Ralph Paredes explained to me as his men radioed to their base the likely coordinates of the hidden fighters. Soldiers back at the base -- a mud-walled compound without electricity or water -- fired mortar rounds over our heads to a hill several hundred meters from our position, where the Taliban might be hiding. We never learned whether they found their target.

Just one more patrol, and one more skirmish, in Afghanistan's war -- a conflict in which the fighting and ferocity are regaining strength with each passing month. Indeed, the U.S. military and NATO are now battling the Taliban on a scale not witnessed since 2001, when the war here began, and are increasingly fighting them in remote areas such as Larzab where the Taliban once roamed freely.

When I traveled in Afghanistan in 2002 and 2003, the Taliban threat had receded into little more than a nuisance. But now the movement has regrouped and rearmed. Bolstered by a compliant Pakistani government, hefty cash inflow from the drug trade and a population disillusioned by battered infrastructure and lackluster reconstruction efforts, the Taliban is back -- as is Afghanistan's once forgotten war.

In the past three months alone, coalition forces have killed more than 1,000 Taliban fighters, according to Col. Tom Collins, a U.S. military spokesman, while the religious militia has killed dozens of coalition troops and hundreds of Afghan civilians, spreading a climate of fear throughout the country. And suicide attacks in Afghanistan have risen from single digits two years ago to more than 40 already this year. Most of the victims are civilians -- including more than a dozen bystanders who were killed here Friday when a bomb-laden car struck a convoy of armored U.S. vehicles just 200 yards from the U.S. Embassy; the attack also killed two U.S. soldiers and wounded a third. Half an hour after the blast, I watched as firefighters hosed down the streets, which were littered with shards of blackened metal and singed body parts.

I recently traveled to Afghanistan for three weeks, meeting with government officials, embedding with U.S. soldiers from the 2-4 Infantry and interviewing senior American military officers. I found that while the Taliban may not constitute a major strategic threat to President Hamid Karzai's government, they have become a serious tactical challenge for U.S. and NATO troops, as the war here intensifies. And their threat is only amplified by their ubiquity and invisibility.

"In this place, they are everywhere," explained Mohammed, our interpreter. "They are sitting here as a farmer. Then they are Taliban."

When I visited Zabul province in July, Lt. Col. Frank Sturek was in charge of U.S. military operations there. Sturek, from Aberdeen, Md., earned his insurgent-fighting stripes in Mosul, Iraq, under the tutelage of Lt. Gen. David Petraeus. When I spoke to Sturek, he had recently lost two of his men in firefights with the Taliban. In a nighttime interview conducted by flashlight in the mud compound, Sturek described a two-hour struggle on July 19 against about 120 Taliban who were armed with mortars, recoil-less rifles, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades. Judging from newly dug graves, Sturek estimated 35 to 40 Taliban had been killed.

Despite their numerous casualties, the Taliban are much more willing than Iraqi insurgents to engage in pitched battles, Sturek said. "These guys will mix it up," he said, "and they use a lot more direct fire." In the five months he had been in Afghanistan, he noted, none of the Taliban fighters his men had fought had ever surrendered.

Echoing all other U.S. officers I interviewed in Afghanistan, Sturek emphasized that the Taliban threat required a political solution, not a military one, and that expanding the U.S. presence and reconstruction efforts into remote areas would win the long-term conflict. "You can win every firefight you want, but the battle is in these villages," he said. "This is where you change the minds of the people -- or at least create a doubt that the Taliban are not preaching the right message."

A political solution is also the mantra of the U.S. commanding officer in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, an intense, intellectual soldier who speaks Mandarin and is on his second tour in the country. Over coffee in his Kabul office, he said that the situation in Afghanistan still looks reasonably optimistic. "I tell everyone don't look at the snapshot," he said. "Look at the movie called Afghanistan."

For Eikenberry, that movie features the democratically elected president and parliament, as well as millions of boys and girls who are newly in school. Indeed, in the most recent poll of Afghan public opinion, released by ABC News in December 2005, 77 percent of Afghans said their country is headed in the right direction.

Of course, a similar poll today might find fewer Afghans with this point of view, given rising dissatisfaction with the Karzai government and growing anti-American sentiment revealed in riots that shook Kabul in May. Eikenberry acknowledges that "the strength and coherence of the Taliban movement is greater than it was a year ago," citing tribal and land disputes and trafficking in narcotics as reasons for the resurgence. He also draws a clear link between reconstruction and violence: "Wherever the roads end, that's where the Taliban starts."

An amnesty program formally begun in 2005 by the Karzai government offers one promising approach to containing the Taliban threat. In Qalat, the provincial capital of Zabul, I witnessed U.S. forces release Mullah Abdul Ali Akundzada, who was accused of sheltering Taliban members and had been arrested near the site where a makeshift bomb had detonated. In a deal brokered by the Karzai government and the U.S. military, Akundzada was handed over to a group of about 30 religious and tribal leaders, who publicly pledged that the released mullah would support the government. In an honor-based society such as Afghanistan, this program is working well. According to Afghan and U.S. officials, only a handful of the more than 1,000 Taliban fighters taking advantage of the amnesty have gone back to fighting the government and coalition forces.

Yet even as the amnesty program shows promise, Afghanistan's ballooning drug trade has succeeded in expanding the Taliban ranks. It is no coincidence that opium and heroin production, which now makes up about half of the Afghan economy, spiked at the same time that the Taliban staged a comeback. A U.S. military official told me that charities and individual donations from the Middle East are also boosting the Taliban's coffers. These twin revenue streams -- drug money and contributions -- allow the Taliban to pay their fighters as much as $100 a month, which compares favorably to the $70 salary of an Afghan police officer. Whatever the source, the Taliban can draw upon significant resources, at least by Afghan standards. One U.S. military raid on a Taliban safe house this year recovered $900,000 in cash.

The Taliban's growing presence in central Afghanistan's Ghazni province -- outside the group's traditional strongholds in the south and east -- is another benchmark of its strength. Nearly half the districts in Ghazni are now under significant Taliban influence, a U.S. military official said. The Taliban units operating there aim to control access to Kabul 100 miles to the north, just one more sign that Taliban forces increasingly move across the country with ease.

But the key to the resurgent Taliban can be summarized in one word: Pakistan. The Pakistani government has proved unwilling or incapable (or both) of clamping down on the religious militia, even though the headquarters of the Taliban and its key allies are in Pakistan. According to a U.S. military official, not one senior Taliban leader has been arrested or killed in Pakistan since 2001 -- nor have any of the top leaders of the militias headed by Gulbuddin Hekmatyar and Jalaluddin Haqqani, who are fighting U.S. forces alongside the Taliban.

Amir Haqqani, the leader of the Taliban in Zabul province, "never comes across the border" from Pakistan into Afghanistan, Sturek told me. The Taliban's most important leadership council, the Quetta Shura, is based in the capital of Pakistan's Baluchistan province; the Peshawar Shura is headquartered in Pakistan's North-West Frontier Province. In addition, Hekmatyar operates in the tribal areas of Dir and Bajur; Haqqani is based in Waziristan; and al-Qaeda has a presence in Waziristan and Chitral -- all Pakistani regions that border Afghanistan.

Finally, the peace deal announced this month between the Pakistani government and pro-Taliban militants along the Afghan border raises more concerns that such groups will operate more freely on and across the border. A U.S. military official in Afghanistan told me he is "extremely worried" about the pact, through which Pakistan agrees to withdraw army units from the region and will turn over checkpoints to local tribes that are effectively Taliban. And with military force against the Taliban highly unpopular among residents in the border region, the upcoming Pakistani presidential election in 2007 means that even less action will be taken in the months ahead.

Mullah Dadullah, a key Taliban commander, gave two interviews to al-Jazeera in the past year in which he made several illuminating observations about the scale and nature of the insurgency. Dadullah put Taliban forces at about 12,000 fighters -- considerably greater than a U.S. military source's estimate of 7,000 to 10,000, but a number that could have some validity given the numerous part-time Taliban farmer/fighters. Dadullah also stressed the Taliban's "close links" to al-Qaeda. "Our cooperation is ideal," he said, adding that Osama bin Laden is issuing orders to the Taliban. Indeed, a senior U.S. military intelligence official told me that "trying to separate Taliban and al-Qaeda in Pakistan serves no purpose. It's like picking gray hairs out of your head."

Dadullah also noted that "we have 'give and take' with the mujaheddin in Iraq." Considering the rising number of suicide attacks in Afghanistan and the increased use of makeshift bombs, Taliban forces appear to have learned from the Iraqi insurgents. A videotape posted on the Internet by al-Qaeda in May shows how critical Iraqi techniques have become to the Afghan insurgency: The tape shows an Arab suicide bomber in Afghanistan prepping a car bomb, and driving it into an American convoy.

Just as suicide bombings in Iraq had an enormous strategic impact -- from pushing the United Nations out of the country to helping spark a civil war -- such attacks may also plunge Afghanistan into chaos. Already, suicide attacks have made much of southern Afghanistan a no-go area for foreigners and for any reconstruction efforts. According to Hekmat Karzai, head of an independent terrorism research center in Kabul, these attacks "have really instilled fear in the heart of the population." Luckily, for the moment, the suicide attackers in Afghanistan have not been nearly as deadly as those in Iraq. As one U.S. military official explained to me, almost all of the Taliban's suicide bombers are "Pashtun country guys from Pakistan," with little effective training.

The Afghan population remains generally pro-American, and its appetite for more conflict is low after more than two decades of war. However, the risks of a slide into Iraq-style chaos remain. Averting it would require Washington to end the Afghan drug trade and compel Pakistan to crack down on the Taliban warriors' havens. These are both tall orders, but Washington could gain real leverage in the area of reconstruction. So far, it has appropriated only $9 billion for Afghan reconstruction, as compared with $34 billion for Iraq, even though Afghanistan is larger, more populous and has greater infrastructure needs. And of the appropriated amount, only $2.5 billion, a State Department official told me, has been spent.

In the absence of greater U.S. investments in roads, power and water resources, the Taliban will surely prosper and continue to gain adherents. Unless they take decisive action now, U.S. policymakers may be looking back in a few years, asking themselves why they lost Afghanistan despite the promise the country showed after the fall of the Taliban regime.

Jonathan Chait: A Fighting Image Is Everything (LAT)

Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Bush helping Republicans by highlighting the war on terror is like Clinton running on his record of marriage fidelity.

FIVE YEARS AGO, President Bush stood on the pile of rubble that had been the World Trade Center and announced, "The people who knocked these buildings down will hear all of us soon!" Remember that? Well, the people who knocked down those buildings just won.

Last week, in a news story that was buried by all the major newspapers, Pakistan signed an agreement to "allow militants to operate freely in one of Pakistan's most restive border areas in return for a pledge to halt attacks and infiltration into Afghanistan." Which is to say, Pakistan surrendered. The border areas of Pakistan are where thousands of Al Qaeda militants and (almost certainly) Osama bin Laden himself reside. On Thursday, Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf made a not very reassuring statement that he'd go after the insurgents' command structure.

It's worth briefly refreshing our memories as to why Bin Laden and his closest friends are hiding out in Pakistan. In 2002, we had them surrounded near Tora Bora in Afghanistan, but Gen. Tommy Franks, the former head of U.S. Central Command, persuaded our commander-in-chief to rely on poorly equipped, ill-trained Afghan mercenaries of dubious loyalty, rather than U.S. soldiers, to finish the job. (Apparently the operating theory was, if you can't trust mercenaries, who can you trust?) Shockingly, as Peter Bergen reported in 2004 in the Atlantic Monthly, Bin Laden paid off the mercenaries, who let him escape to Pakistan. And now the Pakistanis, who were at least nominally trying to hunt him down, have thrown in the towel.

In related news, the Bush administration has decided to stake the 2006 elections on Bush's record of fighting terrorism. It sounds like a joke, but it isn't. He let our worst enemies escape; he is on the verge of creating a terrorist haven in Iraq where none existed before; and this is the issue he picks to highlight. Why not run on his record of evacuating New Orleans? Maybe Bill Clinton can run on his record of chastity!

Of course, Bush doesn't really want to be judged on his record of fighting terrorism as much as his image. Republicans want you to think about him on that rubble pile and of his vow to bring Bin Laden to justice "dead or alive," rather than whether Bin Laden actually has been brought to justice.

Bush's defenders insist that his paramount contribution to the war against Islamic radicalism is "moral clarity." Moral clarity means keeping in mind that even if we're not perfect, we're the good guys and they're the bad guys. The president's defenders are correct that having moral clarity is a necessary condition for fighting evil. What they fail to realize is that it's not a sufficient condition.

There are millions of teenage boys who have moral clarity but who are nonetheless unqualified to lead the free world against jihadists. If your leader has moral clarity but lacks the other relevant intellectual qualities, you end up with a president whose foreign policy doctrine is expressed in statements such as: "I intend to kick [Saddam Hussein's] sorry … ass all over the Mideast." (This Bush quote comes from Michael Isikoff and David Corn's new book, "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War.")

It's precisely because the image of Bush as brave leader in the war on terror is so lacking in substance that his admirers have been forced to manufacture it assiduously.

In 2003, Showtime aired a movie called "DC 9/11: Time of Crisis," written by a conservative Bush admirer and featuring an implausibly heroic Bush ordering around Dick Cheney and daring the terrorists to come get him. (In fact, the president was ushered around Air Force bases on 9/11 to protect him from further attack.)

Tonight and Monday night, ABC-TV is airing a similarly propagandistic drama called "The Path to 9/11," written, apparently, by a friend of Rush Limbaugh and gleefully circulated among right-wing bloggers. The thrust of the show is that any failures against Al Qaeda are primarily the fault of the Clinton administration — which, of course, is in keeping with the conservative mythology that the U.S. was soft on terrorism until we got a clear-eyed commander-in-chief in Bush.

ABC is portraying the movie as based on the report of the 9/11 commission, but two former counter-terrorism officials who served under Clinton and Bush, one 9/11 commission member and many others have called some of the key scenes fake. ABC says it's not a documentary but a "dramatization."

It's fitting that the most powerful propaganda reflecting Bush's view of his own indispensability are, literally, works of fiction.

The President's Plan (NYT)

By Frances Fragos Townsend

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

AS a result of the horror of Sept. 11, 2001, President Bush has transformed the way we fight terrorism and the tools we use. We successfully attack those very things our enemies need to operate and survive: leadership, communications, the ability to travel, weapons; foot soldiers and financing. The president has strengthened and transformed the intelligence community, integrated our military and intelligence assets, and broken down the barriers that kept domestic law enforcement and intelligence agencies from sharing information.

The United States has enhanced relationships with allies around the world, recognizing that this is truly a global war on terrorism. Working together, we have denied Al Qaeda the safe havens and resources it needs to plan and carry out attacks and made it more difficult for our enemies to travel. We use their communications against them and have cut off their money.

At home, the president has transformed the fight by creating the Department of Homeland Security and by ensuring that the F.B.I. had the necessary tools, like the Patriot Act, to get the job done. The airline bombing plot disrupted by our British allies this summer is only the most recent case of brutal terrorists continuing to plan mass murder. We must be right 100 percent of the time; the terrorists have to succeed only once. On Sept. 11, 2001, each of us became soldiers in this fight to protect freedom.

We're in a war we didn't ask for, but it's a war we must wage and a war we will win. — FRANCES FRAGOS TOWNSEND, White House homeland security adviser.

Less Political Correctness (NYT)

By Rafi Ron

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

THE reason we have not been attacked on American soil is that the war started by radical Muslims is not against the United States, but against everyone who does not conform to their beliefs and way of life. It is the first global war we have experienced since globalization became a factor in our life, and the terrorist battlefield has included Madrid, London, Bali, Moscow, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and India. The terrorists have had a very busy five years.

The struggle imposed on us is, by nature, a long-term struggle. Only an effective homeland security system will provide us with the necessary political power to prevail in those instances where the terrorists do find value in attacking within the United States. In that sense, we must be less politically correct, and begin a program that looks for risks where they are most likely to be found. For example, it is crucial to identify high-risk airline passengers through all criteria — including appearance and behavior — and spend more resources on them, rather than maintaining an across-the-board, politically correct low level of search. — RAFI RON, a security consultant and the former head of security at Ben-Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv.

How War Can Bring Peace (NYT)

By Jack L. Goldsmith And Adrian Vermeule

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

OFFENSIVE action abroad has protected the homeland. Our military presence in Afghanistan and our aggressive policies around the globe have seriously disrupted the enemy. Through a mix of military and paramilitary action, pre-emptive strikes, deterrent threats and surveillance we have captured many terrorist leaders, destroyed training camps and structures of communication and control, and uncovered valuable intelligence troves.

Some maintain that such offensive action feeds resentment and spawns more terrorism. But if aggression can create resentment, passivity and defensiveness can inspire contempt. Our weak responses to Qaeda attacks on the Khobar Towers, the African embassies and the destroyer Cole, and our withdrawal from Somalia, emboldened the enemy and allowed it to organize and train for the 9/11 attacks.

Going forward, we should more vigorously embrace technology as a tool for taking the fight to the Islamic terrorists. The same technological changes that help terrorists plot to deliver weapons of mass destruction, including low-cost information and communication over the Internet, also make it easier for the government to monitor and pre-empt terrorist plots. Libertarians overreact to the new technology, stoking fears of an Orwellian surveillance state. But properly designed programs can produce large gains in security in return for small losses of privacy and liberty. — JACK L. GOLDSMITH and ADRIAN VERMEULE, Harvard law professors and, respectively, an assistant attorney general from 2003 to 2004 and a co-author of the forthcoming "Terror in the Balance."

Don't Forget Our Values (NYT)

By Joschka Fischer

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

THE 9/11 attacks were a defining moment for the course of world politics and a strategic assault against the world's leading power at the beginning of the 21st century. But the question is, were the terrorists successful? The answer is mixed. In the aftermath of 9/11, the world was united with America. Even in Arab and Muslim countries, the sense of shock and feelings of solidarity with America far outweighed any sympathies with the terrorists.

Since then, international counterterrorism cooperation has disrupted the terrorists' activities. Yet even public awareness of the threat, counterterrorism cooperation, and more stringent anti-terrorism laws in democratic societies around the globe couldn't prevent the bombings in Madrid, London and Istanbul.

Immediately after 9/11, Al Qaeda seemed to be losing its battle with America and the West. Unfortunately, that changed when America invaded Iraq. The fight against the jihadists will not be decided simply on the battlefield; it will also be decided in the sphere of international legitimacy. We know that Islamic extremists celebrate death through martyrdom, and the killing of innocents. But what are we in the West fighting for?

We fight for our values: for our freedom, for democracy, for the rule of law, the equality of all human beings and for peace. In this context, Guantánamo Bay, Abu Ghraib and the situation in Iraq could hardly be called successes. Against the new totalitarian challenge of Islamic extremism, we have to defend our values; and this means sticking to the values of our democratic societies, even under fire. — JOSCHKA FISCHER, the foreign minister of Germany from 1998 to 2005 and a visiting professor at Princeton's Woodrow Wilson School.

Keep American Muslims On Our Side (NYT)

By Jessica Stern

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

SINCE 9/11, terrorism has increased significantly around the globe, but the United States has been spared. Eurasia rather than America has been the main source and victim. Why?

Increased awareness and surveillance have made a strike as sophisticated as the 9/11 attacks far more difficult to achieve, especially without local support. Unlike their counterparts in Britain, for example, few of America's Muslims at least for now subscribe to the notion that Western governments or their proxies are deliberately hurting and humiliating Muslims and that the way to restore dignity is to join a jihad. Moreover, terrorist strategists like Ayman al-Zawahri have warned that while smaller strikes serve as training opportunities for their fighters, major strikes can backfire; attacking the wrong people at the wrong time would reduce the popularity of their movement.

The jihadists understand that they are fighting a war of ideas. According to "The Management of Savagery," a Qaeda manual, the success of the movement will ultimately depend on the jihadists' ability to damage America's prestige throughout the globe, sow discord between America and its allies and expose the hollowness of American values. The manual prescribes a strategy of forcing America "to abandon its war against Islam by proxy" by provoking it into direct military confrontation with a Muslim country. When the United States attacked Iraq, it inadvertently "expanded the jihadi current" just as Osama bin Laden's strategists had hoped.

Every foreign-policy decision entails tradeoffs in regard to terrorism, especially with respect to the spread of the jihadist idea. Attacking the wrong people at the wrong time can backfire, just as Al Qaeda's strategists say. Let's not make that mistake again. — JESSICA STERN, a former National Security Council staff member and the author of "Terror in the Name of God."

Qaeda Set The Bar High (NYT)

By Clark Kent Ervin

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

S O why haven't we been attacked in five years? Terrorists — especially those directed by or affiliated with Al Qaeda — are committed to carrying out spectacular attacks that maximize death, injury, economic damage and political symbolism. If their aim were merely to blow up the odd bus or to level a supermarket, doing so would be a very short order. But, the more spectacular the scale of a plot, the longer it takes to plan, the costlier it is to finance, the more operatives you need to carry it out, and the greater the chance that something will go awry.

For the future, we must take a hard look at how to improve the Department of Homeland Security, which has earned its reputation as the most dysfunctional agency in all of government. It has played little role in keeping us safe since 9/11.

One need look no further than the recently foiled London jetliner plot. The department had nothing to do with uncovering the plot; that was primarily the work of British counterterrorism agencies. If not for their efforts, it would very likely have succeeded. This is because we still lack defenses against liquid explosives, although the Transportation Security Administration, part of the department, has been aware of this particular vulnerability for years and claims that its principal focus nowadays is on detecting explosives.

If after spending some $20 billion on securing the nation's airways since 9/11 we are still vulnerable in the skies, one shudders to think how much more vulnerable our seaports, land borders, mass transit systems, chemical plants and "soft targets" like shopping malls and sports arenas are to terrorist attack.

The good news, then, is that we are unlikely to see many future attempts to strike our homeland. The bad news is that the few we will see are likely to be giant in scale, and the likelihood that the Department of Homeland Security will be able to stop them is small. — CLARK KENT ERVIN, the inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security from 2003 to 2004 and author of "Open Target."

Giving Muslims Hope (NYT)

By Thomas H. Kean And Lee H. Hamilton

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

THE best news in our struggle against terrorism is that we have not been hit at home since the 9/11 attacks. Yet terrorists are patient. We remain a target and must expect another attack.

Our most important long-term recommendations involve foreign policy. First, preventing terrorists from gaining access to nuclear weapons, especially by stepping up efforts to secure loose nuclear materials abroad, must be our highest priority.

Second, the long-term challenge is for America to stop the radicalization of young Muslims from Jakarta to London by serving as a source of opportunity, not despair. Too many young Muslims are without jobs or hope, are angry with their governments, and don't like the war in Iraq or American foreign policy.

We should cultivate educational and cultural exchanges, and vigorous public diplomacy. We must offer moral leadership, treating all people — including detainees — with respect for the rule of law and human decency. And we must put forward an agenda of opportunity for the Islamic world. This includes support for pragmatic political reform, as well as education and economic empowerment. — THOMAS H. KEAN and LEE H. HAMILTON, the co-chairmen of the 9/11 commission and co-authors of "Without Precedent."

We Can't Kill An Ideology (NYT)

By Melissa Boyle Mahle

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

THOUGH it may not be immediately apparent to the casual viewer, Al Qaeda is attacking when and where it chooses. It is an ideology-driven global insurgency on the march. It has not hit America because it has chosen not to. Whether it lacks on-the-ground capacity for a spectacular attack, is still in the planning stages or is busy elsewhere is under debate within our intelligence community. The point is that five years out, Al Qaeda is as dangerous as, if not more than, it was on 9/11.

Yes, our intelligence agencies have struck the terrorist group hard, detaining or killing many of its founding leaders. But these are not death blows — because you cannot decapitate an ideology. Although the majority of Muslims reject the political vision of a Taliban-style Islamic caliphate, many agree with Al Qaeda that the Western-imposed political order is the source of their political and economic woes. Moreover, militant resistance to the current order is gaining acceptance and prestige, aptly demonstrated by the groundswell of popular support for Hamas and Hezbollah in the Muslim world.

During the last five years, our priority has been to beef up defenses and take the war to the terrorists. It's time to start discrediting Al Qaeda's ideology and offering Muslims nonviolent alternatives. The first step is to acknowledge that their grievances are legitimate and center on issues of dignity, economic disparity, border disputes and power alignment. The second is to acknowledge that our current approach is only helping Al Qaeda go mainstream. — MELISSA BOYLE MAHLE, a former C.I.A. operations officer and the author of "Denial and Deception: An Insider's View of the C.I.A. from Iran-Contra to 9/11."

Walking The Terror Beat (NYT)

By Michael A. Sheehan

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

THE most important counterterrorism activity since the fall of the Taliban has been the close cooperation of the C.I.A. with foreign intelligence services.

Powerful American technologies identify names, locations, phone numbers and computer addresses of suspicious people. Local intelligence services operate informant networks. The C.I.A. station chief works with intelligence officials to follow up and coordinate hundreds of leads generated by these joint collection efforts. The connections often cross national boundaries, and periodically they "connect the dots," identify a key terrorist and have the local services execute a nighttime raid against a terrorist safe house.

Such coordinated efforts have led to the captures of key Qaeda operatives including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the 9/11 mastermind; Hambali, the planner of the Bali bombings; and Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri, who oversaw the attack on the Navy destroyer Cole. With midlevel leaders like these out of commission, terrorist operations have been left to less capable local operatives. As a result, the Qaeda movement has been limited to only two successful operations in the West in the past five years, in Madrid and London.

To prevent the next attack in the United States we need a similar coordinated intelligence effort at home. In New York City, the F.B.I. and Police Department share this responsibility. And although they do not always love each other, they find ways to work together. The Police Department brings grit, creativity and street smarts to the investigative programs. The F.B.I. connects local efforts with information from national and international intelligence databases. Other cities should emulate their example. — MICHAEL A. SHEEHAN, former deputy commissioner for counterterrorism for the New York City Police Department.

Professionals from nine different jobs examine 9/11's reach into their lives

The police chief

By William J. Bratton

SEPT. 11, 2001, primary election day in New York City, began as a picture-perfect day. Early that morning, I'd done a call-in interview with radio show host Don Imus, commenting on the mayoral primary and speculation that, after the election, I might return as New York City police commissioner.

Later, my wife, Rikki, and I walked down Park Avenue to vote. After casting our ballots, we headed back to our apartment. As I walked in, I saw on the TV I'd accidentally left on the now-familiar images of one of the twin towers burning. Rushing to my office, I learned that the second tower had been hit. Later, I noticed a fax from a client at the World Trade Center. He had sent it two minutes before the first plane hit. I did not learn of his survival until several days later. Unfortunately, many other friends and colleagues did not survive.

That day left me feeling helpless and propelled me back into public life. I had gone to work as a consultant, but I simply could no longer stand to be on the sidelines. I needed to get back into policing, the profession I loved and where I knew I could make a difference. And that's why I am in Los Angeles.

Upon my appointment as police chief here four years ago, I created the LAPD's counter-terrorism bureau. L.A. remains a primary target. On 9/11, I was working in the private sector — on the outside looking in. I could grieve, but I couldn't make a difference. Now maybe I can help to prevent another 9/11. I never want to feel as helpless as I did on that day.

William J. Bratton is the police chief of Los Angeles.

The Muslim leader

By Maher Hathout

THE EVENING OF SEPT. 10, 2001, I was preparing for a scheduled meeting with the president of the United States the following morning. Because our group would be the first Muslim Americans to meet with George W. Bush, I wanted my discussion points to be concise and clear, suitable for the rarity of the opportunity at hand.

After a restless night, I went to the hotel lobby in desperate search of a proper dose of caffeine. There, on many television screens, I saw the painful images of the terrorist attacks in New York that I will never forget. Needless to say, I didn't meet the president.

9/11 confirmed my decision to retire as a cardiologist. From that day on, I have worked to clear the name of my religion, done what I could to fight terrorism, lobbied to safeguard Muslim Americans' civil liberties and tried to convince law enforcement that Muslim Americans are an essential part of the solution, not part of the problem.

I have also found myself arguing the case for a Muslim theology of inclusion and life against the false one of exclusion and death. Now more than ever, I'm certain that a huge dose of spirituality must be injected in our lives to make them bearable.

The travel agent

By Alice Gokkes

CLIENTS ARE so much more watchful than they were before the 9/11 attacks, and news of a new terrorist attack or a foiled plot only makes them more apprehensive. They want to know what's going on in the places they're traveling to, which means I spend a lot of time researching current events at overseas destinations and contacting various experts to gauge the risk of traveling to them. Add to that client worries caused by heightened security at airports — fear of missed connections, delays, lost luggage. More than ever, I feel responsible for getting my clients safely to and back from their destinations.

The TV writer

By Joel Surnow

THE INSPIRATION for "24" was John Le Carre novels and such movies as "In the Line of Fire." It was happenstance that Jack Bauer's organization was called the Counter-terrorist Unit.

I was in the middle of writing and producing our first season of "24" on the day of 9/11. The show was to premiere two weeks later, and there was talk of shutting down altogether. The network was concerned that the nation's psyche was too raw to watch a show about terrorism. However, after editing out a few explicit shots from the pilot, we proceeded to air the series. In the last five years, I and my writing staff have experienced the war on terror through our show. We've dealt with radical Islam, a ramp-up to war, debates of constitutional law and a host of other issues. It's made all of us — and we span the political spectrum — acutely aware of the dangerous times we live in.

The historian

By Joanne Meyerowitz

FOR HISTORIANS of the United States, the events of 9/11 reminded us of the broader context of our work. We may focus on particular political movements, urban geographies, cultural trends, social groups or any number of specific topics, but ultimately we cannot understand the past — or the present — without some knowledge of the rest of the world and the contested place of American power and American culture within it.

In universities, the trend toward "transnational" history or toward the "internationalization" of American studies was well underway before Sept. 11, but the terrorist attacks accelerated it. My students now show greater interest in international affairs, and my own research attends more to the transnational circulation of ideas and to the effect of world events on American social thought. These changes may not be due entirely to Sept. 11, but they aren't divorced from it either.

Joanne Meyerowitz, professor of history and American studies at Yale University, is the editor of "History and September 11th."

The bookseller

By Kerry Slattery

SOON AFTER 9/11, we set aside space in the store exclusively devoted to books on the Middle East and current events because customers were hungry for information on these subjects. It was separate from our politics section. It has become the most important part of the store. Before 9/11, these books, mostly published by university presses, collected dust. After the attacks, these books, plus new works on the Middle East, were quickly snapped up. We sold the Koran, books on the Taliban and U.S. involvement in the Middle East, Noam Chomsky's book on 9/11. We thought this little section at the front of the store would be viable for only a few months, but it continues to hold some of our bestsellers.

The Architect

By Barbara A. Nadel

IN OUR litigious society, in which building owners and architects can be liable if their structures and designs do not take into account the possibility of catastrophic events, the standard of care after Sept. 11 has risen.

I generally advise clients and colleagues to consider several post-9/11 design strategies. For example, widening exit stairs in a new high-rise, and opening them to the outdoors rather than to a lobby, facilitates faster building evacuation and gives first responders better access. Laminated glass, which shatters in place, or blast windows, developed in Israel and widely used in high-risk facilities, offer greater safety because they prevent flying glass pieces from causing fatalities. Finally, to guard against the progressive collapse of a building as a result of a blast, more structural redundancy and robustness can be designed into the building. In basic terms, structural loads are more widely distributed so that a blast won't cause the building to immediately collapse, as was the case in Oklahoma City.

Architect Barbara A. Nadel is editor in chief of "Building Security: Handbook for Architectural Planning and Design."

The movie director

By Paul Greengrass

THE 9/11 COMMISSION'S report had a powerful effect on me. I knew after I read it that I wanted to do a film on that day. Last summer, as I was looking into doing a film on United Flight 93, the subway and bus bombings in London happened. That further motivated me to make the film.

In a sense, cinema flourishes when political arguments and divisions are deep and loud. Cinema is one of the ways we seek common ground. It's right and proper that filmmakers should join the 9/11 conversation.

The unique thing about the people on United Airlines Flight 93 is they knew what we on the ground didn't understand. We watched the aftermath of the terrorist attacks on television, aware that something terrible was unfolding but not really understanding what it was. Those passengers were the first people to inhabit our world today, the post-9/11 world. That's what gives their story such immense power.

Paul Greengrass directed "United 93."

THERE IS a good outcome to this tragic event. Enrollment in Arabic language classes, as well as in Islamic and Near Eastern history courses, has dramatically jumped at UCLA. In the last five years, Arabic and Islam courses have been added at other universities.

Before 9/11, I taught an introductory Islam course for a number of years. After the terrorist attacks, enrollment has grown to more than 120. It could even go higher if there was more funding for teacher assistants.

For Most Of Us, Life After 9/11 Still Very Much The Same (PPG)

By Steve Levin, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 10, 2006

Sept. 11 - Five Years Later

The pervading sense after Sept. 11, 2001 from politicians, media, clergy and psychologists was that life would never be the same.

The obvious changes -- increased airport security, secret wiretapping, tighter scrutiny of foreigners, world opinion of the United States, the higher cost of doing business -- have been absorbed fitfully by Americans, the price of living in an open society during a battle that has been called "American pop culture vs. the radical mosque."

But five years since the day that forever will be known simply as 9/11, life, in fact, remains very much the same.

Church attendance, volunteering, blood donations -- none changed appreciably in the past five years, despite the initial spike in numbers common following disasters. After a brief hiatus, partisan politics, government boondoggles, celebrity scandals and sports obsessions also returned.

A year after 9/11, a Gallup poll showed that three-quarters of Americans were living their lives as they did before the attacks. This summer, a third of Americans surveyed in a Scripps-Howard/Ohio University poll said they suspected federal officials assisted in the attacks or did nothing to stop them in order to facilitate a war in the Middle East.

And a month ago, a Washington Post poll showed that 30 percent of Americans couldn't name the year the attacks occurred.

Has anything changed? What is different five years later?

For such a shocking event, the changes have been surprisingly subtle: loss of well-being and personal security, a sense of bonding, suspicions of foreigners. Time fits neatly into pre-9/11 and post-9/11 compartments.

"We understand 9/11 as having been some kind of life-transforming event," said Daniel J. Santoro, an associate professor of political sociology at the University of Pittsburgh-Johnstown. "Even if people don't have a clear understanding of history before 9/11, they understand things are different now.

"We don't see the impact of it every day."

The bonding, he said, is characterized by "a general consensus" that the attacks were a tragic event for the country. But it is easily broken by politics.

"The question comes, what are we going to do about it?" Dr. Santoro asked. "When we get into the issue of policy, then we're going to get into positions and they're drawn along political lines."

Over time, it's natural for the force of that day to diminish. The process usually occurs in three stages, according to Dr. Garret Evans, a former University of Florida professor who now is a disaster consultant for businesses.

The first phase after a disaster is a heroic time, said Dr. Evans. For 9/11 that was exemplified by New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani's calm control of the city's chaos, and the United Flight 93 passengers who prevented their plane from striking its Washington, D.C. target.

Disillusionment follows; in this case, Dr. Evans said, it was bickering about the nation's intelligence failures, insurance problems and the recovery process. Communities wanted life to revert to the way it was before the disaster, something obviously not possible.

The final stage, he said, is resolution, and not everyone is equally happy about it.

"It's a reorientation to acceptance that we're not going to have our communities back the way it was," he said. "But we're not going to let it run our lives. There's hope that things can be good again."

What remains five years later is a bond among Americans, but its strength differs by geography, remaining strongest in the locations closest to the attacks, said Dr. Evans, who met with New York City fire department families in the aftermath and helped organize local counselors' work with city residents.

"It's easier in Sonoma, [Calif.] to have 9/11 clouded by all the events since then, the political overtones to what's happened since that time," he said.

Roy Licklider, a political science professor at Rutgers University, compares the bonding to Marine boot camp, where people from varied backgrounds are placed in a high-stress situation.

Similarly, he said, studies show that college students' lifelong friends are those most likely met within the first three weeks of school.

"Sometimes, it's not the experience of it but having been through the experience with these folks," he said.

One group whose bond has been strengthened by the experience of 9/11 is the National Guard. The guard always has had both a combat and a support role, but prior to 9/11 members were required to serve no more than six months overseas. Following 9/11, President Bush issued massive Guard call-ups, first for airport security and then for manpower in Afghanistan, followed soon after by Iraq. Now, overseas deployments can be for as long as 24 months for the roughly 435,000 members of the Army and Air National Guard during their six-year service compacts.

Subsequently, said Cindy Williams, principal research scientist for the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Security Studies Program, Guard members feel the government hasn't treated them honestly.

"For a lot of members who were already in the National Guard, they perceived a real breaking of the compact," she said. "Their understanding of the job was that they still would be a part-time force.

"They didn't think they would be called up routinely. For those people, it's really bad for them and it's really bad for their families."

The 9/11 attacks also precipitated changes across the country in universities' international student programs. Notification of the federal government, for example, is required within 10 days of foreign students changing their home addresses. Prior to the attacks, such information was forwarded to the federal government only when requested. Now, it's done as policy.

At the University of Pittsburgh, David B. Clubb, director of the Office of International Services, has charted all the regulatory and legislative changes since 9/11, each of which has required significant operational changes in his office.

Still, the number of international students at Pitt has remained virtually the same since 9/11, totaling 1,618 last year compared with 1,640 in 2000.

Mr. Clubb said the regulatory changes have not altered his office's primary focus of "being international educators."

"The bottom line is, international students are still part of the solution and not part of the problem," he said. "We're trying to bring people here to improve dialogue, so that we can send them back home as ambassadors for the U.S.

"They are a huge asset for us."

Are We Any Safer Today? (BOSH)

Boston Herald, September 10, 2006

Sources say U.S. targets vulnerable

While terrorists have not struck on American soil since Sept. 11, 2001, security officials have not done enough to protect vulnerable targets such as trains, subways and the borders in the past five years, security experts said yesterday.

“There’s no question we’re more secure than we were, but since 9/11 the threat has increased during that period of time as well,” said Neil C. Livingstone, CEO of the Washington, D.C.-based GlobalOptions Inc. “The Department of Homeland Security has to do more than it’s doing today to address the new threats.”

On Friday, DHS issued a fact sheet detailing 41 steps taken since the Sept. 11 attacks to improve national security. The list covers changes made to airport, seaport, railway and border security. It also details steps taken to improve local preparedness, increase information sharing between law enforcement and intelligence-gathering agencies and diminish threats posed by weapons of mass destruction and biological weapons.

Aviation security tops the DHS overview of security changes, a list that includes the introduction of hardened cockpit doors, additional air marshals and screenings for all passengers and checked baggage.

But security experts point out there’s still no missile defense system for passenger aircraft or mandated cargo screenings.

“They spent most of their money on the passengers and their carry-on luggage,” said Livingstone. “We still don’t do anything for the cargo hold. We still don’t do an adequate job of screening people at the airport in terms of people who have access to airplanes, like people who clean the aircraft are mostly immigrants.”

Another weak point is mass transit, where federal officials have spent $375 million so far on rail security and backed pilot programs to screen commuter rail passengers for explosive materials in a few states.

“Two of the biggest attacks since Sept. 11 have included subways in Madrid and London, and they’re not even trying on that,” said John Pike, director of the Virginia-based GlobalSecurity.org.

Border patrol staff has increased from 9,000 to more than 12,000 agents since the 2001 calamities, and DHS has ended the federal "catch-and-release" policy for people coming into the country from anywhere but Mexico, but the border is still far from secure, experts said.

"We have been a bit slow about doing anything about the southern border," said Fred Burton, counterterrorism vice president for the Texas-based Stratfor. "To try to secure that stretch of geography is really a daunting task."

Security experts agree it's less likely to see another "spectacular" attack, such as Sept. 11 or the USS Cole bombing in Yemen, but the country may face more enemies than it did five years ago.

"We are not safer. Because of the war in Iraq and other things that have happened, al-Qaeda has decentralized. It has gone from an orgranization to a movement," said Jim Walsh, an international security expert at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"We now have people in Britian who want to attack. There are attacks in Morroco. There are attacks in Spain. There wasn't this before 9/11. In the big picture, we're in worse shape."

FIVE YEARS LATER: Our Grief Turns To Strength, Hope (FREEP)

By David Crumm, Free Press Religion Writer

Detroit Free Press, September 10, 2006

The numbers 9/11 are shorthand for more than airplanes-turned-deadly-missiles five years ago. The impact of the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, roared around the globe, touched off wars and still is changing American life from Washington, D.C., to Michigan's smallest towns.

The legacy of 9/11 moved far beyond the tidal wave of fear and anger that swept across the United States and set in motion changes in everyday life that are as diverse as Americans themselves.

Across Michigan, those changes are as stunning as a huge memorial flag for a fallen soldier that young swimmers see before diving into the Grand Ledge High School pool. They're as indelible as the agonizing delays the 2001 attacks caused a family from Lake Isabella in northern Michigan when they were trying to adopt an infant from India.

The legacy is as vivid as the new banner-draped Peace Center at a Southfield church and as solemn as a black-and-bronze tombstone in Delta Township that has become a shrine for people honoring the first Michigander to fall in a post-9/11 war.

"A lot of people expected that 9/11's legacy would be that concerns about terrorism would forever be a major part of our lives, but that's not really what Americans are telling us," Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, said last week.

"In fact, the percentage of Americans who say that terrorism is our biggest problem dropped to just 3% in June, before news about terrorists in London and all the recent talk about terrorism in our political campaigns," Newport said. "Now it's up to 10%.

"But what this shows overall is that terrorism had been dropping from the forefront of people's minds for a long time, closer to what it was before 9/11."

Before the 2001 attacks, Americans virtually never mentioned terrorism when Gallup pollsters asked them to name the most important problems facing the country. But it zoomed to the top of the list a month after 9/11, when nearly half of all Americans called terrorism the nation's leading problem.

Now, the top worries Americans voice in the Gallup Poll are Iraq, at 26%, and fuel prices, at 15%.

Wayne Baker, a University of Michigan sociologist who studies American attitudes about the world, said, "What we're finding is that the impact of 9/11 is so much bigger than that one event in 2001. What makes 9/11 so personal for American families is all that followed because of that day, including the wars.

"We will see a lasting impact on the generation that came of age during 9/11, but it's difficult to identify the long-term effects because we're still discovering all of the grassroots influences that are moving through our families."

A TOMBSTONE TRANSFORMED: Family turns loss into community's gain

The death of 21-year-old Jason Plite on March 23, 2003, the first fatality of a Michigan man in the wars after 9/11, still reverberates through Grand Ledge High School and nearby Delta Township, where he lived.

The tragedy of his helicopter crashing into a mountain as his six-man Air Force unit rushed to save a group of injured Afghan children is among thousands of heroic war stories echoing through small towns across the United States.

Although it happened more than three years ago, responses to Plite's heroism remain as fresh as a tiny oval stone that his mother, Dawn Peterson, discovered near his tombstone on Tuesday. Painstakingly painted on the stone were two words: "Thank you!"

"Someone left it here," Peterson said. "I keep finding things like this. So many people knew Jason or they know his story now, and they stop by and leave things like this.

"I leave things, too. At Christmas, I bring out a big, 5-foot Christmas tree and set it up with ribbons, bows and ornaments because Jason was really big on Christmas," she said. "I come here every day, year-round. It's such a beautiful place, driving into the cemetery beneath a canopy of trees."

But Peterson isn't trapped by her memories in a maudlin way. Like millions of other Americans stunned by tragedy after 9/11, she looked for innovative ways to transform her loss into ways her family could contribute to their community.

"That day we got the news about Jason, I did lose it. I screamed and was shaking violently," Peterson said. "And for months after that, I was pretty worthless."

Then, a year after her son's death, Peterson decided that she should give up her old life as a stay-at-home mom. Jason's sisters Alissa, now 16, and Shaynah, now 14, were away at school all day. Sitting home alone with memories of Jason left Peterson feeling isolated and depressed. So, she took a job as an aide at Grand Ledge High School. "What I also realized was: Jason was such a giving person himself that I had to carry on as a giving person, too," she said.

One gift that the Petersons gave to the high school that their son graduated from is an annual college scholarship program that gives $1,000 to a graduating artist and $1,000 to a graduating swimmer. Plaques honoring the winners hang in a school hallway near a mural of jazz musicians that Plite painted in 1999, the year he graduated.

"Each year now, we have a fund-raising dinner and present the awards to the students at the Grand Ledge Opera House," Peterson said. "We try to do it ... around Jason's birthday" on April 13.

There's also the 10-by-16-foot flag that hangs over the school's swimming pool. The Petersons helped to dedicate the flag two years ago as a reminder of their son's service. The flag hangs near big boards displaying swimming records, including the day in 1997 when Jason and three friends posted the school's 200-yard freestyle-relay record.

"Having that big flag here gives us a chance to tell Jason's story a lot," Todd Marsh, a swim coach at the school, said Tuesday. "All our swimmers know his story and a lot of visiting teams will ask about that ... flag, too."

Marsh was one of Plite's teammates, so he felt the loss, too.

And the impact of Plite's death extended to the way Marsh's family dealt with the yearlong deployment of Marsh's father, a sergeant in the National Guard, to Iraq in January 2005.

"Dad would try to keep in touch by e-mail almost every day," Marsh said. "But when we wouldn't hear from him for a couple of days?"

Marsh paused for a moment, then sighed.

"Well, it was very hard, because my family had known Jason so well and we knew what happened to him over there," he said.

The wait was agonizing until Marsh's father finally came home in late 2005.

BATTLING A FEAR LIKE CANCER: 9/11 couldn't keep them from their son

Such dramas are the legacy of 9/11 in high schools and living rooms across America.

"I didn't really expect it would have such an impact on me," Larry Jose, the head football coach at Chippewa Hills High School in Remus, near Lake Isabella, said on Wednesday. "But then it did."

Jose is a Marine Corps veteran who is sought out now by football players or students in his health and computer classes who are thinking about enlisting in the military.

"This spring it was Ryan Cutler who came to see me. He was a captain on our team two years ago, a big guy, and he went into the Marines, too," Jose said. "He had leave to come home after boot camp and stopped to see me in my office. I'm always happy to talk to kids, but there was something different this time.

"That was the moment it hit me: In less than a month, this kid who I coached was going to be over there with bullets flying around him, right in the heart of it. And here's what hit me: There was a chance I might never see Ryan again.

"That's when the reality of what's going on in the world right now came crashing into my little office."

It wasn't the first time the Jose family was jolted by the impact of 9/11.

Heather Jose, his wife, is a breast cancer survivor who learned during her medical battles in the late 1990s that she could not have a second child. As part of her battle, Heather Jose wrote and later published a memoir of her struggle, dedicated to their first child, Sydney, now 8. The book is called, "Letters to Sydney: Every Day I am Killing Cancer."

The Jose family's recovery plan also involved a deep desire to have a second child through adoption and, by fall 2001, they were set to fly to India to adopt their son, Ty, now 5.

"Then on 9/11, the world came to a grinding halt and our lives did, too," Heather Jose said. "I still remember e-mails flying around like crazy, wondering if we would ever be able to fly to India. Oh, what were we going to do? It was terrible."

Finally, in July 2002, the agency the Joses were using resumed adoptions, and the couple flew to Pune, India, to bring Ty home.

"But now, of course, we're always thinking about what's happening in the rest of the world in a way we never did before," Heather Jose said.

A lot of those thoughts are troubling, she said. "But I've started giving talks to groups about my experiences with cancer and, you know what? Living with 9/11 is a lot like living with cancer.

"In both cases, we try so hard to control our lives, but we learn that ultimately we're really not in control. The best we can do is to make an effort to make a positive difference every day we're alive and, after that, we've just got to leave things up to God."

WORKING FOR PEACE AND A SCHOLAR'S PLEA: 'The legacy of 9/11 is what you make of it'

Ever since 9/11, partly to rebuke terrorist claims about religion, more and more Americans have gotten involved in programs that highlight religion's peaceful goals.

That's the mission of Barbara Talley, a longtime local civil-rights activist who opened a Peace Center last year at the 5,000-member Hope United Methodist Church in Southfield. The large room where she organizes community-wide programs is decked with banners representing many faiths.

"The legacy of 9/11 is what you make of it," Talley said. "And, while it was a tragedy, it also is an opportunity for all of us to really look at ourselves, both individually and collectively, in our communities. And, if we do that, I think we'll see that we can work step-by-step to shake off a lot of this hatred."

A year ago, a dozen curious teenagers from the church strolled into her center and asked Talley what she could teach them about peace. Talley soon convinced the teens to meet with her one Saturday each month for a study of peace in cultures around the world.

By December, the kids had dubbed themselves Minds of Wisdom, elected officers and written and published 4-by-6-inch cards spelling out their "Peace Pledge." In part, the cards say, "I believe I can make a difference in developing a global vision and blueprint for peace."

That's not a naive idea, said Baker, the U-M sociologist.

As simple as it might sound for a church to set up a peace center or for a family like the Petersons to organize a community-based scholarship program, Baker said, there's research to show that such things can make a difference in the post-9/11 world.

"Studies that have been done over the last 20 years show an amazing decline in personal connections between Americans," Baker said. "We've reached the point where one out of four Americans say that there isn't a single person with whom they can discuss the most important matters in their lives.

"Talking about the legacy of 9/11, I think this is an absolutely astounding finding in the research," Baker said. "It may sound simple, but we're finding that just having positive interaction with other people can make us feel more secure, more trusting and, in the end, more positive about the world."

That certainly was Dawn Peterson's experience after her son's death.

When a family gets news like that, "You feel like you're the only one hurting, the only one suffering," she said.

"Then, we established the scholarship fund and got more involved in the community. And it was good we did that. Of course, I often think about all the 'what-ifs,' but what I try to focus on now is how Jason always was trying to pull people into his life to make his world a little larger.

"I think that's what we all need to do these days."

EBR Safer, But More Work Remains (BRADV)

By Mike Dunne, Advocate Staff Writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 10, 2006

Pam Kaster has a bright orange backpack full of emergency equipment and the training to go with it. But she says her community response team — formed in response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in 2001 — “never seems to fit in” with the emergency agencies it is supposed to help.

Her experience may be a symbolic answer to the question of whether Baton Rouge is less vulnerable to terrorists five years after the attacks on New York City and Washington, D.C. Most of the parts are in place for better security, but there are still some problems putting them all together.

Baton Rouge Metro Airport has more elaborate security, as anyone who has flown in the past five years knows. Chemical plants and refineries are better-guarded, and their gates harder to crash. Specialized teams are in place to help the area recover from disasters.

But some threats remain unaddressed. Railroad tank cars with hazardous chemicals such as chlorine still roll through neighborhoods, past schools and by the downtown River Center. Trucks full of chemicals zoom down highways.

JoAnne Moreau, who heads the East Baton Rouge Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, says the area is better-prepared than most communities.

"I don't think we realized we were unsafe before 9/11," she said. "Terrorism is now on everybody's mind."

Terrorism preparedness didn't begin with the Sept. 11 attacks. Baton Rouge was one of 120 cities that received training and equipment after the 1995 bombing of the Murrah Building in Oklahoma City.

But especially after 2001, the focus of response efforts and planning shifted from natural disasters like hurricanes to potential threats such as biological and other "weapons-of-mass-destruction" attacks, Moreau said.

Front lines

Much of the focus has been on training, equipment and planning for police, firefighters, medical workers and others with major response roles.

The medical sector has become "an integral part" of preparedness in Baton Rouge, Moreau said, since hospitals would be swamped with victims after a biological, radiological or chemical attack.

Agencies like the Department of Public Works are now more integrated into response plans. Firefighters and law enforcement officers have more equipment and better training, Moreau said.

Col. Greg Phares of the East Baton Rouge Sheriff's Office agrees.

For example, the Sheriff's Office has a 32-foot patrol boat capable of operating in the Mississippi River to help secure ports. Deputies received special training from programs at LSU and elsewhere.

"You try to train the best you can and select your purchases as well as you can and try to tip the scale to your benefit," he said.

But nothing will be foolproof, Phares said.

Moreau and Kaster say communication and relationships are key elements in how officials respond to emergencies.

Kaster has served on the parish's emergency planning committee for nearly 20 years. She also formed a community emergency-response team under a national program created by the federal Department of Homeland Security after Sept. 11.

The response team is supposed to help secure disaster areas and to assist local responders. Kaster said she has seen an erosion in communication among agencies since 2001.

Kaster blames the creation of the Department of Homeland Security by the Bush administration as an umbrella for 22 agencies. The new bureaucracy adds an unnecessary layer that she thinks hinders communication and crucial relationships.

The added emphasis on homeland security has diminished natural-disaster response, she said.

"All of the agencies follow the funding stream, and what is funded becomes what is important," she said.

She cites a May 24 hurricane-preparedness drill as an example of what has happened. During the drill, she was helping staff a mock shelter at the Baker Civic Center. The plan called for moving 10 people from a nearby FEMA trailer village to the shelter.

"Everyone knew the scenario," she said.

But the state, local and federal agencies involved couldn't make the necessary decisions, she said.

"The sun is shining, and we can't get 10 people into a bus?" she said. "What would occur in a real emergency?"

Moreau and others said cooperation has improved since the May drill. She also said relationships are not as damaged as Kaster thinks.

Guarding the plants

The concentration of industry in the Baton Rouge area prompted fears that terrorists could target plants here.

Kaster also sits on community advisory panels designed to be local sounding boards for Rhodia and Honeywell Specialty Chemicals. She said those plants are less-vulnerable to terrorist attacks than before Sept. 11.

But homeland security plans for chemical plants and refineries are still voluntary, and no national standards have been set. Congress is considering requiring a review of security plans.

Some proposals would require plants to use "inherently safer" alternative chemicals and processes to reduce the potential for toxic releases through accidents or terrorist attacks. But industry is balking at that.

Such decisions should be made by engineers, not homeland security officials, said the Louisiana Chemical Association's Ed Flynn. Industry favors a standard that applies nationally rather than what is now being done voluntarily, he said.

He said far more attention is being paid to security in Louisiana now. Plants have added guards, security equipment and other procedures, Flynn said.

Ronnie Logan oversees homeland security for Baton Rouge-area ExxonMobil facilities, including the refinery and chemical complex on Scenic Highway. He said the company uses "a structured risk assessment process."

“Some of the things would be pretty obvious: increased counter-measures and security enhancements,” Logan said.

Air defenses

The most obvious impact of Sept. 11 is found where the attacks originated: airports.

“We know how lax things were in the past,” said Baton Rouge Metro Airport Director Anthony Marino.

Before Sept. 11, private contractors provided screening and security, and the key motivation was profit. Those jobs were filled by a new agency, the Transportation Safety Administration, which provides more professional service and uses better equipment, Marino said.

Everyone who works at the airport is subject to a criminal background check, from baggage handlers to shop clerks, he said.

“I like the idea of the criminal background checks,” Marino said.

Security rules imposed after Sept. 11 limit access to the terminal building, including a spacious atrium — finished not long before the 2001 attacks — that overlooks the runway. Only ticketed passengers can use it now. People accompanying them must stop in a small area outside the security checkpoint.

But that will change as the airport continues to expand, Marino said.

Population and business shifts after Hurricane Katrina have boosted passengers at Metro Airport by 40 percent, Marino said.

A new passenger concourse to the loading gates will be built in the coming year, which should double screening capacity and reduce congestion, Marino said.

The new section will be designed with security in mind — not something really factored into the facility’s design years ago, he added.

Marino said he has heard few complaints from passengers about added inconveniences — people like the feel of tighter security.

It's Become 'The Long War' (SLPD)

By Harry Levins, POST-DISPATCH SENIOR WRITER

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 10, 2006

Five years after 9/11, we're still waiting for the other shoe to drop.

As the cliche puts it, "It isn't if we'll get attacked again - it's when." And maybe that's the biggest change in American life since Sept. 11, 2001: the nagging, insecure suspicion that this mess will drag on indefinitely, with no clear-cut ending.

To cap their crises, Americans fancy clear-cut endings, like the surrender aboard the battleship Missouri at the end of World War II. That ceremony ended 1,365 days of war for America.

In today's war on terrorism, Day No. 1,365 came and went on June 6, 2005. Monday's anniversary will run the count to Day No. 1,826. No wonder people of power in Washington are starting to call the struggle "The Long War."

Unlike the newspaper maps of WWII, the maps of this war lack front lines charting the advance toward Berlin, toward Tokyo, toward victory. Instead, today's maps can only pinpoint the site of the latest outrage, from Manhattan to Madrid, from Bali to Baghdad.

Five years ago Monday, in downtown St. Louis, Bleeker Cunningham captured the sudden chill of change and insecurity when she said, "It's like we're in another country. We've been safe all of our lives, but it's here now."

If Bleeker read that morning's Post-Dispatch - the last ink-on-paper record after nearly a decade of peace and prosperity - nothing much would have jumped out at her.

The headlines on Page 1 spoke of a Republican tax plan in Congress, of a willingness by Palestinians and Israelis to talk about peace - and of the arrival of Tiger Woods at Bellerive Country Club for a pro tournament.

The ads for movies that nobody would leave home that evening to watch included "Rock Star," with Jennifer Aniston and Mark Wahlberg. The listing of TV shows that would give way that evening to 9/11 news featured "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?"

If Cunningham scanned the headlines over the day's editorials, she saw one that read, presciently, "St. Louis School Board: Time for Professionalism."

The Dow Jones opened that day at 9,605. The weather forecast for that Tuesday called for a high of 83, with lots of sunshine.

Darkly, that end-of-an-era newspaper mentioned (albeit in passing, and only on the bottom of Page 2) a name that would loom over the next five years.

The nine-paragraph story told of a weekend suicide bombing in faraway Afghanistan. The blast killed the head of the ragtag Northern Alliance struggling to hold out against the Taliban.

The story quoted a spokesman for the victim as suggesting that the bombing "could be the work of Osama bin Laden, who is living in Afghanistan and is accused by Washington of blowing up two U.S. embassies in Africa in 1998."

On that sunny morning of Sept. 11, 2001, bin Laden blew up America's self-assurance.

In an extra edition published that afternoon, the Post-Dispatch quoted Lambert Field baggage official Shawn Lankford as saying, "This place will never be the same. This country will never be the same."

Well, "never" overstates things. As 2001 recedes in the rear-view mirror of history, everyday life seems by and large to be back to normal. Christmas draws crowds to the Galleria. The Cardinals rivet St. Louisans' attention. The Lake of the Ozarks exerts its weekend pull. Golf courses are full, as are supermarket shelves - no rationing in this war.

In short, outside the indignity of removing one's shoes at Lambert Field's security checkpoints, most things seem unchanged. Indeed, some things are unchanged.

Despite almost five years of boots-on-the ground battling in Afghanistan, and more than three years of the same in Iraq, the Army and Marine Corps remain at their prewar strength of 13 divisions. To bolster the ranks, our friends and neighbors in the National Guard and Reserve have been summoned to arms.

On the other side of the equation, the hope for a burst of democratic change throughout the Middle East has so far gone unfulfilled.

But Monday's anniversary will rekindle the sense of American change that hit home five years ago. That's when the manager of a Steak 'n' Shake in Bridgeton - David Walker, then 40 - said, "It's like our generation's Pearl Harbor. Actually, I think it's worse."

Given the lingering sense of insecurity, Walker's ranking may have it right.

For that extra of Sept. 11, 2001, an editorial writer scrambling to meet a short-term deadline cast Walker's words in long-range perspective:

We are living through another day of infamy. Sept. 11, 2001, will live alongside Dec. 7, 1941, as a day when America changed. The United States will be a different, more vulnerable place. Daily life as an American will never seem as safe or as free.

Last week, a White House paper put the thought in almost paradoxical prose:

"America is safer, but we are not yet safe."

Clinton Questions GOP's Sincerity On Security Issues (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 10, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton asserted here Saturday that if Republicans were serious about national security, they'd carry out the recommendations of the bipartisan 9/11 Commission instead of regularly using the issue to pound political opponents.

"They've trotted that dog out for the last three elections - and it's got mange all over it," Clinton told an enthusiastic crowd of about 2,000 packing the Pageant for a morning Democratic rally.

Clinton's jab appeared aimed, in part, at challenging the Republican-led effort to blame his administration for some of the government failures in advance of the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington five years ago Monday.

Outside the Pageant, about a dozen protesters underscored that line of Republican attack. One protester sported a giant telephone costume, while others waved phones, to mock the Democratic opposition to some of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism measures.

Clinton contended that the Republicans controlling the federal government for the past five years have talked tough but "basically ignored" the security improvements that the commission said were necessary.

"Let's check all those cargo containers at ports and airports," Clinton said. He then cited the congressional failure to allocate money for inspection equipment, because of concerns that it is too expensive.

Such spending wouldn't be a problem, he said, if Republicans would stop approving tax cuts for the wealthy. "Millionaires like me get our taxes cut like clockwork," he said.

At a fundraising brunch later at the Chase Park Plaza, Clinton asserted that some Republicans use the terrorism issue to mask their chief aim of "concentrating wealth and power" into the hands of a few.

"They could give their crowd shovelfuls of money, as long as they kept America scared," Clinton said. "They think government for special interests is good."

State Republican Party spokesman Paul Sloca said the tax cuts promoted by President George W. Bush have helped create millions of jobs.

But the GOP's key point, the spokesman said, is that Clinton and other Democratic leaders in the 1990s failed to properly confront the terrorist threats in the 1990s. "Americans have confidence that this president (Bush) can protect them," Sloca said.

The brunch raised more than $1 million for state Auditor Claire McCaskill's campaign against U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, a Republican. Joining Clinton at the brunch was former U.S. Rep. Richard Gephardt, D-St. Louis County, and former U.S. Sen. Jean Carnahan, D-Mo. Clinton left town after the brunch.

The rally at the Pageant was aimed at energizing rank-and-file Democrats on behalf of McCaskill and the party's other candidates. Several in the audience said afterward that the former president's rousing 40-minute address - delivered without notes - achieved that goal. "It's about time the Democrats have a good strong figure to lead us," said Kat O'Brian, 28, of University City.

Clinton contended that Missouri's Senate contest was perfect for framing the national security debate, because the state's only president - Harry S Truman - made his name in the U.S. Senate during World War II as an outspoken critic of some government wartime policies.

Truman's hearings spotlighting wartime waste and corruption led to then-President Franklin D. Roosevelt's decision to select Truman as his 1944 running mate. Truman became president when Roosevelt died in April 1945.

In today's climate, Clinton said, "that same Harry Truman would be facing ads back home questioning his patriotism."

Kerry Seeks More US Troops For Afghanistan (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) yesterday urged the deployment of more U.S. troops to combat the growing Taliban threat in Afghanistan while accusing the administration of trying to salvage its congressional majorities by playing on public fears of future terrorist attacks rather than fixing what he said is a disastrous policy in Iraq.

As the nation prepares to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Kerry offered a pointed rejoinder to President Bush's recent rhetorical offensive on terrorism. He said Bush's policies have turned Iraq into a terrorist breeding ground, unleashed dangerous forces elsewhere in the Middle East and diverted resources from the battle against terrorism at home and in Afghanistan.

"We have a Katrina foreign policy, a succession of blunders and failures that have betrayed our ideals, killed and maimed our soldiers, and widened the terrorist threat instead of defeating it," Kerry said in a speech at Boston's historic Faneuil Hall.

A copy of the prepared text was distributed by Kerry's office.

The 2004 Democratic presidential nominee also accused Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who recently spoke of "moral confusion" in the debate about how best to fight the radical Islamic terrorist threat, of smearing those who dissent from the administration's policies by suggesting they are similar to Nazi appeasers in the 1930s.

"It is immoral for old men to send young Americans to fight and die in a conflict without a strategy that can work," he said. "It is immoral to lie about progress in that war to get through a news cycle or an election. It is immoral to treat 9/11 as a political pawn."

Speaking a day after a suicide bomber killed 16 people, including two U.S. soldiers, in Afghanistan, Kerry accused the administration of pursuing "a policy of cut-and-run" in that country and said the Pentagon should deploy at least 5,000 more troops to help suppress the Taliban insurgency. He said allied forces there need more helicopters, drones, heavy equipment and reconstruction funds to help prop up the government in Kabul.

Kerry restated his call for the withdrawal of most U.S. forces from Iraq by next July, a recommendation that most of his fellow Democratic senators have already rejected. He also urged new policies to free the United States from its dependence on Middle East oil, which he described as the "great treasury of jihadist terrorism."

"There is simply no way to overstate how Iraq has subverted our efforts to free the world from global terror," Kerry said, according to the prepared text. "It has overstretched our military. It has served as an essential recruitment tool for terrorists. It has divided and pushed away our traditional allies. It has diverted critical billions of dollars from the real front lines against terrorism and from homeland security."

Kerry, in a rhetorical twist that invoked one of the worst moments of his 2004 campaign, also took note of Bush's speech this week about the treatment of terrorist suspects who have been held at secret CIA prisons abroad. "Let me say it plainly," he said. "No American president should be for torture before he's against it."

A Republican National Committee spokeswoman, Tara Wall, called Kerry's criticism ill-timed on the eve of the commemoration of the Sept. 11 attacks and charged that Kerry's blueprint would embolden terrorists and diminish domestic efforts to prevent future attacks.

Kerry: Bush Uses 9/11 As 'political Pawn' (BOSH)

By Kimberly Atkins, Boston Herald Reporter

Boston Herald, September 10, 2006

Sen. John F. Kerry yesterday blasted the Bush administration for war and homeland security policies that he said leave Americans more vulnerable to attack.

Kerry's remarks came in a Faneuil Hall speech on the eve of tomorrow's five-year anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

In his fourth speech this year at the venue, Kerry accused the administration of using the tragedy that killed about 3,000 Americans to justify the war in Iraq.

"It is immoral to treat 9/11 as a political pawn (to) excuse the invasion of Iraq," Kerry said. "They were attacked and killed not by Saddam Hussein but by Osama bin Laden."

Kerry, who is likely prepping for another presidential run, urged Democrats to "redeploy from Iraq, recommit to Afghanistan, reduce our dependence on foreign oil, reinforce our homeland defense and restore America's moral leadership in the world." Kerry also laid out the strategy in a Boston Herald Op-Ed column yesterday.

He called the London terror plot to blow up trans-Atlantic airplanes - thwarted last month - an example of the need to bolster the focus on Afghanistan.

"The Bush-Cheney administration (has) cut and run even as we learn (the plan's mastermind) was an al-Qaeda leader operating from Afghanistan," Kerry said. "That's right - the same killers who attacked us on 9/11 are still plotting attacks against America, and they're still holed up in Afghanistan."

He also accused Republicans of playing politics with Homeland Security funding by decreasing funds for "states that need it most - which happens to be 'blue' states," while increasing it in "the 'red' states that need it least."

"What should count here is the terrorist list, not the Republican National Committee's political target list," Kerry said.

Kerry's speech comes a day after the Republican National Committee launched a Web site (www.demfacts.com) that the group says "highlights Democrat leaders' hypocrisy by juxtaposing their prewar intelligence statements to their current attacks," according to the site.

Whatever Happened To The America Of 9/12? (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

"THE most famous picture nobody's ever seen" is how the Associated Press photographer Richard Drew has referred to his photo of an unidentified World Trade Center victim hurtling to his death on 9/11. It appeared in some newspapers, including this one, on 9/12 but was soon shelved. "In the most photographed and videotaped day in the history of the world," Tom Junod later wrote in Esquire, "the images of people jumping were the only images that became, by consensus, taboo."

Five years later, Mr. Drew's "falling man" remains a horrific artifact of the day that was supposed to change everything and did not. But there's another taboo 9/11 photo, about life rather than death, that is equally shocking in its way, so much so that Thomas Hoepker of Magnum Photos kept it under wraps for four years. Mr. Hoepker's picture can now be found in David Friend's compelling new 9/11 book, "Watching the World Change," or on the book's Web site, watchingtheworldchange.com. It shows five young friends on the waterfront in Brooklyn, taking what seems to be a lunch or bike-riding break, enjoying the radiant late-summer sun and chatting away as cascades of smoke engulf Lower Manhattan in the background.

Mr. Hoepker found his subjects troubling. "They were totally relaxed like any normal afternoon," he told Mr. Friend. "It's possible they lost people and cared, but they were not stirred by it." The photographer withheld the picture from publication because "we didn't need to see that, then." He feared "it would stir the wrong emotions." But "over time, with perspective," he discovered, "it grew in importance."

Seen from the perspective of 9/11's fifth anniversary, Mr. Hoepker's photo is prescient as well as important — a snapshot of history soon to come. What he caught was this: Traumatic as the attack on America was, 9/11 would recede quickly for many. This is a country that likes to move on, and fast. The young people in Mr. Hoepker's photo aren't necessarily callous. They're just American. In the five years since the attacks, the ability of Americans to dust themselves off and keep going explains both what's gone right and what's gone wrong on our path to the divided and dispirited state the nation finds itself in today.

What's gone right: the terrorists failed to break America's back. The "new" normal lasted about 10 minutes, except at airport check-ins. The economy, for all its dips and inequities and runaway debt, was not destroyed. The culture, for better and worse, survived intact. It took only four days for television networks to restore commercials to grim news programming. Some two weeks after that Rudy Giuliani ritualistically welcomed laughter back to American living rooms by giving his on-camera imprimatur to "Saturday Night Live." Before 9/11, Americans feasted on reality programs, nonstop coverage of child abductions and sex scandals. Five years later, they still do. The day that changed everything didn't make Americans change the channel, unless it was from "Fear Factor" to "American Idol" or from Pamela Anderson to Paris Hilton.

For those directly affected by the terrorists' attacks, this resilience can be hard to accept. In New York, far more than elsewhere, a political correctness about 9/11 is still strictly enforced. We bridle when the mayor of New Orleans calls ground zero "a hole in the ground" (even though, sadly, he spoke the truth). We complain that Hollywood movies about 9/11 are "too soon," even as "United 93" and "World Trade Center" came and went with no controversy at multiplexes in middle America. The Freedom Tower and (now kaput) International Freedom Center generated so much political rancor that in New York freedom has become just another word for a lofty architectural project soon to be scrapped.

The price of all New York's 9/11 P.C. is obvious: the 16 acres of ground zero are about the only ones that have missed out on the city's roaring post-attack comeback. But the rest of the country is less invested. For tourists — and maybe for natives, too — the hole in the ground is a more pungent memorial than any grandiose official edifice. You can still see the naked wound where it has not healed and remember (sort of) what the savage attack was about.

But even as we celebrate this resilience, it too comes at a price. The companion American trait to resilience is forgetfulness. What we've forgotten too quickly is the outpouring of affection and unity that swelled against all odds in the wake of Al Qaeda's act of mass murder. If you were in New York then, you saw it in the streets, and not just at ground zero, where countless thousands of good Samaritans joined the official responders and caregivers to help, at the cost of their own health. You saw it as New Yorkers of every kind gathered around the spontaneous shrines to the fallen and the missing at police and fire stations, at churches and in parks, to lend solace or a hand. This good feeling quickly spread to Capitol Hill, to red states where New York had once been Sodom incarnate and to the world, the third world included, where America was a nearly uniform object of sympathy and grief.

At the National Cathedral prayer service on Sept. 14, 2001, President Bush found just the apt phrase to describe this phenomenon: "Today we feel what Franklin Roosevelt called 'the warm courage of national unity.' This is the unity of every faith and every background. It has joined together political parties in both houses of Congress." What's more, he added, "this unity against terror is now extending across the world."

The destruction of that unity, both in this nation and in the world, is as much a cause for mourning on the fifth anniversary as the attack itself. As we can't forget the dead of 9/11, we can't forget how the only good thing that came out of that horror, that unity, was smothered in its cradle.

When F.D.R. used the phrase "the warm courage of national unity," it was at his first inaugural, in 1933, as the country reeled from the Great Depression. It is deeply moving to read that speech today. In its most famous line, Roosevelt asserted his "firm belief that the only thing we have to fear is fear itself — nameless, unreasoning, unjustified terror which paralyzes needed efforts to convert retreat into advance." Another passage is worth recalling, too: "We now realize as we have never realized before our interdependence on each other; that we cannot merely take but we must give as well; that if we are to go forward, we must move as a trained and loyal army willing to sacrifice for the good of a common discipline, because without such discipline no progress is made, no leadership becomes effective."

What followed under Roosevelt's leadership is one of history's most salutary stories. Americans responded to his twin entreaties — to renounce fear and to sacrifice for the common good — with a force that turned back economic calamity and ultimately an axis of brutal enemies abroad. What followed Mr. Bush's speech at the National Cathedral, we know all too well, is another story.

On the very next day after that convocation, Mr. Bush was asked at a press conference "how much of a sacrifice" ordinary Americans would "be expected to make in their daily lives, in their daily routines." His answer: "Our hope, of course, is that they make no sacrifice whatsoever." He, too, wanted to move on — to "see life return to normal in America," as he put it — but toward partisan goals stealthily tailored to his political allies rather than the nearly 90 percent of the country that, according to polls, was rallying around him.

This selfish agenda was there from the very start. As we now know from many firsthand accounts, a cadre from Mr. Bush's war cabinet was already busily hyping nonexistent links between Iraq and the Qaeda attacks. The presidential press secretary, Ari Fleischer, condemned Bill Maher's irreverent comic response to 9/11 by reminding "all Americans that they need to watch what they say, watch what they do." Fear itself — the fear that "paralyzes needed efforts to convert retreat into advance," as F.D.R. had it — was already being wielded as a weapon against Americans by their own government.

Less than a month after 9/11, the president was making good on his promise of “no sacrifice whatsoever.” Speaking in Washington about how it was “the time to be wise” and “the time to act,” he declared, “We need for there to be more tax cuts.” Before long the G.O.P. would be selling 9/11 photos of the president on Air Force One to campaign donors and the White House would be featuring flag-draped remains of the 9/11 dead in political ads.

And so here we are five years later. Fearmongering remains unceasing. So do tax cuts. So does the war against a country that did not attack us on 9/11. We have moved on, but no one can argue that we have moved ahead.

What 9/11 Didn't Change (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Before the dust from the collapsed towers had settled, conventional wisdom had congealed: "Everything has changed." But what about what matters most, the public's sensibility?

It has taken five years for Sept. 11, 2001, to receive a novelist's subtle and satisfying treatment, but it was worth the wait for Claire Messud's "The Emperor's Children." Her intimation of the mark the attacks made on the American mind is convincing because in her comedy of manners, as in the nation's life, that horrific event is, oddly, both pivotal and tangential.

Messud's Manhattan story revolves around two women and a gay man who met as classmates at Brown University and who, as they turn 30 in 2001, vaguely yearn to do something "important" and "serious." Vagueness -- lack of definition -- is their defining characteristic. Which may be because -- or perhaps why -- all three are in the media. All are earnest auditors and aspiring improvers of the nation's sensibility.

Marina is a glamorous child of privilege because she is the child of Murray, a famous liberal commentator given to saying things such as, to a seminar on "Resistance in Postwar America," "once upon a time, poetry did matter." A former intern at Vogue, Marina lives with her parents, on an allowance from them, on Central Park West. She is having trouble finishing her book on "how complex and profound cultural truths -- our mores entire -- could be derived from" analysis of changing fashions in children's clothes. "I want to make a difference." But get a job? "I worry that will make me ordinary, like everybody else." She is, her father recognizes, "stymied, now, by the very lack of smallness" in her life, "by the absence of any limitations against which to rebel."

Danielle, from Ohio, is a producer of documentaries who hopes to "articulate" an "ethos" into a "movement." Her current project, to raise "questions about integrity and authenticity," concerns women who had bad experiences with liposuction.

Julius, from Michigan, is an independent book and film reviewer "with a youthful certainty that attitude would carry him." His "life of Wildean excess and insouciance seemed an accomplishment in itself." He is "an inchoate ball of ambition," and is intermittently aware that at 30 "some actual sustained endeavor might be in order." That might, however, be difficult, given his belief that "regularity was bourgeois."

The problem the three share is not that their achievements, if there ever are any, will be ephemeral, but that their intentions to achieve them are ephemeral. Not solid, like those of the Australian who comes to New York "to foment revolution." With a new magazine.

Murray's nephew, Bootie, a morose autodidact -- imagine Holden Caulfield with his nose in a book of Emerson's essays -- rounds out Messud's central cast, each illustrating Messud's acute understanding of the Peter Pan complex now rampant among young adults who feel entitled to be extraordinary: "To be your own person, to find your own style -- these were the quests of adolescence and young adulthood, pushed, in a youth-obsessed culture, well into middle age."

Not until Page 370 of Messud's delicious depiction of the quintet's tangled lives, "torn between Big Ideas and a party," do the planes hit the towers. Bootie -- it could have been any of these people preoccupied with manufacturing interpretations of fashions and fashions of interpretations -- has "a fearful thought: you could make something inside your head, as huge and devastating as this, and spill it out into reality, make it really happen." Imagine that.

Before Sept. 11, Messud began writing a Manhattan novel about young adults living in the media hall of mirrors. After Sept. 11, she abandoned it. Then returned to it. Asked if she thought she had written a "9/11 novel," she demurs: "I wrote an August 1914 novel." Meaning, "The world I had set out to describe in 2001 had become historical."

But what had changed? The party, scheduled for Sept. 11, to launch the Australian's magazine and the revolution -- Renee Zellweger had accepted; Susan Sontag was a maybe -- was canceled, as was the magazine. Murray "formulated a reasoned middle ground": America did not deserve the attacks, but remember the West Bank. "He wasn't opposed to the invasion of Afghanistan, but qualified about its methods." Danielle decides to proceed with her liposuction documentary.

Nothing changes everything. And even huge events that, as Messud says, make "certain things seem particularly frivolous," leave most of our enveloping normality largely unscathed. That truth and a heightened sense of the frivolous are conducive to national poise five years into a long war.

The Fifth Anniversary (WP)

Mr. Bush has refined his theory and conduct of the war against terrorism -- but not in the right way.

AS THE fifth anniversary of Sept. 11, 2001, approaches, President Bush has offered the country a partisan but sometimes revealing review of the war that began with the attacks on New York and Washington. For the most part, he has belligerently defended his strategy and methods; he has demanded that Congress immediately approve his controversial schemes for the detention and trial of foreign terrorists, once again using vital questions of national security as a campaign wedge issue. But the president has also signaled subtle shifts of course in the way his administration understands the war and in the way it proposes to fight it.

Mr. Bush has refined his description of the enemy: Now he says "the war on terror" is "the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century," pitting free nations against a "totalitarian" version of Islam. Tacitly acknowledging that some of the ad hoc measures he adopted in secret after Sept. 11 are unsustainable, he has also sought to reshape them and put them on a more solid legal footing. With little more than two years left in office, aides say, Mr. Bush is trying to lay the foundation for a long struggle that he believes is "only in its opening stages."

We think Mr. Bush is mostly right about the stakes of the threat posed by Islamic extremism, and we've welcomed some of his adjustments, such as his steps to bring all U.S. military operations back into conformance with the Geneva Conventions. But two major aspects of the president's speeches are troubling: his characterization of the Islamic threat as "a single movement" including both al-Qaeda and Iran; and his insistence that the United States reserve the right to violate international humanitarian laws.

In the immediate aftermath of Sept. 11 Mr. Bush's declared enemy was al-Qaeda and the allied Taliban regime in Afghanistan; later he defined an "axis of evil" that lumped together Communist North Korea, Iran and the secular Iraqi dictatorship of Saddam Hussein. Now he perceives both al-Qaeda and Iran, as well as affiliates like the Lebanese Hezbollah movement, as collectively making up "a worldwide network of radicals that use terror."

One problem with this view is that it acknowledges but skates over the enormous differences between Sunni terrorist networks and Iran. In Iraq, al-Qaeda is literally at war with proxies of Iran, which in turn is a sworn enemy of the Taliban. Mr. Bush asserts that "the Shia and Sunni extremists represent different faces of the same threat"; in fact the Iranian regime does not threaten, as does al-Qaeda, to launch devastating attacks on the American homeland. Its interests are more nationalist and regional than ideological and global. There is a wide gap inside the regime between extremists like President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and moderates like former president Mohammed Khatami, who on Thursday delivered a speech at Washington National Cathedral calling for dialogue between the West and the Islamic world.

The danger is that Mr. Bush's flawed definitions will lead to flawed strategy. While the threat that Iran will acquire nuclear weapons must be confronted -- as should the nuclear threat from North Korea -- Tehran's Islamic doctrine has not proved a major danger to the world, or even the region, over the last quarter-century. Mr. Bush rightly said that "it is foolish to think that you can negotiate with" al-Qaeda. But as the State Department's recent diplomacy reflects, negotiation -- or long-term containment -- may be the best option for Iran.

Mr. Bush seems to understand better than he did five years ago that diplomacy and the promotion of democratic values are as important to winning the war as military action. But in insisting on maintaining the CIA's secret prisons and in asking Congress to cancel some of the protections from abuse granted prisoners by the Geneva Conventions, he risks perpetuating and compounding one of his greatest errors. As senior U.S. generals now state publicly, abusive interrogation techniques are ineffective and counterproductive; they do not produce reliable intelligence. At the same time, they make it impossible for the United States to obtain full cooperation from key allies in Europe and elsewhere, damage its reputation around the world, and make it more likely that captured Americans will be tortured.

Mr. Bush could do the country a great service by using the remainder of his term to put the war against terrorism on a sustainable long-term course. But lumping disparate threats together, insisting on tactics that alienate allies and violate fundamental American values, and using the war as a partisan bludgeon makes for an unpromising start.

Why Haven't We Been Attacked? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Five years later, the absence of catastrophic attacks indicates that something must be going right, even if it's luck.

IN THE DAYS AND WEEKS AFTER Sept. 11, 2001, anguished Americans asked "Why do they hate us?" and "How could this have happened?" As the nation prepares to mark the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks, the question preoccupying Americans is different: "Why haven't we been attacked again?"

DOJ_NMG_0060753

One answer, of course, is that we have — just not on U.S. soil. And the question could be rendered horribly irrelevant tomorrow if Al Qaeda or its sinister soul mates manage to penetrate the defenses erected over the last five years. But there really can be no single answer to the question. A certain humility becomes those who try to explain why the U.S. has been spared an attack in the last five years. After all, no less an authority than Tom Ridge, then secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, predicted in 2002 that another terrorist attack was "not a question of if, but a question of when."

Security measures adopted since 9/11 — such as more secure airplane cockpits and more thorough baggage screening — are certainly part of the explanation, as is a generally heightened state of vigilance. But pure luck also may be a factor.

That said, President Bush is correct when he says, as he did last week, that "one reason the terrorists have not succeeded is because of the hard work of thousands of dedicated men and women in our government, who have toiled day and night, along with our allies, to stop the enemy from carrying out their plans." The president also is right to point to changes in the law — most of them enacted with bipartisan support — to break down walls between the FBI and the CIA and to extend to counter-terrorism investigations techniques that already had been authorized in criminal investigations.

More debatable is the proposition that the U.S. is safer because of the reconfiguring of various agencies into a massive Department of Homeland Security, or the creation of a new position of director of national intelligence. A substantive commitment to greater vigilance is a more important consequence of 9/11 than changes in governmental flow charts.

Some initiatives undertaken after 9/11 are clearly efficacious; others are still a question mark, and still others amount to an overreaction. Unfortunately, the Bush administration has suggested that its anti-terrorist initiatives are all of a piece. Because the "world has changed" since 9/11, it asserts, no opposition to its policies can be tolerated. According to this view, amplified in the squawk box of partisan rhetoric, it is obstructionist or even disloyal to question particular post-9/11 policies, be they particular provisions of the Patriot Act, interrogation techniques at Guantanamo Bay or the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of Americans.

Testifying before Congress in December 2001, then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft suggested that critics of some of the administration's terrorist proposals might be giving "ammunition to America's enemies." Almost five years later, House Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio complained that the Supreme Court was granting "special privileges to terrorists" when it ruled that Bush could not impanel tribunals to try suspected terrorists without congressional approval.

Often ignored in this partisan cut-and-thrust is the fact that Democrats have supported many of the president's initiatives and that Republicans — notably Sen. John McCain of Arizona — have been critical of others. It's a sign of national strength that Congress and the courts have refused to rubber-stamp every initiative advertised by the administration as being essential to the war on terror. But it's equally encouraging that the broad lines of a post-9/11 policy have been embraced by both parties.

A final thought: Although it was appropriate for Bush to focus on how the governmental response to 9/11 has minimized the threat of further attacks, another factor may be the very openness and mobility of American society that the 9/11 conspirators were able to exploit because of inadequate airport security and sluggish surveillance.

In Britain, where authorities last month announced that they had frustrated a plot to bomb U.S.-bound planes in midair, the suspects had been raised in Muslim communities that were cut off culturally from mainstream British society. Whether this separation fostered their extremism remains to be seen. But it is a welcome fact that Muslims in the United States are not an isolated minority.

Ridge may yet be proved a prophet for saying four years ago that the question was when, not if, the U.S. would be attacked again. But the fact that another 9/11 hasn't happened is at least in part a tribute to the way Americans, and the American political system, have responded.

New Yorkers Make Preparations For Monday's 9/11 Anniversary, In Ways Grand And Quiet (MINNST/AP)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 10, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A Manhattan firehouse glistened with a fresh coat of red paint on Saturday, memorial quilts were put on display, and an enormous American flag billowed from the George Washington Bridge, all parts of the preparations for the approaching fifth anniversary of the World Trade Center attack.

And among the people getting ready for the observances was an Army reservist, in town for his baptism.

The reservist, Sgt. Larry Provost, was back at ground zero, the spot where he spent weeks digging bodies from the rubble of the World Trade Center towers after the terrorist attacks that killed 2,749. On Sunday, he planned to return to neighboring St. Paul's Chapel for his baptism.

Provost's godparents are a couple he met while working at the World Trade Center site.

"I felt I was doing something truly unselfish for the first time in my life," Provost said of his time working the pile in lower Manhattan. The experience sustained him during tours in Afghanistan and Iraq, and led him back to the church for his baptism.

St. Paul's, the 240-year-old Episcopal church across from ground zero, became a center for the recovery effort. Volunteers provided weary rescue workers with round-the-clock food, water, massages and comfort.

"It is the most special place in all the world," Provost said of St. Paul's, which escaped damage when the towers collapsed across the street. "It became what a church should be: open to everyone."

On the nearby Lower East Side, a firehouse made preparations for Monday's arrival of President Bush, part of his two-day visit to the city. Nicknamed "Fort Pitt," the base for Ladder 18, Engine 15 and Battalion 4 will host Bush for a Sept. 11 breakfast.

On Saturday, the firehouse's two front doors sported a new coat of fire-engine red paint. Contractors used power washers to clean the brick facade and bagpipers practiced on the second floor.

There were no visible signs of security as locals strolled past and visitors stopped to chat with the firefighters.

That will change by Monday morning, when Bush shares breakfast with 25 firefighters, 25 police officers from the adjoining 7th Precinct and 25 Port Authority police officers.

The president was scheduled to arrive in New York on Sunday and lay a wreath at ground zero.

Elsewhere in the city, a 90-foot-by-60-foot American flag was unfurled on the George Washington Bridge spanning the Hudson River.

An assortment of quilts honoring the victims appeared around the city. And in Queens, a plaque was unveiled honoring 34 local residents killed when the twin towers collapsed.

At ground zero on Saturday, family members demanded the return of remains of World Trade Center victims. Some victims' relatives believe the tons of ash and debris taken from the Trade Center site to the Fresh Kills landfill still contains fine particles of human tissue and bone that could be recovered.

"If the country truly wants to honor those lost in 9-11, then give them a proper burial," Joanne Meehan of Carteret, N.J. told a crowd of demonstrators. Meehan's daughter, 26-year-old Colleen Markow, was one of the Cantor Fitzgerald employees killed in the attack.

She has received only six small pieces of her daughter's remains for burial.

Flight 93 Memorial Gets Momentum (PHI)

By Amy Worden

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 10, 2006

SHANKSVILLE, Pa. - Families of Flight 93 have sealed a deal on a postage-stamp-size parcel that would be the first tract bought for a memorial to the 40 people on board the United Airlines jetliner when it slammed into the ground near here Sept. 11.

The purchase of the three acres - only a fraction of the 2,200 planned for the Flight 93 Memorial park - is largely a symbolic gesture. But to many it is a sign that, at long last, the acquisition of land to honor the passengers and crew who thwarted an attack on Washington is gaining momentum.

"This is a first small step in what will be the larger picture of getting the balance of the acreage," said Larry Catuzzi, whose daughter Lauren Grandcolas was aboard the plane.

Supporters have overcome opposition to the park's size and cost, but federal funding has yet to flow to the National Park Service, which is overseeing the site's creation. A powerful House member from North Carolina blocked federal funding for the land for three years before dropping his opposition.

But park proponents still face other hurdles - unwilling sellers, negotiations over mineral rights, and environmental hazards from decades of coal mining at the site.

If all goes on schedule, the park will open in 2011, the 10th anniversary of terrorist attacks. The centerpiece is the memorial itself, set in a 400-acre natural "bowl" atop a mountain. Plans include a black slate plaza and a grove of 40 maples.

The park would be surrounded by 1,800 acres of protected land, mostly woods, fields and farms.

The start-up costs are estimated at nearly $60 million, about one-third of that for the land.

"We are still awaiting the federal funding," said Joanne Hanley, superintendent of the Flight 93 Memorial. "The negotiations with landowners are in different stages, but we have to have money to move forward."

The $10 million federal request for land acquisition was contested by U.S. Rep. Charles Taylor (R., N.C.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on interior, environment and related agencies. Under intense public pressure, Taylor dropped his opposition in June. But Congress has yet to vote on the request for the project's first $5 million installment.

The Families of Flight 93 group decided to move forward on its own this summer, using a portion of the $1.2 million it received from the opening weekend box office receipts of the movie United 93 to buy the three acres.

Patrick White, whose cousin Louis J. Nacke II died in the crash, said the group was on track to close on two larger parcels this fall.

"We want to demonstrate to those who are not as willing to sell that it's real and it's happening and there's money," he said.

Josh First, as former Pennsylvania director of the Conservation Fund, was among the most vocal supporters of preserving not only the crash site but thousands of acres around it in the scenic Laurel Highlands of western Pennsylvania, 80 miles southeast of Pittsburgh.

First said in 2003 that he had come up with the boundaries for the park: a 1,200-acre central section to be purchased outright and a 1,000-acre buffer zone surrounding it. That land would remain in private hands but be preserved through the sale of conservation easements preventing commercial development.

Some family members said they could understand the initial opposition to the park's size.

"If I wasn't involved and heard 2,000 acres, I'd say, 'Why is it that big?' " said Ken Nacke, Louis Nacke's brother. "But they are trying to protect the town of Shanksville from the onslaught."

A nearby temporary memorial attracts 150,000 visitors a year, and organizers estimate that 250,000 a year will visit the new memorial, he said.

While the landscape remains largely unchanged, work on the memorial design, awarded to a Los Angeles architectural firm last year, is under way. And more than $7 million of the $30 million anticipated in private funding has been raised from corporations and individuals.

But with the memorial's groundbreaking slated for 2008, some family members and land owners are eager for the land acquisition to speed up.

"Personally, I wish it would go faster," said Ben Wainio, whose daughter Honor Elizabeth died aboard Flight 93. "I want to see a monument built and see it come to fruition. I'm 61 years old."

Landowner Tim Lambert said he had committed to donating six acres just beyond the row of hemlocks scorched by the explosion. But he wants fair market value for an additional 150 acres, which his grandfather bought in the 1930s.

"I feel I am walking a fine line between doing what's best for the families and making sure our family is taken care of," said Lambert, a public radio host in Harrisburg.

Catuzzi said he was dismayed to see some property owners seeking higher prices for their land with each passing year.

Some family members recognize that any deal involving multiple landowners and the federal government takes time.

The land the memorial sits on "has to come from willing sellers," Ken Nacke said. "I don't want to put pressure on landowners."

After all, he and others said, the people of Shanksville never could have anticipated their community would be part of the nation's worst terrorist act.

For Some, Tragedy Came Close (MINNST)

By Bob Von Sternberg, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 10, 2006

Five years on, their memories remain as vivid, shocking and painful as they were on Sept. 11, 2001: The brilliant blue morning in lower Manhattan ... the terror that swept Pennsylvania Avenue ... the fear of becoming another target ... the loss of a beloved son ... the sickened realization that suspicions about a guy named Moussaoui had been right all along.

For most Minnesotans, 9/11 was a remote event, witnessed on television or read about in a newspaper. For a few, it was immediate, awful and sometimes life-changing. Here are some of their stories.

DEAN KOPPERUD commuted from his home in Eden Prairie to New York, where he worked on the 33rd floor of Two World Trade Center as the Oppenheimer Funds' national sales director. He has since retired.

"I actually don't think about it much anymore, "Kopperud said. "At dinner, someone will bring up the fact that I was there and it seems to be one of those things people want to hear about first hand. But I don't focus on it.

"There are so many memories, what a high, crisp clear morning it was, the sky so high and blue. Then, after the first plane hit, how the paper, files and tiles flew out of Tower One, like the thickest snowstorm you've ever seen. We were told Tower Two was secure, so I figured, OK, I'll go back to work. But fortunately, the elevator I used only went down. A guy from the Port Authority told me I was leaving, so I decided not to argue with him.

"Just as I stepped onto Liberty Street, I saw the shadow of the second plane and heard the bang when it hit ... I marched up the east side of Manhattan and the minute you got to 42nd Street, it was as if life hadn't changed, the cars, taxis and buses were all running. I was going to take the train to Connecticut, and at Grand Central you could tell who'd come up [from lower Manhattan] -- we all had about 8 inches of soot on the bottom of our pants. It was a long day, and I don't ever forget that if things happened differently -- if the elevator had gone up, not down -- I wouldn't be here."

BEVERLEY BURNETT is the mother of Tom Burnett, who famously helped lead the passenger insurrection on United Flight 93, causing the plane to crash in Pennsylvania, short of its intended target in Washington, D.C. She and her husband, Tom Sr., live in Northfield.

"Tom and I still grieve for our son, and we'll probably grieve for the rest of our lives," she said. "I think any parent can relate to that, how we miss him.

"It hasn't faded at all, and I know it never will, because he was our only son. Every day is still 9/11 for us. I miss his phone calls, how he was going to take care of us in our really old age.

"We're very proud of what he did that day. We went to the White House to see 'United 93' -- it was important to see what Tom and the others did that day. I believe everyone should see that movie, even those who say it's too horrible to watch. But maybe it would help people imagine what it was like on that airplane.

"We're still looking for our government to chase down the terrorists who planned this and punish them for what they did. I want those people brought to justice. Could the government have done better that day? I don't think Flight 93 should have ever been allowed to take off. These bureaucracies -- the FAA, the FBI, the Border Patrol -- all have to be looked at. You can't just say it was [President] Bush's fault."

THE REV. MICHAEL O'CONNELL, rector at the Basilica of St. Mary and pastor at the Church of the Ascension in Minneapolis, was aboard a 60-foot yacht cruising Long Island Sound at the tail end of a weekend trip to New York, where he had been visiting family and friends.

"Two things have been enduring for me," O'Connell said. "First, we were the only boat on the water in the middle of the sound that morning. We'd seen the smoke from Manhattan, the second tower's collapse.

"We were listening to the news, and they said all aircraft had been grounded, but they didn't say why. Everyone knew why by then.

"The second thing was the fighter jet that came toward us from the city at about 5,000 feet. He came along our port side and did a power turn around us to starboard. It was a uniquely frightening experience because all we could wonder was what was he thinking we were?

"On the 12th, we found out that [Wayzata native] Gordon Aamoth Jr. was missing in the towers, so we planned a memorial for him at the basilica. Since then, I've become friends with his parents. Because of his name, he'll always be the first named among the victims. That should sustain his memory."

BILL AND LAUREN SCHNEIDER had traveled with their two young daughters from their home in Stillwater to Washington, D.C., where they were to receive an award for their work on behalf of adoptive parents. That morning, they went sightseeing, starting at the White House.

"Just the other night, we were looking at photos we took outside on the sidewalk [in front of the White House] after the plane hit the Pentagon. I thought, again, my God, if that fourth plane [Flight 93] had reached Washington we could have easily been killed," Bill Schneider said. "It's not every day, but September 11th is still with me a lot.

"My feeling is those people who attacked us are still out there and want to attack us again. It makes me worry about the world my kids are growing up in."I still remember how frightening it was when they told us to get away from the White House," Lauren Schneider said. "We were carrying the girls, they were just babies then, up and down the streets of Washington. We didn't know where to go. When we got to our hotel, someone said a bomb had been planted inside.

"It stays with you. When we went to England last year, I was afraid to go into London ... even before the bombings there. It's in the back of your mind all the time."

HUGH SIMS was one of the instructors at a flight school in Eagan who became suspicious enough of a student named Zacarias Moussaoui that they called the FBI's Minneapolis field office on Aug. 15, 2001. The next day, Moussaoui was arrested on an immigration violation. Now retired, Sims divides his time between Florida and Minnesota.

"I was sitting in a 747 requalification class that I needed to keep moving planes around for the airlines," he said. "Somebody turned the TV on right about the time the second plane hit the towers. I almost got sick to my stomach -- I couldn't believe what I was seeing.

"I called Senator Wellstone's office and got ahold of his chief of staff. I told him I hope everyone remembers we've got Zacarias Moussaoui in jail here. Someone has to think about that. They moved him the next day.

"Initially, I thought [Moussaoui] knew more about the overall plan, but I began to wonder if he was just a wannabe. We'll never know, I guess.

"I definitely thought he wanted to learn to fly so he could hijack an airplane. But I never imagined he'd want to use a plane as a weapon. Who did?"

COLEEN ROWLEY, former Minneapolis FBI agent, gained national attention after she accused bureau headquarters of impeding the pre-Sept. 11, 2001, investigation of Zacarias Moussaoui. In June, the Justice Department commended her while also criticizing her for failing to push for a criminal warrant to search his possessions. She is currently running for Congress.

"I was walking by my boss' office that morning, and his secretary had turned on the TV in there," she said. "Two or three of us were watching, and within a few minutes, we saw the plane fly into the building.

"I was stunned for a few seconds, and then I thought, 'Oh, my gosh, this must be connected to the guy we've got back here.' I went to one of my other bosses and said there's a guy here who might be connected to this.

"Later, we're sitting around the table with some guys from the U.S. attorney's office trying to put together a probable-cause warrant. There's a TV on in there, too, and we heard, a noise and you could see the whole building crumbling down.

"I don't think about that day too often anymore, mostly because so many events have transpired since September 11th. Since then, it seems as if the entire United States has gone off the deep end."

September 11 Forever Changed Their Lives (FLSUNSEN)

By Tim Collie And Vanessa Bauza, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 10, 2006

Five years after Sept. 11, six South Floridians continue to rebuild their lives and mend their broken hearts. Each has moved from grief and shock to finding a new perspective on life and a way to honor those who died that day.

It's the sound of a plane overhead that makes Corneliu Vaduva flinch.

"If I'm playing tennis ... I have to stop and look up. I cannot help it."

He remembers the roar of a plane as he lit up a cigarette the morning of Sept. 11. He had left his office on the 83rd floor of the World Trade Center for a smoke, even though the night before he had watched a documentary about the dangers of smoking and vowed to quit. By 8:30 a.m., his resolve was gone.

He was in front of the south tower when the first plane hit its twin at 8:46 a.m.

The explosion sent airplane parts, building debris and body parts onto the street in front of him. Soon he heard the thud of bodies as office workers jumped to their deaths.

As he walked away from the building, the native of Romania heard other survivors talk about "terrorists" and "Arabs" and feared that his dark complexion and accent would draw suspicion.

Yet what he remembers most is the help people offered as the buildings fell and the streets filled with dust. Others stopped, held his arm, gently guiding him forward.

"It impressed me a lot that simple people on the street would help each other, that they would take risks, go out of their way," said Vaduva.

Hours later, Vaduva received calls from radio and TV news stations in Romania. A friend who worked at one of the country's largest TV stations remembered that Vaduva worked in the World Trade Center.

During those phone interviews, Vaduva asked listeners to get word to his parents, living in a remote village without telephones, that he was alive.

Listeners contacted family members in the region, urging them to call neighbors and friends who might live close to Vaduva's parents. Truck drivers hearing the interviews turned off the highways to tell the couple their son was OK, he said.

In the days that followed, Vaduva buried four co-workers. He eventually moved to Parkland, and he now works for the South Florida Sun-Sentinel.

In the coming week, he expects to hear from former co-workers and friends. "It's a way, we keep in touch--talking like this to let each other know we're still alive," said Vaduva.

"What it does is teach you how beautiful, how important life is. Each and every day. Things just don't upset me the way they used to."

Randy Tulepan bristles when he hears criticism of the treatment given to prisoners held at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

He was there -- as a Marine, within weeks after 9-11. Just after his father almost died in the World Trade Center attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0060758

"In the beginning it was like the wild west out there. ... We were angry, and they knew it," he said. "...You had to be a professional, always do the right thing. And we did."

On Sept. 11, 2001, Tulepan was training at a U.S. military base in Japan. Through a call home, he learned his father, Craig, right in photo above, had been in a meeting at the trade center, and was almost sucked out of the 63rd floor of the south tower when windows shattered around him. He made it out of the building minutes before it collapsed.

Craig Tulepan's first thought after finding safety was, "What's going to happen to my son? Where are they going to send him? What will he be facing?"

Randy Tulepan was in his third year in the Marines. What began as a rite of passage for an adventurous young man seeking an alternative to college was now a war machine.

A week later, he was preparing to fight in Afghanistan in the second wave of infantrymen. But when U.S. forces gained control of Kabul, he was sent to Guantanamo Bay to guard the first arriving prisoners.

He left the military six months later when his enlistment was up. At 26, he is now a real estate executive with his father's company in Coral Springs.

Randy Tulepan is no longer sure where the war on terror is heading. He fears the American public is losing faith in the fight, and its leaders are losing the will.

"People have moved on since 9-11, I'm talking about those who don't have anybody in the military," Tulepan said. "They're focused on other things, and patriotism just isn't as high any more.

" ... There should be a time now when people reflect on 9-11, think about what happened on that day. And the people who are involved right now in service--the troops, those who died, those who survived--they should be given a thank you for all that they've done."

The cotton ball Gladys Martines swabbed across the inside of her cheek led to no DNA matches among the fragments of bone and tissue recovered from Ground Zero. Her son's wallet, watch or wedding ring were never unearthed from the smoldering rubble.

After working as a maintenance man in the World Trade Center for 17 years, it was as though James Audiffred "disappeared off the face of the Earth" on Sept. 11, Martines said.

Audiffred is one of 1,151 victims of the World Trade Center attacks whose remains were never identified. An urn with ashes from the site is the closest Martines comes to closure. She calls them "Jimmy's ashes," though she knows they are not his, and keeps the urn on a ledge in a corner of her living room surrounded by family photos and a framed copy of the last e-mail he sent her before he died. It reads: "You've been on my mind a lot lately."

The little memorial at her home in Boynton Beach helps ease the void.

Born in Queens but raised mostly in Puerto Rico, Audiffred loved the towers and would proudly take relatives to see the view from the top. In the year before his death, he was promoted to elevator operator and often improvised a role as tour guide, pointing out Manhattan's landmarks for the tourists he shuttled up and down the tower's 110 floors.

"He was fascinated by [the twin towers] and his son also is the same way," said Audiffred's sister, Dolly, who lives in Queens. "There was something about them that he loved ... He felt like he was on the top of the world when he was on the observation deck."

He often worked double shifts, hoping to save money to buy a home for his wife Robin and son Jason, now 24. Audiffred also became a surrogate father to his sister's daughter, when her own father died a decade ago.

Because Audiffred knew the towers so well, his family hoped he had been able to escape. But they later learned from his co-workers that Audiffred had taken a group to the Windows of the World restaurant on the top floor just before the plane crashed into the north tower.

Despite all this, sometimes in a crowd Martines does a double-take when she spots someone with Audiffred's large build.

"I've never been able to cry, like a big sob, like many people have," Martines, 62, said. "I see people in the street, and I look because they look like him. I say, `Maybe he escaped and lost his memory.' But it's all in your imagination. You try to do that as an escape, but I guess he's gone."

Five years after her brother's death, Janet Roy is working toward a memorial worthy of his sacrifice.

Within minutes after the twin towers were attacked, Capt. William F. Burke Jr., of Engine Company 21, was climbing the north tower with other firefighters.

And in one of his last calls, he reassured a frightened friend, saying, "This is who I am. This is my job." When the south tower collapsed, he ordered the firefighters around him out of the building and stayed to help carry a paraplegic man down the stairs.

The rest of his company made it to safety. Burke died with the man he was attempting to save, his sister later learned.

Burke was the oldest of six children; Roy the youngest.

After the towers collapsed, her day was consumed by prayer and dozens of frantic phone calls.

At first she prayed that Burke had escaped and lost communication. Then she hoped he was injured but alive at a hospital. Or breathing but trapped beneath the rubble.

As the days wore on, it became clear that Burke had perished.

"It's still very painful, but I know his life wasn't given up in vain," said Roy, a mother of two young children who lives in Pompano Beach.

"He saved the lives of his engine company, Engine Company 21, people who are working there these days."

"There's a soldier who carries his Mass card in Afghanistan--it's something like that that makes it bearable," she said, referring to the cards that signify a Catholic Mass has been celebrated for the deceased.

Now she's concerned with how we pay tribute to the fallen. Not just emergency workers like her brother, she stressed, but the hundreds of office workers and the men, women and children on the jets.

Together with other families of those who died, Roy has pushed architects, planners and government officials to develop a memorial less abstract than the one planned. This is consecrated ground, she said, the graveyard of almost 3,000 people. No trace was found of about 1,000 people, including her brother.

"As horrible as that day was, as many deaths as there were, people can't look at that as a day of defeat," Roy said.

"Pure evil attacked us--there's no other way to describe it. But look at what happened. We know from the film, the tapes, all of the accounts, that they were very compassionate, very heroic, with each other."

For Carrie Ross, Sept. 11 brings a bittersweet pilgrimage to the knee-high grasses and hemlock trees of the Pennsylvania field where her daughter died.

This weekend Ross, her two sisters and brother-in-law plan to drive the 1,000 miles from Fort Pierce to the crash site in rural Shanksville to pay tribute to Cee Cee Ross Lyles, a flight attendant on United Airlines Flight 93, mother of two, wife, daughter and niece. It is a place that fills Ross with heartache, but offers comfort in the embrace of other victims' relatives. Their faces and stories are familiar from previous visits to the site.

"We're all in the same boat," Ross said. "You are hurting, and yet you are trying to be strong. I start to think about how brave they were and how they fought back. I think we feel a sense of pride. A sense of sorrow, of course, but also a sense of pride because we know they were the first civilian soldiers."

Becoming a flight attendant was a dream come true for Ross Lyles, who was 33. The former Fort Pierce police officer started a job at United Airlines about a year before the crash. She loved traveling and made a point of coordinating mini-vacations to different cities with her husband, Lorne Lyles, and sons, Jerome Smith, now 21, and Jevon Castrillo, now 11.

Though Ross worried her daughter's new career would keep her away from the family too much, she thought it would be safer than patrolling the streets. She also knew better than to try to change her daughter's mind once it was made up, and seeing how happy she was made their time apart easier.

Ross feels grateful that the Pennsylvania crash claimed no victims on the ground.

"I would say that God chose that field," she said. "All around that place is homes ... and there is a school within two minutes of where the plane went down."

The field has yielded some powerful mementos: poems scrawled on fence boards, 40 angels carved of wood, military medals and boots left by soldiers, flags planted in the ground. Carrie Ross keeps a handful of stones from the field in her dresser drawer at home.

"I picked the rocks up because I felt I was picking up part of my child," she said. "I felt it was a sacred place, and I wanted to bring a part of that with me."

Cheryl Paynter's brother and sister-in-law worked together at the Pentagon for 20 years. When Paynter did not hear from Craig or Cheryle Sincock in the frantic hours after Sept. 11, 2001 she feared the worst: that they had both been killed in the fire that engulfed the west side of the building where they worked.

But Craig Sincock was out of the building when American Airlines Flight 77 crashed into the Pentagon. His wife of 25 years, however, was in her office, talking on the phone with her daughter when the plane crashed.

Sincock, who was 53 when she died, doted on her three daughters and six grandchildren. Though they prodded her to retire she enjoyed her job as a secretary to one of the generals too much.

"She had a wonderful sense of humor, was always joking around and making wise cracks…The kids really wanted her to be home more, but she loved her job," said Paynter, 60, of Lake Worth.

DOJ_NMG_0060760

In the five years since the terrorist attacks, Paynter and Craig Sincock, like so many other relatives of Sept. 11 victims, have worked to rebuild their lives.

"His words to me were 'I knew I had to reach out and help other people,'." Paynter said.

After his wife's death Craig Sincock founded a support group for Pentagon families. Through that group he met a widow, Patricia Fallon, whose daughter was killed at the Pentagon. Their relationship deepened, and the couple married in January, Paynter said.

Paynter said Sincock's death has brought her closer to her brother and other siblings.

"It makes one realize in a split second they can be gone," said Paynter, who now talks to Craig Sincock on the phone several times a week and takes vacation time to see him.

After Sincock died Paynter also paid closer attention to politics. She began scrutinizing candidates' positions on security issues, making sure she knew their background and experience before voting.

"I feel like we all have to be involved," Paynter said. "I'm definitely more involved in my community and do a lot more reading on the political side than I used to. I became an advocate to make sure…it doesn't happen again…The only way we can make government accountable to the people is to take an active part and be heard."

Reopening Old Wounds 9/11 Families Say Remains Mishandled (AJC)

By David Ho, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 10, 2006

New York — Near Ground Zero, where their loved ones died nearly five years ago, families of victims blamed city officials Saturday for allowing human remains to stay entombed at a closed city garbage dump without proper burial.

Of the 2,749 people killed in the terror attacks at the World Trade Center, the remains of about 1,150 were never found or identified.

While some family members have for years pushed for a fuller accounting, their efforts have intensified in the weeks leading up to the fifth anniversary of the attacks on Monday.

The discovery in recent months of about 760 body parts, mostly small bone fragments, at a nearby damaged skyscraper slated for demolition has fueled their outrage.

"The dead are not here at Ground Zero, though for many of us their spirits are still here," said Diane Horning, whose son, Matthew, was killed in the attacks. "Their corporal bodies are in a garbage dump."

She called it a "national shame."

Horning, a co-founder of WTC Families For Proper Burial, spoke to the scores of family members and supporters who gathered near the site surrounded by news crews and curious tourists.

Many family members wore black and purple ribbons, held photos of their dead and hefted signs saying "Rest in Peace NOT in Garbage."

After the attacks, search crews excavated the mountains of debris where the twin towers once stood. Trucks hauled away much of the rubble to a closed Staten Island landfill, where workers sifted one last time, spending months looking for remains, IDs, personal effects and criminal evidence.

Overall, fewer than 300 intact bodies and more than 20,000 parts were recovered. Many of those remains have not been identified.

Horning's group sued New York City in federal court, accusing it of not doing enough to search the debris for remains. The group said the city is expected to respond on Sept. 22 to the lawsuit, which alleges negligence and violations of property and religious rights.

Much of the concern had been over remains turned to ash and mixed with pulverized building materials by the incredible violence of the attacks. But the recent finding of body parts near Ground Zero has some families asking if larger and identifiable remains are still in other buildings and the landfill.

Mayor Michael Bloomberg's administration has said past searches were adequate and moving all the debris that might contain remains — hundreds of thousands of tons — would cost too much.

While much of the initial search after the attacks focused on the 16-acre World Trade Center site, debris from the towers and the hijacked jetliners also fell on other buildings and the surrounding neighborhood.

Massive falling wreckage from one of the twin towers severely damaged and contaminated the skyscraper known as the Deutsche Bank building. Wrapped in black netting and filled with toxic dust, the vacant building has been an environmental nightmare and a looming reminder of the attacks.

In the past year, crews preparing to tear it down found so many remains that expert searchers were called in.

Some U.S. senators have called for a special military team experienced in finding the remains of soldiers from past wars to search the area.

The Bloomberg Vista (NYT)

By Jonathan Mahler

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

Mayor Bloomberg likes to eat out, and he makes an effort to have at least one meal a week in a borough other than Manhattan, often at restaurants that are more old-school than upscale. On an afternoon last month, he went to Bensonhurst, a working-class Italian neighborhood in Brooklyn, for lunch at the Vegas Diner. "My ex-wife used to always have two different answers to the question 'What's your favorite restaurant?' " Bloomberg said, studying the Vegas's oversize menu. "What's your favorite restaurant if you're going to eat one meal before you die, or if you're going to eat all of the meals the rest of your life? I would pick a big Greek diner for all of the meals the rest of my life. All the food comes in 10 minutes, it's all the same price and it's actually not bad."

The mayor had left his jacket in the car but was otherwise in his trademark attire: dark blue suit pants, black tasseled loafers, red tie and a monogrammed dress shirt — MRB — with Big Apple cuff links. A small, trim man, he looked well rested and energetic, despite the fact that he'd been up before dawn to jog on his treadmill after a late night out with his youngest daughter in George Steinbrenner's box at Yankee Stadium.

The mayor is by no means folksy, but he seemed surprisingly at ease piling coleslaw on top of Saltines and chatting with customers as he waited for his western omelet to arrive. He gamely, if a bit stiffly, raised his palm up for high-fives to autograph-seeking children — "How about a high-five for the mayor? Come on, you can do better than that!" — and parried chivalrously with a few elderly women who approached to pay their respects. "I can't tell you how much I love you," said one. "Women in their mid-30's like you are so smart," the mayor replied. "I'm going to be 86," the woman said. Bloomberg feigned surprise. "My mother's 97. You're a young woman!"

That afternoon, the mayor was focused on new state legislation aimed at making it easier for workers who claim they developed illnesses while cleaning up the World Trade Center site to collect benefits. Bloomberg was conspicuously absent from the ground-zero press conference the day before at which Governor Pataki signed the bills into law, and the mayor then proceeded to denounce the laws as fiscally unsound.

"I have a legal responsibility to make sure the public's money is spent wisely," the mayor told me, stuffing a slaw-laden Saltine into his mouth. "You're either going to have to raise taxes or cut services for this. We're talking about $10 to $15 million a year. Do you know how many teachers or firefighters you can get for that?" The mayor pushed away his plate of pickles and coleslaw. "We've got an insurance fund, and if we don't make sure that we only pay out legitimate claims, we're not going to have any money down the road. When I say you've got to show the damage was done to your worker, they say, 'Oh, well, we'll have them sign a paper.' Does anybody understand what's going on?" Here Bloomberg lowered his voice to a whisper, as he often does when he's about to say something a little bit controversial, an unconscious tick that can drive his press secretaries crazy. "In some agencies there's never been a person who retired without a disability claim."

If the mayor has grown more comfortable with small talk and quotidian interactions since he was first elected, in 2001, he has not lost his knack for staking out politically unpopular positions, particularly when it comes to emotionally charged, symbolic issues. And even five years after the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, no issue is more emotionally charged and symbolic than ground zero. On the day that the mayor and I met for lunch, The Daily News, usually Bloomberg's most faithful supporter, called him "coldhearted" for opposing the new laws. A prominent labor leader told The New York Post: "It's time for him to stop talking like a private banker . . . and start talking about human life — like the governor."

It was perhaps inevitable that whoever succeeded Rudolph Giuliani was going to seem insufficiently passionate when it came to 9/11, but from the beginning, some have found Bloomberg's attitude toward ground zero jarringly unsentimental. Giuliani established a close bond with the relatives of the victims, appearing frequently at funerals and inviting families to participate in discussions of what kind of memorial would be appropriate on the site; Bloomberg was criticized for not attending enough memorial services and was wary of giving the grieving families a role in urban planning. ("These people shouldn't be deciding on the future of a huge chunk of a city," the mayor told me.) Whenever the mayor ventured his own thoughts about the future of the World Trade Center site — warning against building too large a memorial or proposing that the site include residential buildings — his comments invariably provoked controversy. More often than not, Bloomberg simply said nothing. He appeared uncomfortable with the sort of muscular, emotional rhetoric that ground zero triggered in other politicians. In the spring of 2002, a ceremony was held at City Hall to raise the famous flag that had flown over the smoldering ruins; no speeches were given.

Today when you talk to the mayor about ground zero, he will often steer the conversation away from the 16-acre site and toward the rest of the area around it, a neighborhood that starts north of the Trade Center site at Chambers Street and extends to the southern tip of the island. “The press keeps writing about the World Trade Center site,” he says, “but if you look at a map, it’s a very small part of downtown. The other part of Lower Manhattan, which is the vast bulk of it, doesn’t get any attention.”

The World Trade Center site is owned in its entirety by the Port Authority, and the leases to the buildings that were reduced to rubble on 9/11 are all held by a single private developer, Larry Silverstein. With no legal authority on the site itself, the mayor has opted to concentrate his efforts instead on the surrounding area, which was also badly damaged — if psychologically and economically rather than physically — on 9/11.

But Bloomberg’s emphasis on Lower Manhattan also reveals something more fundamental about his attitude toward ground zero. To many New Yorkers, whatever buildings rise on that hallowed ground will be our response to the terrorists, a statement of defiance and an expression of our ideals. Bloomberg’s hope for these 16 acres is both more and less ambitious. To him, they are not important for what they say to the world but rather for what they could mean to a reimagined and re-energized Lower Manhattan, which in many ways embodies his larger vision for the future of the city.

For decades, the story of Lower Manhattan has been one of seemingly inexorable economic decline. The city’s business axis first began tilting toward Midtown before the Depression, when Grand Central Terminal and Pennsylvania Station started bringing in waves of commuters who preferred to work within walking distance of their train stations, not to mention all of the restaurants and theaters around Times Square. Innovations in engineering were giving rise to a new generation of taller skyscrapers with more usable floor space, larger windows, modern elevators and central air-conditioning, rendering Lower Manhattan’s patchwork of low-slung 19th- and early-20th-century limestone-and-granite relics and cramped turn-of-the-century office towers obsolete. In the 1950’s, the growing suburbanization of metropolitan New York and a postwar building boom concentrated almost exclusively in Midtown made downtown seem all the more anachronistic.

In 1955, the banking scion and aspiring urban planner David Rockefeller tried to jump-start development in the district by placing the new headquarters of his family’s Chase Manhattan Bank there. But the 60-story tower did little to stop the flow of business uptown. In the 1970’s came Westway, a federally financed proposal to bury the West Side Highway and build above it a huge waterfront park lined with clusters of high-rises; it was defeated after nearly a decade of contentious debate.

The World Trade Center was itself conceived to help breathe new life into Lower Manhattan by transforming it into the global center of international trade. Instead, the twin towers only exacerbated the neighborhood’s problems, cannibalizing tenants from the rest of the financial district while pushing restaurants and retail stores underground and — in unflattering contrast with Midtown’s Rockefeller Center — failing to provide any public outdoor space save for a wind-swept plaza. By 1995, about one-quarter of the offices in Lower Manhattan, roughly 20 million square feet, stood vacant.

“If you take a look at the concentration of financial firms downtown, the high point was before World War II, and it has been declining ever since,” the mayor told me a few months ago. The principal architect of Bloomberg’s effort to reinvent downtown is his deputy mayor for economic development and reconstruction, Daniel Doctoroff, a former investment banker who, in 1996, founded NYC 2012, the campaign to bring the 2012 summer Olympics to New York. “Our vision for Lower Manhattan was in some ways a very romantic notion, and in other ways an unromantic notion,” Doctoroff says. “The unromantic notion was accepting that the place was a mess before 9/11. It’s no coincidence that the mayor didn’t put his company there. But there’s also an opportunity because all of this money’s going to be pouring in. So it was a matter of creating an opportunity out of a problem.”

From the beginning of his tenure at City Hall, Doctoroff wanted to find a way to gain control over the Trade Center site — he ultimately proposed an unsuccessful trade with the Port Authority: the two New York City airports for ground zero — but he was confident that even if he failed, the city could transform the neighborhood by working around the 16-acres, nurturing its redevelopment not just as a financial district but as a mixed-use community. In the spring of 2002, Doctoroff started working on a new blueprint for Lower Manhattan. A number of city agencies provided input, as did a variety of architects and city planners, including Alex Garvin, a bow-tied urban planner and professor at Yale University who helped Doctoroff create a conceptual strategy for the city’s Olympic bid. “We know how to build memorials, and we know how to rebuild cities,” Garvin says. “But the problem here was different. The problem here was how do you grow a downtown, which was essentially slowly dying in its competition with Midtown and the rest of the region, around a memorial?”

A little more than a year after his election, Mayor Bloomberg rolled out his vision for the future of Lower Manhattan at a breakfast of the city’s leading businessmen in the ballroom of the Wall Street’s Regent Hotel, a 160-year-old Greek Revival landmark that was once home to the New York Stock Exchange. Standing in the hotel’s ballroom, a 12,000-square-foot rotunda that only a year before was a haven for 9/11 rescue workers and downtown’s dispossessed, Bloomberg conjured a sort of utopian urban hamlet, “a live-and-work-and-visit community for the world,” with apartments and offices but also cafes, performing-arts pavilions, cultural facilities and public places. Tree-lined boulevards would replace the canyons of Wall Street, and the East River waterfront would be studded with ballfields, an outdoor ice rink and even a floating garden.

"Chuck Schumer says he wants downtown to be a vibrant financial center," the mayor told me this summer, referring to New York's senior senator. We were at City Hall, sitting in a vast 19th-century chamber that represents one of the mayor's first managerial innovations: neither the mayor nor his senior staff have offices; they all sit in cubicles in what was once this former hearing room. "But there's real evidence that the future of downtown is not as an enormous commercial center. On the other hand, what does downtown have? It has phenomenal views, great mass transportation, beautiful old buildings that can be converted easily into residential. Now, does that mean companies can't stay down there? No, quite the contrary. I would argue that the reason most companies want to be in Midtown is because their employees can walk to work, go out to lunch to great restaurants. After work they can find taxi cabs, be entertained, go to the theater or a bar or whatever."

There is no model for the Lower Manhattan the mayor envisions. Unlike TriBeCa, its neighbor to the north, it will remain partly commercial, though it will be considerably more residential than Midtown. Because the island narrows so much at the tip, the apartments and office buildings will stand shoulder to shoulder. Most of Manhattan was built to face inward, away from the bustling, filthy waterfront; Bloomberg hopes to reconnect downtown to both the Hudson and East Rivers by encircling the neighborhood with a necklace of public parkland.

Partly to encourage downtown's evolution into a more residential neighborhood, the mayor has refused to offer aggressive incentives to businesses that are considering moving into, or out of, the area. Shortly after his inauguration, Bloomberg scuttled several hundred million dollars in subsidies that Giuliani had promised the New York Stock Exchange, which had been making noise about relocating to New Jersey, to help underwrite a new 10-story trading floor, topped by a 50-story office tower. (The N.Y.S.E. ultimately decided to stay, which hardly surprised Bloomberg: "They're the New York Stock Exchange. Where were they going to go?") The mayor gave Goldman Sachs about half the tax breaks it demanded to build a new $2 billion headquarters just west of ground zero, and he still regrets not giving the firm less.

More controversially, the mayor has allocated hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds, awarded by Congress to the city and state after Sept. 11, for new apartment towers in Lower Manhattan, as well as new office buildings in Midtown and Brooklyn. The bonds were intended to help finance New York's 9/11 recovery, and Bloomberg has been accused of betraying their spirit. The mayor's critics also point out that downtown was undergoing something of a commercial renaissance when the twin towers were attacked: thanks to the bull market of the late 1990's, offices that had long been empty were filling with traders, brokers, bankers and lawyers.

If Bloomberg is underestimating the commercial potential of downtown, the nation's historic heart of high finance, it is partly deliberate. According to the Federal Reserve, Wall Street continues to account for 20 percent of the city's earnings, which means that New York's economy is inevitably at the whim of the market. The mayor would like to reduce the city's dependence on the financial sector by encouraging residential conversions downtown and creating new commercial centers in other parts of the city.

But the mayor's ideas about the future of downtown are also a product of his own experience. Bloomberg started working for Salomon Brothers fresh out of Harvard Business School in a run-down building on Wall Street in 1966, hand-counting stock and bond certificates in an un-air-conditioned bank vault in his underwear, a task that has long since gone the way of the telegram and the mimeograph. His career in business traced the rise of the information age that contributed to downtown's demise; he made his fortune by developing a desktop terminal that allows brokers and traders to remain connected to Wall Street from anywhere in the world.

Bloomberg says that what will attract companies to Lower Manhattan — and, for that matter, to the rest of the city — are not the imperatives of their industry but the quality of life. "Companies come here because the people they want to employ want to live here," the mayor told me. "I can look at my own business. We never would have been remotely successful anywhere else in the world." The city's job, then, is to make New York an appealing place to live. "Cultural institutions, great parks, clean streets, safe streets — those are the things that get the work force here."

The transformation of Lower Manhattan is now under way. Many of the old office buildings lining Wall Street are being converted into luxury apartments. In the immediate aftermath of Sept. 11, it seemed almost inconceivable that anyone would ever want to live downtown; today, it is the fastest-growing residential area in the city. There has been an influx of new stores, including a BMW dealership that recently appeared on the former site of an investment bank. Santiago Calatrava's $2.2 billion glass-enclosed train station, which planners hope will ultimately connect Lower Manhattan directly to J.F.K. and Newark airports, is under construction, as is a new, 12-line subway station and Hudson River ferry terminal. The extension of the West Side promenade to the Battery, the first phase in the reclaiming of downtown's waterfront, was completed in July. "For 25 years, people have been trying to figure out how to bring people from the northern suburbs to Lower Manhattan," says Mitchell L. Moss, a professor of New York history at New York University and an informal adviser to Bloomberg. "What we're seeing now is that downtown is being made into a place where people can work and live."

Some of this development would surely have happened without Bloomberg. Like the obsolete manufacturing lofts of SoHo and TriBeCa, the old office buildings of Lower Manhattan were ripe for conversion; the trend started in earnest under Mayor

Giuliani. Still, even after just five years, it's easy to forget how uncertain the future of this neighborhood seemed in the wake of 9/11. "People say, 'Oh, it's just market forces,' " Doctoroff says. "But people invest in an area because they believe in its future, and that requires articulating a vision and a plan that gives people hope."

It is impossible to separate the mayor from his personal fortune, and one of the clearest ways in which his wealth has manifested itself is in his senior staff appointments. For most mayors, hiring deputies is an exercise in rewarding political supporters and loyal foot soldiers. There is an element of quid pro quo to this, but it is also the most efficient way for mayors to insulate themselves against the hostile forces they will inevitably confront while running the city. The 2001 election was Bloomberg's first foray into politics; he had no political foot soldiers to speak of. What's more, he financed his own campaign, so he had no favors to repay.

As a result, Bloomberg has surrounded himself with an unusual group of senior staff members, including the 48-year-old Doctoroff. A Harvard graduate with a law degree from the University of Chicago, Doctoroff had virtually no political experience before joining the Bloomberg administration, and he and the mayor were only casually acquainted; Doctoroff had lobbied Bloomberg, then a private businessman, to help support the city's Olympic bid.

Bloomberg has also given his deputies an unusual amount of power, particularly compared with Giuliani, a notorious micromanager. This is not to say that Bloomberg is easy to work for. At a recent civic-association meeting in Queens, I heard the mayor publicly grill a commissioner for the Department of Buildings about a potentially unsafe construction site: "You're telling me there's nothing we can do about it? When was the last time we had a building inspector there? Well, let's have another one there tomorrow." But as long as his senior staff can prove, in numerical terms, that they are producing results, the mayor lets them do their jobs and is happy to give them credit for their accomplishments. In Bloomberg's mind, no one deserves more credit than Doctoroff: "History will show that Dan Doctoroff had a bigger impact on this city than virtually anybody."

Bloomberg and Doctoroff are, in many ways, kindred spirits. Both were born and raised away from New York — Bloomberg grew up in suburban Boston, Doctoroff in suburban Detroit — but started their careers in the city and quickly fell in love with it. Doctoroff also decided to go into government after first making his fortune in business. Before joining the mayor's administration following the 2001 election, he ran Oak Hill Capital Partners, whose largest investor is the Texas billionaire Robert Bass. Now he makes an annual pretax salary of $1. And like the mayor, Doctoroff has a reputation for being competitive and inflexible. "Dan is not a guy who likes to go along for the ride," someone who has negotiated against him told me. "He's an able guy who has been successful throughout his career and has always gotten his way."

Doctoroff lives on the Upper West Side, but when we made a date to meet for dinner a few months ago, he suggested an Italian restaurant in a converted 130-year-old drugstore in Clinton Hill, a recently gentrified brownstone neighborhood in north Brooklyn. Doctoroff is tall and athletic-looking — he often bikes to work at City Hall — but shortly after we sat down he told me he was on a diet. He had just made a $1,000 bet with a friend that he could lose 15 pounds first. "I've done it before," he said. "It's the only way I can lose weight."

Doctoroff ordered fish and a diet Coke and over the course of the next three hours proceeded to explain the mayor's broader development strategy for New York. For the most part, the plan grew out of a McKinsey & Company study revealing that the city's need for office space and housing was quickly outpacing its supply. According to McKinsey's estimates, the city would need an additional 70 million square feet of office space over the next 25 years; over that same period, more than one million people were going to arrive in New York. More people meant more amenities. The conclusion was self-evident: to continue to grow, the city was going to have to undergo a period of hyperactive development.

Doctoroff set about identifying underused areas that could be repurposed. Here, the city's outdated zoning codes played to his advantage. Because New York's last comprehensive rezoning took place in 1961, when there were nearly one million more manufacturing jobs in the city, there were large tracts of idle land across the five boroughs. If necessary, Doctoroff figured, the city could employ its powers of eminent domain to condemn private property before turning it over to developers. "You have huge swaths of the city that are no longer relevant to its economy," he told me, "old piers on the waterfront, elevated freight lines, military bases like Governors Island, warehousing districts, rail yards." The approach mirrored Doctoroff's strategy for NYC 2012, which envisioned transforming neglected pockets of the city into sporting venues.

The Olympic plan is dead, but signs of the Bloomberg administration's development strategy will soon spring to life around the city. "We are literally dragging New York into the 21st century," Doctoroff says. A two-mile stretch of dormant Brooklyn property along the Greenpoint-Williamsburg waterfront was recently rezoned for housing and parkland; a decommissioned Navy port on Staten Island will be turned into apartment complexes, restaurants and a recreational sports facility; the crumbling Bronx Terminal Market will be demolished and reconstructed as a retail mall; the Atlantic railroad yards in Brooklyn may someday soon house the New Jersey Nets, as well as mixed-income apartments and 600,000 square feet of new office space. These are just a few of the dozens of development projects currently on the boards. All are contingent on the continuing strength of the city's economy. Most are years away from completion; some, like the Atlantic yards plan, face strong community resistance. But the mayor's office has already rezoned the equivalent of nearly 4,300 blocks throughout the five boroughs for commercial and residential use.

It's not Bloomberg's style to speak in grandiose terms about these projects — he is by nature more of a problem solver than a visionary — and yet taken together, they do amount to a surprising vision for the future of New York. The popular cliché holds that the mayor governs like a modern C.E.O., and hiring McKinsey to help devise a long-term business strategy for the city certainly plays into that perception. But at the same time, Bloomberg seems to be trying to return parts of New York to what it was before it became a city of investment bankers and venture capitalists. By setting all of this development in motion, the mayor is seeking to sustain the city's growth — and thus ensure that there will be housing and jobs for those who don't work on Wall Street. It was toward that same end that Bloomberg took control of the city's struggling school system and that he introduced New York's largest affordable-housing program in decades.

Bloomberg's New York is hardly a city where the children of civil servants will live alongside the children of financiers. It's far more economical for him to create affordable housing in the outer boroughs, which will no doubt accelerate Manhattan's evolution into an island of the wealthy, a trend underscored by the imminent sale of Stuyvesant Town and Peter Cooper Village, two large middle-class enclaves on the east side. And the mayor is by no means opposed to the sort of gentrification that has driven up prices in once relatively affordable neighborhoods like Harlem. "If you're worried about gentrification," he says, "don't improve the schools and don't bring down crime."

Still, the mayor's development strategy harks back to a less high-flying, more idealistic era in the city's history. His affordable-housing initiative, for instance, embraces New York's rent-control laws, a remnant of its social-democratic past. There is something incongruous about a billionaire entrepreneur championing, if implicitly, a return to a time when the city was more hospitable to the working class. For better or for worse, Bloomberg doesn't engage in self-mythologizing about his own lower-middle-class roots when he speaks about his plans for the city. "What, I have to prove that my mother washed more floors than yours to prove that I have the legitimacy to address issues?" he says. "I don't think so."

Similarly, in reviving the city's long-dormant tradition of large-scale urban planning, Bloomberg is, in a sense, trying to reverse recent history. Ever since Jane Jacobs and her fellow urban warriors rose up against Robert Moses nearly a half-century ago, an ethos of preservation and protection has held sway in New York. Unwilling to entrust the city's growth to gradual, organic forces, Bloomberg is opting instead for bold re-engineering. He and Doctoroff have clearly learned from the mistakes of their predecessors. Rather than heedlessly plowing under indigenous neighborhoods in the name of urban renewal, they have largely targeted derelict areas whose natural evolution has been retarded by the city's anachronistic zoning codes. Nor do their development plans include housing projects or monolithic commercial towers, which invariably create ghettos and destroy street life; they are geared instead toward what planners refer to as "mixed-use complexes" and "24-hour communities."

Nevertheless, the mayor's ambitions can hardly be concealed, and his critics on the right would prefer that he leave development to the free market. "We have such pie-in-the-sky ideas from Bloomberg," says Nicole Gelinas, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, an influential conservative research group. "Meanwhile, the infrastructure that the city should be focusing on, like the subways, is being ignored. That's the real barrier our natural growth is going to bump up against." (For his part, Bloomberg told me: "I take the subway. My attitude is go earlier if the train's crowded.")

Moreover, in a city as densely packed as New York, development almost always encroaches on existing neighborhoods; opposition is inevitable, as was the case with Bloomberg's failed plan to build a $2 billion stadium for the New York Jets, the centerpiece of his plan to create a new neighborhood of residential and office towers on a vacant tract of property on Manhattan's Far West Side. "History will show that the decision on the West Side stadium was a disaster for the city," the mayor told me, reiterating his conviction that the stadium's retractable roof would have made it a popular venue for conventions and thus created countless jobs.

To Bloomberg's critics, the stadium showed the mayor at his worst, callously disregarding public opinion and stubbornly refusing to build a consensus among his fellow elected officials. In the end, it was one of those politicians, Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, Lower Manhattan's representative in Albany, who delivered the fatal blow to the stadium, maintaining that the development of the West Side would impede the commercial rebirth of downtown. In fact, Silver says the city went so far as to actively steer businesses away from Lower Manhattan and toward the Far West Side. (Doctoroff denies this.) To Silver, it was unconscionable for the mayor to set his sights on a whole new piece of property in Manhattan rather than helping to replace the nearly 15 million square feet of downtown office space the city lost on 9/11.

It was almost a year ago that Mayor Bloomberg walked into a meeting with the Daily News editorial board and joined the ground-zero fray, calling for housing to be built on the site rather than offices and declaring that the city would be better off without Larry Silverstein there. "Butt Out, Larry," blared a headline in The News two days later.

Bloomberg's comments were unplanned, and they came as a shock to Silverstein and to Governor Pataki, who controls half of the Port Authority, the owner of the land, and was thus the lead politician at ground zero. The mayor's staff was less surprised: for months, he had privately been expressing concern about the site, which, for all of the post-9/11 urgency to rebuild, still hadn't been excavated. Only weeks earlier, the governor had scrapped two of the cultural institutions intended for the site after a number of the victims' families voiced concerns that they might mount exhibits that denigrate America. The foundation in charge of raising money for the memorial was several hundred million dollars shy of their estimated cost of $1 billion. "Things were getting out of hand," Bloomberg told me, "and nobody had the courage to stand up and — well that's a little bit self-serving — but nobody would stand up and say anything."

Eight days before Bloomberg's comments to The News, a Quinnipiac poll revealed that an overwhelming number of New Yorkers wanted the mayor, rather than the governor, to be in charge at ground zero. The World Trade Center site was obviously in chaos, but those sentiments seemed as much a measure of New York's confidence in its mayor as they were an expression of frustration with the rebuilding process. That impression was confirmed less than a month after the poll was conducted, when the mayor was re-elected in a historic landslide.

Today, rumors persist that Bloomberg is considering running for president, his own coy protestations notwithstanding. (When I asked the mayor about this, he repeated his intentions to leave politics when his second term expires: "It's very nice they play <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="21268">"Hail to the Chief" and that you have your own plane. For most people that's a big deal, but it isn't a big deal for me — no offense, I hope you have your own plane someday.")</object.title>

Given how popular he has become, it's easy to forget that only three years ago, Bloomberg's approval ratings were hovering at 30 percent, the lowest of any New York mayor in decades. The prevailing perception was that he was completely divorced from the experiences of everyday New Yorkers, and yet just self-righteous enough to tell them what was in their best interests.

What accounts for this turnaround? The most obvious answer is circumstantial. When Bloomberg came into office, he inherited a $4 billion budget deficit — $1 billion less than his own personal fortune but nevertheless a staggering sum — and a local economy buffeted by Sept. 11. Economists were talking about the prospect of a fiscal crisis, and New Yorkers were imagining the rest: a return to the gritty, grimy 70's. New York is now booming: during the fiscal year that ended on June 30, the city recorded a budget surplus of $3.7 billion. The $85 million that the mayor spent on his 2005 re-election campaign also, no doubt, helped burnish his image.

The mayor himself ascribes his newfound popularity to the fact that the city respects him for sticking to his beliefs. "I am adamantly pro-choice, I am pro-gay-rights and have said a thousand times that I don't think it's the government's business who you marry, and yet I carried most Catholic communities," Bloomberg told me, referring to his re-election. "And we carried the Upper West Side, an area where you'd never think in a million years a capitalist, running as a Republican, could win. That will be my legacy."

Bloomberg and his staff like to talk about his refusal to pander, which isn't to say that he isn't happy to exploit his views for political gain. On the eve of the 2005 mayoral election, Bloomberg came out against the confirmation of Justice John Roberts, citing the possibility that he might vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the landmark abortion-rights decision that the vast majority of New Yorkers support. And in New York, a city that likes its mayors combative, talking about your unwillingness to pander is its own form of pandering. That said, it is hard not to admire the political courage Bloomberg has displayed in championing unpopular causes like the smoking ban, which he pursued with the zeal of a modern-day prohibitionist. Nor is there much doubt that by virtually every measure, New York is a better place to live and work than when Bloomberg first took office — crime is down, the welfare rolls are shrinking, the city is experiencing a historic boom in construction.

The mayor has clearly settled into the job. He rarely flies off to Bermuda in his private jet for the weekend; instead he traverses the boroughs, marching in parades, visiting injured cops and attending funerals and weddings. He'll occasionally manage to get in a round of golf at one of the private clubs he belongs to in Westchester or Long Island, but he also speaks with firsthand knowledge about the city's public courses. During his first few years in office, he tended to avoid civic-association meetings whenever he could. He now seems to genuinely enjoy the feedback, and no complaint is too picayune to capture his interest. He's a regular caller to 311, the hotline he created so New Yorkers could voice nonemergency concerns, identifying himself simply as "Bloomberg," before reporting some unsightly graffiti or uncollected garbage.

Most of all, though, New York has gotten used to Bloomberg. New Yorkers have a unique personal relationship with their mayor. They expect him to be as much a mascot for the city, a personification of its particular spirit, as an executive. They want wisecracks, expressions of outrage, expressions of compassion, displays of emotion. These are not abundant in Bloomberg's repertory. While he seems much looser speaking publicly than he did during his first years in office, the mayor can still sound like a substitute teacher trying to relate to his class, reminding students to get good grades and to swim only when lifeguards are on duty.

Not that the mayor notices. If Ed Koch, the archetype of the mayor as mascot, had an almost pathological need for affirmation, evidenced by his famous rhetorical refrain, "How am I doin'?" Bloomberg truly doesn't seem to care what people think of him. When Salomon Brothers was purchased in 1981, Bloomberg, who'd been with the firm for 15 years, was one of only a handful of partners fired rather than offered employment at the newly merged company, a seeming indignity that evidently didn't bother him in the least. The morning after his last day on the job, he started Bloomberg L.P., the eponymous media company that would make him one of the richest men in America.

Even when his poll numbers were in the tank, he rarely expressed anything approaching regret about having decided to go into politics. "There were days when I was furious about things that were written about me, I was furious about something I had said or about something that had happened, but I always get into bed and fall asleep instantly," the mayor says. "You've got to look forward. You've got to get on with it."

To date, only one building leveled on Sept. 11 has been rebuilt: 7 World Trade Center, a sleek, soaring pale glass tower just north of the site, and therefore just beyond the reach of the architect Daniel Libeskind's master plan. It is hard not to see the building as a 52-story monument to the triumph of the free market over big government. And yet that perception is complicated by the fact that the historic skyscraper, which opened with great fanfare last May, remains about half-empty.

Silverstein Properties is the owner of 7 W.T.C. and is one of its seven tenants, occupying the entire 38th floor. Rather than taking a space on the north side of the building, which offers sweeping views of the Manhattan skyline and the Hudson River, the head of the company, Larry Silverstein, chose to be on the less-scenic south side, where he could monitor the rebuilding on the World Trade Center site.

The 75-year-old Silverstein's relentless optimism has carried him through seven recessions and a few brushes with bankruptcy over the course of his long career. The son of a Russian-Jewish immigrant and Lower East Side real estate broker, Silverstein bought his first building on East 23rd Street in 1957, picked up some used fluorescent lights for the lobby, slapped a fresh coat of white paint on the dingy walls and raised the rent 10 cents a square foot. A career as a real estate developer was born. Until recently, Silverstein's crowning achievement was signing a 99-year lease for the World Trade Center with the Port Authority in July 2001. Now his sights are set on something much, much bigger: rebuilding ground zero.

The lone private developer in the tangle of interest groups at the site, Silverstein has come under frequent fire. While rescue workers were still sifting through the debris, Silverstein announced that he intended to move quickly on the rebuilding. Later, his decision to sue his insurers over their unwillingness to treat the attacks as two separate incidents cemented his reputation as the money- and power-hungry real estate developer who puts his own ambitions over the public good.

At moments, the attacks on Silverstein have been unusually nasty. Charles Gargano, the vice chairman of the Port Authority, called him "greedy." The Daily News ran a humor column parodying the developer: "Oy. . .you think it's easy counting all that insurance money?" Silverstein is unfazed by the criticism. "There are a lot of naysayers out there," he told me in his office recently, "and no shortage of people who would like to get their hands on one of these buildings. I heard that there were all kinds of developers talking to the mayor and governor, urging them to throw me out so they could come in."

Silverstein's immediate task is finding tenants for 7 World Trade Center, a job that has not been made any easier by the enduring physical reminders of the lack of progress at ground zero. On one side of the building sits the empty 16-acre plot; on another is the scarred, moldy shell of Manhattan Community College's Fiterman Hall, which was half-destroyed on 9/11 and remains untouched. But the rents at 7 W.T.C. are also high. Silverstein is asking for a little more than $50 a square foot, a steep sum when compared with the average price of $40 in most commercial buildings in Lower Manhattan, though still less than Midtown, where the going rate is $57.

Months before the building was completed, Bloomberg was concerned about Silverstein's failure to find tenants for 7 W.T.C., and what that failure said about the developer's ability to rebuild the World Trade Center site. The mayor and Silverstein have an odd relationship. Bloomberg is close to a number of the city's high-profile real estate developers, polished, sophisticated men who belong to the same social and philanthropic circles as he does. Silverstein, who may be the only person who calls Bloomberg <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="102216;136443">"Michael" — most people call him Mr. Mayor; his friends call him Mike — is cut from a very different cloth. The differences run deep. Bloomberg and Doctoroff, the former investment bankers, last year pressed Silverstein for cash-flow numbers proving that he had the funds to get all five towers built before he ran out of money. Silverstein hadn't figured everything out yet; he was relying instead on confidence and moxie, the stock in trade of real estate developers. </object.title>

Much as he would have liked to, Bloomberg couldn't throw Silverstein off the site. The best he could hope for was to get him to surrender some of his control over it. Toward that end, he withheld more than a billion dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds that the developer was counting on. His administration also commissioned an investment bank to scrutinize the economics of Silverstein's rebuilding plan and used every opportunity to publicly question the developer's ability to build the five towers slated for the site before he ran out of money.

The mayor's biggest obstacle to forcing Silverstein to cede some control was the governor. Pataki and Bloomberg had diametrically different priorities at ground zero. No matter what the mayor accomplishes in the rest of Lower Manhattan, his legacy will be bound up with whatever happens, or doesn't happen, on those 16 acres. The governor's final term was winding down, and as a likely presidential candidate for 2008, he was disproportionately invested in a single building, the symbolically resonant Freedom Tower. As long as it was rising toward the sky when he hit the campaign trail, Pataki could use ground zero to his political advantage. He had a compelling incentive not to lean on Silverstein, lest he wind up jeopardizing progress on the Freedom Tower. Pataki and the small coterie of old-fashioned political operatives who make up his inner circle were also worried, according to a former senior city official, that it might look as if the mayor were — as the governor put it — "riding in on a white horse" to rescue him. (Pataki's office denies that the governor said that.)

Last spring, however, the governor agreed to join the mayor's campaign against the developer. In April, Bloomberg, Pataki and the Port Authority presented Silverstein with a new deal and pressured him to take it. Silverstein, his back against the wall, agreed to what were, in the end, relatively modest concessions. He retained control over three of the five towers and will build a fourth, the Freedom Tower, before handing it off to the Port Authority.

From Bloomberg's perspective, though, it was a victory. Silverstein surrendered some of his power over ground zero — enough, the mayor says, to get the site built. If everything goes according to plan, Lower Manhattan, which is already encased in scaffolding, will soon be the site of the largest urban redevelopment project ever undertaken. Over the next five years, 11,000 construction workers are expected to pack into downtown Manhattan, pouring 1.6 million cubic yards of concrete and raising 350,000 tons of steel at a total cost of roughly $22 billion, more than half of which will be spent at ground zero.

Substantial questions remain, however, including the consent of several of Silverstein's insurers. Until a final agreement is signed, the negotiations are not over. As Bloomberg knows, getting anything accomplished in New York is difficult under the best of circumstances, and the Trade Center site poses unique challenges. Outside ground zero, the forces arrayed against the mayor, from resolute community activists to ambitious political adversaries, are also estimable. What's more, the culture of preservation has strong roots in New York. While no one disputes that the city needs to adapt and grow, the handful of attempts to significantly alter the cityscape in the past half-century — the twin towers among them — have only vindicated opponents of large-scale urban planning.

In June, when I was riding uptown with the mayor to tour a newly renovated affordable-housing complex in the Bronx, I asked him what he thought was going to happen at ground zero. "There will be continuing problems — yelling and screaming — but we'll get it done," he answered. He paused for a moment, as he gazed out the window of his S.U.V. at Van Cortlandt Park, where he won a controversial battle a few years ago to bury a water-filtration plant beneath the park's golf course. "It ain't easy," he went on to say. "If you want to get something done, you bring in one person and give him power. But the days of Robert Moses are gone."

Feds Tight-lipped On Local 9/11 Ties (PALMBEACHP)

By Eliot Kleinberg, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 10, 2006

DELRAY BEACH — On July 5, 2001, a Delray Beach police officer pulled over a motorist for speeding. He let the man go with a warning. The pre-printed caution on it read in part: "Take a minute and consider how your careless driving affects the people you share these streets with and try to help make our streets a safer place to be." Nine weeks later, the motorist, Mohamed Atta, helped pilot American Airlines Flight 11 into the north tower of the World Trade Center.

For South Florida, the horror of Sept. 11 was compounded by the realization that at least 15 of the 19 hijackers were at one point living in the region — 12 of them in Palm Beach County.

But we know little more than that.

The federal government has told what it learned about the movements of the 19 hijackers in Hamburg, Germany; in San Diego; and in Maine. But not what they were doing here.

Terrorists rented apartments and hotel rooms, opened bank accounts, rented cars. Several had arrest warrants for traffic violations. They took flying lessons in at least six Florida cities. They took in naked lap dancers, intimidated hotel maids, gave waitresses lousy tips and argued with bar managers. They went on the Internet in a city library. And one quizzed a pharmacist about how to relieve mysteriously irritated hands.

But people who were interviewed when FBI agents swarmed across South Florida in the days following the attacks said in recent weeks that, if the investigation is ongoing, it's news to them. They said no one has contacted them since a few weeks after the attacks.

The exception: Willie Lee, manager of a crop-dusting outfit in Belle Glade that authorities said Atta checked out. He said investigators contacted him about eight months ago.

"They wanted to know if I'd noticed anything or seen anything suspicious," Lee said. "I haven't seen nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0060769

The U.S. Justice Department, parent agency of the FBI, has rejected three separate attempts by The Palm Beach Post to obtain documents under the federal Freedom of Information Act — in October 2001, November 2004 and May 2006. An appeal of the 2001 rejection was denied; the appeal of the 2006 rejection is pending.

Justice was not the only federal agency queried. Wanting to cover all possibilities, The Post submitted requests to more than 75 entities, from Amtrak to the Peace Corps to the State Department.

Many took months or even years to process inquiries — one responded to an October 2001 request in July of this year — often blaming delays on disruption of mail service because of the anthrax attacks. The majority of agencies released a few pages, nearly all of them already public, including news clippings, or said they had no documents related to the investigation, or said they'd turned over what they did have to Justice.

Justice, in denying the requests, said documents are part of an ongoing investigation. In interviews, Justice Department spokesmen have refused to comment, saying again Friday that the refusals speak for themselves.

Spokesmen for Delray Beach, Boynton Beach and Boca Raton police said that as far as they knew, their agencies had no contact from federal agents since soon after Sept. 11. Palm Beach County sheriff's spokesman Paul Miller said he couldn't comment.

Groups advocating open records say they have a hard time accepting the "ongoing investigation" argument five years after the hijackers' dramatic deaths and with little evidence that investigators are currently doing anything in South Florida. In addition, some material was introduced in the trial of 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and then released this summer.

The Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press was instrumental in the release of many of those court documents.

"After five years, knowing some of this information was released and some of it was in the Moussaoui trial, their assertion that there's an ongoing investigation and for that reason they want to keep it (the South Florida angle) secret, their justification seems a little thin," committee Executive Director Lucy Dalglish said.

The Moussaoui trial produced the largest trove of government documents about the hijackers' South Florida movements.

When the long-awaited 9/11 Commission report came out in July 2004, it gave scant attention.

And a 900-page report issued in July 2003 by a joint congressional inquiry has only a single mention: Atta's inquiry at Belle Glade.

The leaders of that 2003 inquiry were U.S. Rep. Porter Goss, R-Sanibel, later head of the CIA; and now-retired U.S. Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla. Graham recalled pressing the FBI on certain aspects of the investigation it was keeping secret.

"They said, 'We're not going to tell you anything,' " Graham said last month.

"The White House has put the clamps on the FBI for reasons that I could speculate upon, but it will probably take a different administration, who's more willing to let access to information become public, before we'll really know the reasons," Graham said.

U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fort Pierce, is more circumspect.

"Obviously we're still trying to uncover operations. I almost want to err on the side of caution to the government," Foley said last month. But, he said, "I don't see why they can't give us some data. I've always been one for more disclosure. But I don't, at the same time, want to second-guess FBI methodology if they're actually on to something."

Intelligence Suggests Terrorists Conduct Surveillance On Ferries (MCT)

By Les Blumenthal

McClatchy Newspapers, September 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - It could be a bomb stuffed in a car or truck or strapped around the waist of a suicide bomber. It could be a small boat filled with high explosives approaching, like the one that attacked the guided-missile destroyer USS Cole in Yemen six years ago. Or it could be a small plane packed with explosives diving out of the sky.

Or terrorists might simply hijack one of Washington state's jumbo ferries with 2,500 people on board and aim it at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard in Bremerton, which overhauls nuclear aircraft carriers and Trident nuclear submarines.

Although security has improved dramatically since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the ferries plying the waters of Puget Sound remain vulnerable, and intelligence suggests that terrorists are conducting surveillance and the ferries could be a target.

FBI and homeland security officials said no terrorist plots had been uncovered, but in the three years after Sept. 11, the FBI reviewed 157 "suspicious incidents" involving the Washington state ferry system, the nation's largest. Of those, seven were classified as having an "extremely" high likelihood of being pre-operational planning, 11 were classified as a "high" likelihood and 49 as "medium," according to briefing documents provided in late August to members of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"Intelligence suggests that WSF (the Washington state ferry system) is being monitored and may be a potential terrorist target," according to the documents, which were marked as sensitive but not classified. "Attacks on mass transit systems are increasingly terrorists' choice."

As for who's conducting the surveillance, the documents said, "The subjects involved in suspicious activities were associated with FBI terrorism investigations."

Some of these figures were reported previously by the Seattle Post-Intelligencer and the Seattle Times, but documents obtained by McClatchy Newspapers provided additional details on the number of incidents that involved possible terrorist planning and potential ties to other FBI terrorism investigations

From spring 2004 to fall 2005, there were 247 suspicious incidents, said Ted Turner, a supervisory intelligence analyst at the FBI office in Seattle. The FBI thinks the increase is due to better reporting by ferry system personnel, the Washington State Patrol - which handles ferry security along with the Coast Guard - and from the general public riding the ferries.

Suspicious activity sometimes may involve a tourist taking pictures or asking out-of-the-ordinary questions, but the incidents that attracted attention from the FBI and other investigators "involved behavior out of the mainstream for either tourists or commuters," Turner said. He wouldn't elaborate.

"There is ongoing suspicious activity continuing to this date," said Coast Guard Lt. Mark Kneeland, who's involved in the Coast Guard's effort to protect the ferries.

However, Turner said, "We have not, after four years, been able to link a suspicious incident to a plan or terrorist group."

"We do not posses any specific or credible information indicating any threat to the Washington state ferry system," said Kirk Whitworth, of the Homeland Security Department.

The state's 28 ferries carry 26 million passengers and 11 million vehicles a year. The ferries make 500 trips a day on 20 different routes carrying commuters across Puget Sound and passengers to islands, such as Vashon or the San Juans, that are accessible only by boat. Alaska and New York also operate ferry systems, but Washington's is the biggest.

Before Sept. 11, the Washington ferry system's most pressing security issues focused on petty crime. Now they're all about terrorism.

"The worst-case scenario is a large truck bomb," Washington State Patrol Lt. Travis Matheson said. But he said attacks could come from the air, the sea or a passenger with a homemade bomb. "The ferries are considered very high risk and they are difficult to protect."

As with subways or other mass-transit systems, it would be impractical to search every passenger or vehicle coming aboard. The Washington State Patrol uses bomb-sniffing dogs to check vehicles that are waiting to board, and undercover troopers randomly ride the ferries.

Access to a ferry's pilot house, which once involved little more than a chain across a ladder with a sign saying "Authorized personnel," has been restricted.

Members of a highly trained Coast Guard Marine Safety and Security Team stationed in Seattle escort ferries in 25-foot boats to enforce a 500-yard security zone. The escorts are random, though on days when there's a big event such as a football game in downtown Seattle, the number of escorts is increased.

"We can't escort every ferry," said Coast Guard Cmdr. Leonard Tumbarello in Seattle. "We try to be random to keep whoever is watching in the dark."

Ferry system personnel have received training in spotting potential security problems, and each ferry is supposed to have a security plan.

The Coast Guard, the Washington State Patrol and other law enforcement agencies participate in training exercises involving ferries. In an exercise scheduled for next Sunday, SWAT teams will board a ferry hijacked by fictitious terrorists. The SWAT team members will board the ferry, which has been taken out of service and won't carry passengers, from other boats or by rappelling from helicopters to the deck. They also will use robots to search for bombs.

Officials know there's no way they can eliminate the risk of a terrorist attack on the ferries.

"Our goal," said Seattle Coast Guard Lt. Cmdr. Josh Reynolds, "is to harden the target enough to make the ferries a less attractive target and the terrorists go somewhere else."

Washington Sen. Patty Murray, a Democrat, rides the ferries almost every weekend to her home on Whidbey Island. She said security had increased but that there was no way to make riding a ferry risk-free.

"We're making progress, but it is a tough balancing act," Murray said. "If we started searching every vehicle it would bring the system to a standstill. We can't guarantee anyone's safety 100 percent anywhere in the nation, but we are making progress."

Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash., agreed.

"The threat is real and we need to take it seriously," he said. "If we went to an airport-type security approach it would break the (ferry) system. Everyone has to assume some risk."

More Muslims Arrive In U.S., After 9/11 Dip (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

America's newest Muslims arrive in the afternoon crunch at John F. Kennedy International Airport. Their planes land from Dubai, Casablanca and Karachi. They stand in line, clasping documents. They emerge, sometimes hours later, steering their carts toward a flock of relatives, a stream of cabs, a new life.

This was the path for Nur Fatima, a Pakistani woman who moved to Brooklyn six months ago and promptly shed her hijab. Through the same doors walked Nora Elhainy, a Moroccan who sells electronics in Queens, and Ahmed Youssef, an Egyptian who settled in Jersey City, where he gives the call to prayer at a palatial mosque.

"I got freedom in this country," said Ms. Fatima, 25. "Freedom of everything. Freedom of thought."

The events of Sept. 11 transformed life for Muslims in the United States, and the flow of immigrants from countries like Egypt, Pakistan and Morocco thinned sharply.

But five years later, as the United States wrestles with questions of terrorism, civil liberties and immigration control, Muslims appear to be moving here again in surprising numbers, according to statistics collected by the Department of Homeland Security and the Census Bureau.

Immigrants from predominantly Muslim countries in the Middle East, North Africa and Asia are planting new roots in states from Virginia to Texas to California.

In 2005, more people from Muslim countries became legal permanent United States residents — nearly 96,000 — than in any year in the previous two decades.

More than 40,000 of them were admitted last year, the highest annual number since the terrorist attacks, according to data on 22 countries provided by the Department of Homeland Security.

Many have made the journey unbowed by tales of immigrant hardship, and despite their own opposition to American policy in the Middle East. They come seeking the same promise that has drawn foreigners to the United States for many decades, according to a range of experts and immigrants: economic opportunity and political freedom.

Those lures, both powerful and familiar, have been enough to conquer fears that America is an inhospitable place for Muslims.

"America has always been the promised land for Muslims and non-Muslims," said Behzad Yaghmaian, an Iranian exile and author of "Embracing the Infidel: Stories of Muslim Migrants on the Journey West." "Despite Muslims' opposition to America's foreign policy, they still come here because the United States offers what they're missing at home."

For Ms. Fatima, it was the freedom to dress as she chose and work as a security guard. For Mr. Youssef, it was the chance to earn a master's degree.

He came in spite of the deep misgivings that he and many other Egyptians have about the war in Iraq and the Bush administration. In America, he said, one needs to distinguish between the government and the people.

"Who am I dealing with, Bush or the American public?" he said. "Am I dealing with my future in Egypt or my future here?"

Muslims have been settling in the United States in significant numbers since the mid-1960's, after immigration quotas that favored Eastern Europeans were lifted. Spacious mosques opened in Chicago, Los Angeles and New York as a new, highly educated Muslim population took hold.

Over the next three decades, the story of Muslim migration to the United States was marked by growth and prosperity. A larger percentage of immigrants from Muslim countries have graduate degrees than other American residents, and their average salary is about 20 percent higher, according to census data.

But Sept. 11 altered the course of Muslim life in America. Mosques were vandalized. Hate crimes rose. Deportation proceedings began against thousands of men.

Some Muslims changed their names to avoid job discrimination, making Mohammed "Moe," and Osama "Sam." Scores of families left for Canada.

Yet this period also produced something strikingly positive, in the eyes of many Muslims: they began to mobilize politically and socially. Across the country, grass-roots groups expanded to educate Muslims on civil rights, register them to vote and lobby against new federal policies such as the Patriot Act.

"There was the option of becoming introverted or extroverted," said Agha Saeed, national chairman of the American Muslim Task Force on Civil Rights and Elections, an umbrella organization in Newark, Calif. "We became extroverted."

In some ways, new Muslim immigrants may be better off in the post-9/11 America they encounter today, say Muslim leaders: Islamic centers are more organized, and resources like English instruction and free legal help are more accessible.

But outside these newly organized mosques, life remains strained for many Muslims. To avoid taunts, women are often warned not to wear head scarves in public, as was Rubab Razvi, 21, a Pakistani who arrived in Brooklyn nine months ago. (She ignored the advice, even though people stare at her on the bus, she said.) Muslims continue to endure long waits at airports, where they are often tagged for questioning.

To some longtime immigrants, the life embraced by newcomers will never compare to the peaceful era that came before.

"They haven't seen the America pre-9/11," said Khwaja Mizan Hassan, 42, who left Bangladesh 30 years ago. He rose to become the president of Jamaica Muslim Center, a mosque in Queens, and has a comfortable job with the New York City Department of Probation.

But after Sept. 11, he was stopped at Kennedy Airport because his name matched one on a watch list.

A Drop, Then a Surge

Up to six million Muslims live in the United States, by some estimates. While the Census Bureau and the Department of Homeland Security do not track religion, both provide statistics on immigrants from predominantly Muslim countries. It is presumed that many of these immigrants are Muslim, but people of other faiths, such as Iraqi Chaldeans and Egyptian Copts, have also come in appreciable numbers.

Immigration from these regions slowed considerably after Sept. 11. Fewer people were issued green cards and nonimmigrant visas. By 2003, the number of immigrants arriving from 22 Muslim countries had declined by more than a third. For students, tourists and other nonimmigrants from these countries, the drop was even more dramatic, with total visits down by nearly half.

The falloff affected immigrants from across the post-9/11 world as America tightened its borders, but it was most pronounced among those moving here from Pakistan, Morocco, Iran and other Muslim nations.

Several factors might explain the drop: more visa applications were rejected due to heightened security procedures, said officials at the State Department and Department of Homeland Security; and fewer people applied for visas.

But starting in 2004, the numbers rebounded. The tally of people coming to live in the United States from Bangladesh, Turkey, Algeria and other Muslim countries rose by 20 percent, according to an analysis of Census Bureau data.

The uptick was also notable among foreigners with nonimmigrant visas. More than 55,000 Indonesians, for instance, were issued those visas last year, compared with roughly 36,000 in 2002.

The rise does not reflect relaxed security measures, but a higher number of visa applications and greater efficiency in processing them, said Chris Bentley, a spokesman for United States Citizenship and Immigration Services, part of Homeland Security.

Like other immigrants, Muslims find their way to the United States in myriad ways: they come as refugees, or as students and tourists. Others arrive with immigrant visas secured by relatives here. A lucky few win the green-card lottery.

Ahmed Youssef, 29, never thought he would be among the winners. But in 2003, Mr. Youssef, who taught Arabic in Egypt, was one of 50,000 people randomly chosen from 9.5 million applicants around the world.

As he prepared to leave Benha, a city north of Cairo, some friends asked him how he could move to a country that is "killing people in Iraq and Afghanistan," he recalled. But others who had been to the United States encouraged him to go.

He arrived in May 2005, and he found work loading hot dog carts from sunrise to sundown. He shared an apartment in Washington Heights with other Egyptians, but for the first month, he never saw his neighborhood in daylight.

"I joked to my roommates, 'When am I going to see America?' " said Mr. Youssef, a slight man with thinning black hair and an easy smile.

Only three months later, when he began selling hot dogs on Seventh Avenue, did Mr. Youssef discover his new country.

He missed hearing the call to prayer, and thought nothing of unrolling his prayer rug beside his cart until other vendors warned him against it. He could be mistaken for an extremist, they told him.

Eventually, Mr. Youssef found a job as the secretary of the Islamic Center of Jersey City. He plans to apply to a master's program at Columbia University, specializing in Arabic. For now, he lives in a spare room above the mosque. Near his bed, he keeps a daily log of his prayers. If he makes them on time, he writes "Correct" in Arabic. "I am much better off here than selling hot dogs," he said.

Awash in American Flags

Nur Fatima landed in Midwood, Brooklyn, at a propitious time. Had she come three years earlier, she would have seen a neighborhood in crisis.

Hundreds of Pakistani immigrants disappeared after being asked to register with the government. Thirty shops closed along a stretch of Coney Island Avenue known as Little Pakistan. The number of new Urdu-speaking pupils at the local elementary school, Public School 217, dropped by half in the 2002-3 school year.

But then Little Pakistan got organized. A local businessman, Moe Razvi, converted a former antique store into a community center offering legal advice, computer classes and English instruction. Local Muslim leaders began meeting with federal agents to soothe relations.

The annual Pakistan Independence Day parade is now awash in American flags.

It is a transformation seen in Muslim immigrant communities around the nation.

“They have to prove that they are living here as Muslim Americans rather than living as Pakistanis and Egyptians and other nationalities,” said Zahid H. Bukhari, the director of the American Muslim Studies Program at Georgetown University.

Ms. Fatima arrived in Brooklyn from Pakistan in March with an immigrant visa. She began by taking English classes at Mr. Razvi’s center, the Council of Peoples Organization.

She has heard stories of the neighborhood’s former plight but sees a different picture.

“This is a land of opportunity,” Ms. Fatima said. “There is equality for everyone.”

Five days after she came to Brooklyn, Ms. Fatima removed her head scarf, which she had been wearing since she was 10. She began to change her thinking, she said: She liked living in a country where people respected the privacy of others and did not interfere with their religious or social choices.

“I came to the United States because I want to improve myself,” she said. “This is a second birth for me.”

New College Program Brings Saudis To U.S. (WT/AP)

By Garance Burke, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

MANHATTAN, Kan. -- Thousands of students from Saudi Arabia are enrolling on college campuses across the United States this semester under a new educational exchange program brokered by President Bush and Saudi King Abdullah.

The program will quintuple the number of Saudi students and scholars in the United States by the academic year's end. And big, public universities from Florida to Oregon are in a fierce competition for their tuition dollars.

The kingdom's royal family -- which is paying full scholarships for most of the 15,000 students -- says the program will help stem unrest at home by schooling the country's brightest in the American tradition. The State Department sees the exchange as a way to build ties with future Saudi leaders and young scholars at a time of unsteady relations with the Muslim world.

But some officials say efforts to fast-track educational diplomacy with Saudi Arabia could use additional scrutiny. Clark Kent Ervin, a former inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), said the U.S. government has yet to ensure proper safeguards are in place to do effective background checks on all applicants.

Administrators at Kansas State University, an agricultural school surrounded by miles of prairie grass, say the scholarships are a bonanza for public education.

"The Saudi scholarship program has definitely heightened our interest in that part of the world," said Kenneth Holland, associate provost for international programs. "Not only are the students fully funded, but they're also paying out-of-state tuition."

Kansas State administrators say common misperceptions about the oil-rich nation make it crucial to create a tolerant environment for Arab and Muslim students, who have been singled out for scrutiny since the September 11 attacks.

Before then, Saudi visa applicants were allowed to bypass the U.S. Embassy in Riyadh by submitting their applications to preapproved travel agencies, which forwarded them onto the consulate for approval or rejection. Three of the 15 Saudi September 11 hijackers used that program, dubbed "Visa Express," to enter the United States.

"Since then, everything has changed," Saudi Embassy spokesman Nail Al-Jubeir said. "There are long lines to wait for a visa. Once they get in to a university here, they are checked and rechecked."

In 2002, Congress mandated that the DHS create the "Visa Security Officer" program in consular offices in Saudi Arabia.

That would bump up security by allowing counterterrorism officials to check visa applications against lists of known or suspected terrorists, Mr. Ervin said.

That same year, Congress also instituted the Student and Exchange Visitor Information System, or SEVIS, which monitors all foreign students' activities -- including where they live, whether they go to class and whether they finish their studies.

All foreign students are tracked on that program, which Mr. Holland said made him feel "very comfortable."

Kansas State boosted efforts to court Saudi officials in the past year, flying administrators and department heads to the Saudi Embassy in Washington. It's paid off: Last month about 150 Saudi students started classes there, each funded to the tune of about $31,000.

Mr. Al-Jubeir said 90 percent of the Saudi students the State Department has registered for the fall semester in the United States also will get such scholarships.

"This is a critically important bilateral relationship," said Tom Farrell, a deputy assistant secretary for academic programs at the State Department. "It's an opportunity to increase understanding of Saudi Arabia for the United States and of the United States for Saudi Arabia."

As Kansas State students enjoy a string of home football games this month, they also are preparing for the campus' first celebration of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month.

"We really want to make this special. We're going to truck in halal food from Kansas City," Mr. Holland said. "The Saudi government is trying to place the students in a variety of institutions across the country, but where you get the competitive advantage is how you treat the students when they get here."

Marwan Al-Kadi, who was active in the Muslim student association while he studied industrial engineering at Kansas State, said efforts to raise awareness about religious diversity have helped the new influx of students feel comfortable.

"Sometimes people ask me if I ride a camel to campus. They don't even realize how many cities we have in Saudi Arabia," Mr. Al-Kadi said. "I want to use the education to go back and work for my father's company."

Allan Goodman, president and chief executive officer of the Institute of International Education in New York, said the new bilateral agreement is a "tremendously positive" step toward person-to-person diplomacy.

"These 15,000 students will really jump-start education, and that will be a great addition to the kingdom," Mr. Goodman said. "At its base, it's about mutual understanding."

Man Arrested In Airport Knife Scare (AP)

AP, September 10, 2006

A man with a one-way ticket to Yemen attempted to board a plane with a knife hidden in a book, authorities said.

Mohammed Ghanem, 21, of Hamtramck, was jailed Saturday on $500,000 after being arraigned on a charge of possessing a weapon in the sterile area of an airport.

Ghanem was arrested Thursday at Detroit Metropolitan Airport after Transportation Security Administration officers detected the knife "artfully concealed" in the book, airport spokesman Michael Conway said.

Someone had carved out the inside of the book and placed the knife inside it, said Ghanem's attorney, Nabih Ayad.

"He said he didn't know where the knife came from," Ayad told the Detroit Free Press.

If convicted, he faces up to 10 years in prison.

Ghanem was born in Yemen, a republic bordering Saudi Arabia whose 18 million residents are primarily Muslim. He is now a legal permanent resident of the United States and was returning to Yemen to get married, Ayad said.

Ghanem works as a busboy and lives in Hamtramck with family members, but he had a one-way ticket to Yemen, authorities said.

A Ban On Carry-On Luggage (NYT)

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

In a directive whose logic is not always apparent, the Transportation Security Administration has spelled out what airline passengers can carry on board with them, what must be placed in checked luggage, and what can't go on the plane at all. Knives must be checked but knitting needles and corkscrews are allowed in the cabin. Up to four ounces of eye drops can be carried aboard, with fingers crossed that multiple terrorists won't combine their allotments to exceed the limit. Laptops, digital cameras, mobile phones and other electronic devices are permitted, so never mind any warnings you've heard that they could be used to trigger a bomb. The bomb ingredients themselves, notably liquid explosives, will be kept out of the cabin by a ban on liquids, gels and lotions, except for small amounts of baby formula and medications.

The ban on liquids surely makes sense given the lack of a reliable, efficient way to detect liquid explosives on the passenger screening line. But the other fine distinctions in this directive make us think the best approach would be a ban on virtually all carry-on items, or at least a limit of one small personal bag per passenger to tote travel documents, keys, vital medications, reading materials and any other minimal items that are allowed.

There's a lot to be said for a drastic reduction in what can be carried aboard. Passenger security lines would move faster if there were little or nothing for the screeners to screen. Passengers could be boarded faster and more comfortably if they weren't clogging the aisles while stuffing bags in the overhead bins. Most important, security would probably be enhanced. If a terrorist somehow slipped onto your flight, he wouldn't have bomb materials with him, or much of anything else for that matter. And his bags would get tougher scrutiny because the machines that screen checked luggage are said to be better at detecting explosives and other dangerous materials than the metal detectors and X-ray machines used for screening passengers and their carry-on bags.

The chief downside, from a security standpoint, is that a greater burden would be placed on the lines that screen checked baggage, which in some airports are already overstretched. That raises the risk that screeners will rush checked bags through with inadequate scrutiny of the images of their contents, or that bags will back up and flights will be delayed to wait for them to be loaded. Still, that should not be a problem beyond the ingenuity of aviation planners. The handful of airports that already have big explosive-detection machines integrated into their baggage conveyor systems ought to be able to handle the load easily.

When we raised the possibility of a ban on most carry-on items a month ago, there was a chorus of complaints from travelers who count on using their laptops during the flight; or fear that valuable electronic devices might be lost, broken or stolen if checked; or resent long waits after a flight to get their checked bags. Some travelers have already shifted to trains or automobiles for short trips and more will do so if the inconvenience mounts. These are not trivial issues. Airlines, already financially strapped, depend on business fliers who are the most likely to object to a change in the rules.

Airlines could head off some of these problems by, for example, storing valuable electronic devices in locked overhead bins where they can't easily be stolen, and hiring more baggage handlers to unload planes rapidly. Separating people from their laptops during flights would be painful, although some people could surely use the time to go over reading material, or even revert to pen and paper.

A ban on most carry-on items need not be permanent. Technologies that could screen passengers and their carry-on bags rapidly to detect known dangerous materials are under development, but it is uncertain when they might be ready. Even then, sophisticated terrorists will always look for new tactics to evade detection. For now, the surest way to keep dangerous materials out of the cabin is to keep virtually all materials out of the cabin.

Louisiana, FEMA In Fight Over Storm Funds` (BRADV)

By Sandy Davis, Advocate Staff Writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 10, 2006

Feds want money — now — but state wants to do audit

FEMA is lowering the boom on Louisiana for refusing to pay its $338 million share of a federal program that bought goods and services ranging from chainsaws to dental care for hurricane victims.

On July 22, FEMA started assessing interest of $14,308.22 for each day the state doesn't pay. If the bill isn't paid by Oct. 20, FEMA will add penalties — retroactive to July 22 — of $55,723.11 per day.

Louisiana's legislative auditor claims FEMA hasn't provided enough information to allow the state to determine whether the money was spent on legitimate needs for people who truly were victims. The Legislative Auditor's Office notes that state lawmakers passed a measure requiring such a review before FEMA is paid.

"Nothing has been paid on any of the bills," said Daryl Purpera, assistant legislative auditor and director of the Compliance Audit Division. "They can't be paid until the audit is complete."

But the Federal Emergency Management Agency insists that under an agreement with Louisiana, the state has no right to audit the federal payments and notes it recently gave the legislative auditor more specific billing information.

FEMA's chief financial officer, Margaret Young, laid out the consequences of nonpayment in an Aug. 22 letter to state Attorney General Charles Foti. Young said the state can't appeal the decision, adding that FEMA expects "a prompt remittance" of the payment.

She also pointed out that the state owes an additional $32 million for its share of Other Needs Assistance Program payments made by FEMA in May and June. That bill, which was due Sept. 6, has not been paid.

FEMA started billing Louisiana in December for the state's 25 percent share of the $1.3 billion FEMA paid to victims of hurricanes Rita and Katrina under the program.

"Other needs" include chain saws, generators, burials, cars, health care, dental care, furniture and anything else victims of a catastrophe might require.

State lawmakers approved nearly $500 million to cover the bills, said Legislative Auditor Steve Theriot, but set the money aside in a separate fund until the audit is completed.

"Our biggest problem was we wanted to know whether we were reimbursing FEMA for fraudulent benefits they may have paid," he said. "And FEMA wasn't sending us detailed information we could use for an audit."

In her letter to Foti, Young says the state has no "entitlement" to audit FEMA. She also insists FEMA "is actively assessing whether improper payments have occurred" and is taking steps to recoup any such money.

Every state facing a disaster has the option of administering the Other Needs Assistance Program itself or having FEMA administer it for the state.

"We chose a number of years ago to allow the feds to distribute these funds on behalf of the state," Theriot said. "Quite frankly, because of the enormity of this disaster, it would have been difficult had the state undertaken it on its own. Just to get the staffing to do it would have been an enormous task."

Young cites that decision by the state in demanding immediate payment.

"FEMA did not obligate itself to cover 100 percent of payments made in error," she wrote, "nor to pay 100 percent of all payments until such time as the state agrees to every payment."

Louisiana has been given extensions on due dates, but those have expired, Young wrote.

She said other states affected by the hurricanes have not been given extensions, and interest and penalties were not waived for them.

"Mississippi has paid its share plus accrued interest, and Alabama paid its portion prior to interest accruing," she wrote.

While FEMA said the state has no right to audit it, about two weeks ago the agency gave state auditors access to its National Emergency Management Information System, which contains some information on people who received assistance.

Purpera said the state is doing a "sample audit" with the new information.

"We will use a selected sample of items paid by FEMA and verify the eligibility of those payments and the residency of the occupants who received the money and things like that," he said. "In some cases, we'll have to go to the clerk's office to confirm who was living at an address. It's a very manual and tedious job."

He said about 25 state auditors worked through Labor Day weekend hurrying to complete the process. He said the job might be finished later this week.

"We have every intention of meeting the Oct. 20 deadline," he said.

In the dark

In the days before the storm, Theriot said, a flurry of documents were signed between state officials and FEMA. One is simply known as the FEMA/State agreement, which allowed FEMA to administer the Other Needs Program.

That document was signed by the governor, and Theriot has reviewed that agreement. But attachments to the agreement also contain critical information, he said.

"One of the attachments, which we think is Attachment D, contained the agreed-upon prices for goods," Theriot said. "I think it's a standardized agreement that FEMA has used in other disasters. We also believe there are other addendums and revisions that were made to that agreement."

But Attachment D is missing, along with the other addendums.

"We've asked FEMA and our state officials for them," Theriot said." So far, we've gotten nothing."

Who signed Attachment D and the addendums?

"We're still asking that question," Theriot said. "We just can't get our hands on them."

The information in those documents is crucial, he said.

"We need to know what the state agreed to pay and how much they agreed to pay," he said. "We don't want to pay the proverbial $300 for a hammer."

For example, Theriot said, FEMA paid some victims for automobiles that were uninsured and reportedly destroyed in the storm.

"We've been told FEMA paid up to $4,500 for automobiles," he said. "We have no idea what criteria they were using to reimburse people. Were these people Louisiana residents and taxpayers? And did they really own an automobile that was registered in the state before the storm? And was it destroyed?"

Stories about reimbursements for generators have made their way back to the auditor's office.

"Again, because we have no paperwork, we don't know what happened. But we've been told that FEMA paid about $791 for each generator," Theriot said.

One person may have paid $300 for a generator, he noted, and another $500.

"Let's say the person who spent $500 on the generator sent FEMA a receipt for it," Theriot said. "FEMA would have sent them $500. But the person who bought the $300 generator didn't produce a receipt. So FEMA apparently paid them $791 because that's what FEMA paid for generators."

In many cases, Theriot said, FEMA got rid of receipts, an action that causes auditors to shudder.

At the very least, Theriot said, he wants the document that shows the state agreed to pay $791 for generators.

And then there's furniture, kitchen appliances and even beds that FEMA apparently purchased for victims.

"We've been told FEMA bought things like beds and bedding," Theriot said.

Theriot notes agencies such as the Red Cross gave people beds and bedding. One of FEMA's mandated jobs, he said, was to coordinate with relief agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0060777

"FEMA is supposed to ensure that people do not double dip," Theriot said. "But because of the magnitude of this disaster, I don't think FEMA was able to coordinate these efforts very well."

Emotions have run high as the federal and state agencies try to piece together what should have been paid, he said.

"It's been frustrating for FEMA and it's been frustrating for us because this event is unprecedented in size," Theriot said. "The amount of individual assistance paid was unprecedented. But we do know some of it was necessary because of the broad breadth of destruction that occurred here. But the question is how much."

FEMA claims no other state has tried to make the agency prove the benefits it paid were legitimate, Theriot said.

"They're upset with us because we're asking for so much proof about what they paid," he said.

But the state's share is likewise an unprecedented amount, Theriot said.

"We want to see receipts, dates of things and verify victims' residencies," he said. "That's a key factor. We want to make sure they were occupying a home in the disaster area. We want to verify they had a loss. We want to make sure the money wasn't going to prison inmates. We want to make sure the recipients were alive."

No regrets

Several state legislators say they stand by their decision to request the audit even though FEMA is charging them more than $14,000 a day in interest.

State Rep. John A. Alario Jr., D-Westwego and chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said the state deserves an explanation from FEMA.

"What happened is FEMA simply sent us a two-page bill that looks like a light bill with a coupon on the bottom," he said. "And it was for $139 million."

He said FEMA "doesn't need to get upset" because the state hasn't paid the bills.

"All FEMA needs to do is tell us what they spent the money on," he said. "I hope they didn't just pull it out and say, 'We're going to bill them $500 million.' I hope they have some backup documents that show how they spent it."

Alario said he is not concerned that FEMA is charging the state interest.

"I'm sure our treasurer invested the money we set aside for paying these bills," he said. "It will be interesting to see how much we've earned on our money. Hopefully, it will offset what FEMA is charging us."

Sen. Francis C. Heitmeier, D-New Orleans and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said FEMA should have provided itemized statements with the bills.

"Those bills were crazy," Heitmeier said. "I don't believe that FEMA would have paid a bill if we had sent them a bill like we were receiving."

He said he knows that FEMA is upset with the state over its refusal to pay until the audit is complete.

"FEMA was getting mad, and we're sorry," Heitmeier said. "We're not trying to jack FEMA around. We need them to help us, but we can't write checks until we know what we're paying for. We're accountable to our taxpayers for every penny we spend."

State Rep. Don Cazayoux, D-New Roads, said legislators were concerned that FEMA might have problems with "accounting and checks and balances."

"It wasn't a punitive idea," Cazayoux said of asking for the audit. "We're happy that FEMA has done as much for Louisiana as they have. But we still want to make sure that our percentage of those expenses were prudent expenses."

He said he isn't surprised auditors had a hard time getting detailed information from FEMA.

"FEMA operates off of different rules than everyone else," he said. "I didn't expect it to be easy."

Plan For Rebuilding Coast To Be Ready In November (NOTP)

By Mark Schleifstein, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, September 10, 2006

State draft to be sent to engineering corps

BATON ROUGE -- State officials said Friday that they are on schedule for a Nov. 20 release of a draft of the Louisiana Comprehensive Coastal Protection Master Plan, which will include two alternative combinations of higher levees and gates, and wetland and barrier island restoration projects aimed at protecting the state's coastline from major hurricanes.

The state plan will be presented to the Army Corps of Engineers in February for its consideration as part of the federal Coastal Protection and Restoration Plan to be submitted to Congress by Dec. 30, 2007.

Several members of the governor's advisory panel on coastal protection questioned whether the state plan will be using the correct risk standard in determining how much protection is needed.

Mark Davis, executive director of the Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana, wanted to know if state officials have agreed whether to increase protection beyond a 1 in 100 level of risk, or whether it is considering a higher level of risk, such as the 1 in 10,000 level used in designing flood control in the Netherlands. The risk level determines the size and strength of the protective structures.

Catastrophic protection

Jean Cowan, a spokeswoman for the state Coastal Protection and Restoration Authority's Integrated Planning Team, which is working with the state Department of Natural Resources to write the state plan, said the team has not yet made that decision, although the plan's draft principles lists the 1 in 100 risk level as the objective of storm protection for residential, public, industrial and commercial infrastructure.

The corps is in the midst of a similar internal debate spurred by a congressional requirement that the existing New Orleans area levee system be improved to the 1 in 100 standard by 2010 and a separate requirement that the federal catastrophic hurricane protection plan protect the state's coastline from a Category 5 hurricane.

Cowan said the state plan also will attempt to address how to restore coastal wetland areas in a way that maintains existing proportions of fish and wildlife habitats.

That also may be problematical, several commission members said, as the need to develop restoration projects that can be sustained over decades could result in significant changes in the mix of freshwater and saltwater wetland areas.

Unique coastal heritage

Lake Charles Mayor Randy Roach, another commission member, also warned that as the levee and wetland mix is designed, it will be difficult to meet another of the plan's goals, to sustain "the unique heritage of coastal Louisiana."

Roach said residents of surge-devastated areas like Cameron Parish are running into financial problems rebuilding homes and businesses that meet the state's new building code that requires structures to withstand Category 3 hurricane winds and the federal flood insurance program's requirements that they be raised.

The Governor's Advisory Commission on Coastal Protection and Restoration also heard from representatives of several western parishes about the need to ensure that the state's comprehensive master plan include projects that will restore freshwater wetlands in their areas.

Tim Creswell, a Vermilion Parish emergency management official, and David Richard, representing Cameron Parish, said areas inundated by storm surge from Hurricane Rita last September are still registering high in salt content, which has meant lower yields for rice, crawfish and the annual harvesting of alligator eggs.

They said state and federal officials also should focus on ways of restoring freshwater wetlands west of the Atchafalaya River because those wetlands can help reduce the height of surge from large storms cutting across the area toward Lake Charles.

Rebuilding wetlands

The commission also heard that unusually low flow of water in the Mississippi River this year has delayed attempts to see if changes in the layout of the Davis Pond Freshwater Diversion Project will allow more fresh water into the upper Barataria basin, where it could help rebuild freshwater wetlands.

The spillway, near Waggaman on the West Bank of St. Charles Parish, was designed to funnel a maximum 10,500 cubic feet per second of water from the river south through a holding area to the targeted wetlands adjacent to Lake Cataouatche.

But a weir designed to keep some water in the holding area ended up collecting fast-growing vegetation that blocked the flow of water. The corps has added a half-dozen cuts in the structure, but the river's been so low this year that no water can flow into the diversion, said Ted Falgout, a commission member and executive director of the Greater Lafourche Port Commission.

WAR NEWS:

Rockefeller: Bush Duped Public On Iraq (CBS)

CBS News, September 10, 2006

Senator Says World Would Be Better Without Iraq Invasion

(CBS News) WASHINGTON When the Senate Intelligence Committee released a declassified version of its findings this past week, the Republican chairman of the committee, Pat Roberts, left town without doing interviews, calling the report a rehash of unfounded partisan allegations.

Its statements like this one, made Feb. 5, 2003, by then-Secretary of State Colin Powell that have become so controversial, implying Iraq was linked to terror attacks.

"Iraq today harbors a deadly terrorist network headed by abu Musab al-Zarqawi, an associated collaborator of Osama bin Laden and his al Qaeda lieutenants," Powell said.

But after 2 1/2 years of reviewing pre-war intelligence behind closed doors, the lead Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, Sen. John Rockefeller (D-W. Va.), who voted for the Iraq War, says the Bush administration pulled the wool over everyone's eyes.

"The absolute cynical manipulation, deliberately cynical manipulation, to shape American public opinion and 69 percent of the people, at that time, it worked, they said 'we want to go to war,'" Rockefeller told CBS News correspondent Sharyl Attkisson. "Including me. The difference is after I began to learn about some of that intelligence I went down to the Senate floor and I said 'my vote was wrong.'"

Rockefeller went a step further. He says the world would be better off today if the United States had never invaded Iraq — even if it means Saddam Hussein would still be running Iraq.

He said he sees that as a better scenario, and a safer scenario, "because it is called the 'war on terror.'"

Does Rockefeller stands by his view, even if it means that Saddam Hussein could still be in power if the United States didn't invade?

"Yes. [Saddam] wasn't going to attack us. He would've been isolated there," Rockefeller said. "He would have been in control of that country but we wouldn't have depleted our resources preventing us from prosecuting a war on terror which is what this is all about."

Republicans say there was flawed intelligence to be sure, but they insist there was no attempt to mislead the public.

"In 2002 and 2003, members of both parties got a good look at the intelligence we had and they came to the very same conclusions about what was going on," White House Spokesman Tony Snow said.

Shades Of Supergun Evoke Hussein's Thirst For Arms (NYT)

By James Glanz

ISKANDARIYA, Iraq — Sabah al-Khafaji remembers when the pieces started arriving here at the height of Iraq's weapons program in the late 1980's, each menacing section of the gun barrel so huge it had to be carried on a separate flatbed truck.

Now, Mr. Khafaji fumbles with the lock on a metal gate near his bus factory 30 miles south of Baghdad and swings it open to a trashy asphalt lot. There lie the rusting steel sections of what may have been Saddam Hussein's wildest reach: the supergun, an artillery piece so powerful that it could not only shell his enemies in Tel Aviv and Tehran but also fire a projectile into orbit.

Most of Mr. Hussein's vast network of military complexes and the weapons they contained have been looted, often to the last bolt and window frame. But as weapons experts continue to see and gauge what is left — weapons held within protected enclaves or hulking metal relics even the most ambitious looters were unable to cart away — they are getting a concentrated picture of the obsessive martial mind that ran this country for 25 years.

In Taji and Miqdadiya, both north of Baghdad, the bulky carcasses of tanks, armored personnel carriers, mobile radio shacks and ungainly amphibious vehicles go on for acres, gutted and mismatched weaponry purchased from every country that would do business with Saddam Hussein — which at times, directly or indirectly, seemed to include most of the world's major arms dealers, including the United States and Britain.

Scattered more thinly are the traces of grandiose projects like the supergun, nicknamed Big Babylon and designed for Mr. Hussein by a brilliant Canadian engineer named Gerald V. Bull, who was eventually assassinated for his trouble, probably by Israeli or Western intelligence agents.

The oversize palaces Mr. Hussein compulsively built are more familiar as visible monuments to his rule. But while the palaces have a decidedly Dr. Seuss feel, the weaponry seems equal parts Jules Verne, power-mad dictator and adolescent boy.

"I would say that Saddam's regime was not a model of rationality," said John Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a Washington-based organization that has studied Mr. Hussein's weaponry. "He did in some respects share Hitler's fascination with wonder weapons."

Some of his dark arsenal was put into action, some just came close. Mr. Hussein's weaponeers produced the chemical agents that his army used to gas Iranian troops and Kurdish civilians, killing thousands. In 1991, after the Persian Gulf war, weapons inspectors discovered that the Iraqi nuclear bomb program was far more advanced than expected — though after the 2003 invasion no evidence of new nuclear work turned up.

Mostly, Mr. Hussein's scientists could not satisfy his craving for wonder weaponry, although they tried often enough.

There was a reported program to create a "rail gun," in which electromagnetic pulses would accelerate a projectile to high speeds, research on elaborate multistage rockets and re-entry vehicles, and, before 1991, endless tinkering with weird biological agents. None of it produced anything particularly useful.

Still, Mr. Hussein's attachment to armor, artillery and technology was not entirely useless strategically — the arsenal was perhaps a reason he literally stuck to his guns as foreign pressure on his government mounted in 1991 and again in 2003. Back in the 1980's during Iraq's war with Iran, it helped Iraq to hold off primitive "human wave" attacks by the Iranian infantry and preserve a grim stalemate. But Iraq could do little, overtly at least, against American and British firepower in the later conflicts.

Maj. William C. Taylor of the Army's Fourth Infantry Division conducted a recent sunset tour of two enormous scrap yards in Taji, a former Iraqi military base now run by the Americans, where acres of partly destroyed Iraqi military vehicles are laid out like the bones of dinosaurs preserved in their last agonies.

In one scrap yard, the spindly and partly broken superstructures of Soviet radar and missile launching equipment really did look skeletal, with their long-outmoded telescoping antennas and drooping starburst aerials. The stripped chassis of military trucks were stacked as haphazardly as old bedsprings across the turrets of broken tanks.

There was more Russian gear in the other scrap yard, where row after row of damaged and sometimes charred hardware spread out for hundreds of yards in every direction.

Perhaps strangest of all were little Russian armored reconnaissance ground vehicles, somehow evoking Jetsons-style spaceships, made for just one occupant. Major Taylor explained that the two extra wheels drawn up into the vehicle like landing gear would have been lowered for extra support in rough terrain.

But there were also French, American and Brazilian armored vehicles of one kind or another.

"It's a British Mark I," Major Taylor marveled, his forage cap disappearing into the hatch of a strangely shaped tank that seemed many decades old. Then he appeared to change his mind. "1970's?" he said uncertainly as he re-emerged.

Most of the junked vehicles were tagged with graffiti by the Westerners who had dealt this armed menagerie its demise. "Ouch!" read one bit of graffiti, with an arrow pointing to the ragged hole where a shell had torn into the cockpit of a piece of motorized artillery.

There was the inevitable "Size does matter" on the barrel of a cannon, but there were also a few sweet messages in this place of death. "Te amo mi amor," someone had written on a squat troop carrier with steel tracks.

If at least some of those pieces had practical military uses, the supergun existed in the realm of almost pure fantasy. According to "Arms and the Man: Dr. Gerald Bull, Iraq and the Supergun," by William Lowther, the barrel alone would have been 512 feet long and weighed 1,665 tons. As the pieces lying around in the lot in Iskandariya illustrated, the barrel was wide enough to fire projectiles "the size of industrial garbage cans," as Mr. Lowther put it.

Estimates on the cost of two planned superguns and a smaller prototype called Baby Babylon range from $25 million to several hundred million dollars. If the big guns had operated as designed, they could have shot a 300-pound projectile 600 miles, or lifted a much larger payload into orbit if it was outfitted with a small rocket engine.

That would have dwarfed the capabilities of conventional artillery pieces and given Mr. Hussein's enormous prestige in the Middle East. Dr. Bull, an engineering genius who had once fired a small projectile more than 100 miles straight up as part of a Canadian research project, always maintained that the supergun had no credible military uses.

That assurance was eventually contradicted by a senior Iraqi defector, Gen. Hussein Kamel al-Majid, who according to a GlobalSecurity.org analysis said the supergun "was meant for long-range attack and also to blind spy satellites."

Still, Lt. Col. James A. Howard, a commander in the Fourth Infantry Division whose unit was shown the Iskandariya scrap yard on a recent day by Mr. Khafaji, who runs a bus factory nearby, the immobility and slow firing rate of the supergun would severely limit its usefulness.

"I think a gun this big would be kind of dumb," Colonel Howard said, speculating that the device could fire at the most a few rounds a year.

Laughing as he walked among the giant pieces, he played the part of Iraqi artillerymen shooting the weapon: "Oops, we missed! Let's try another one."

Iraqi Premier Will Visit Iran To 'Enhance' Ties (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 9 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki plans to visit Iran on Monday to discuss security and political matters with Iranian leaders, his spokesman said Saturday. The visit would be the first by Mr. Maliki to Iran since he took office in late May.

DOJ_NMG_0060781

The visit is expected to last two days. A delegation led by Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister, traveled to Iran last week to pave the way for Mr. Maliki's visit. Mr. Maliki lived for some time in Tehran, the Iranian capital, while in exile during Saddam Hussein's rule.

The purpose of Mr. Maliki's visit is to "enhance relationships between the two countries," his spokesman, Ali al-Dabagh, said in a written statement.

Any relationship between Iraq and Iran should be "based on mutual interests and the respect of the sovereignty of the two countries and noninterference in internal affairs," Mr. Dabagh said.

American and Sunni Arab officials have long accused Iran, a Shiite-ruled country, of interfering in political and military affairs here. Many religious Shiite parties now in power in Iraq, including Mr. Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party, have close ties to Iran. But ordinary Iraqis are generally suspicious of Iran, whose ethnic Persians have traditionally rivaled Arabs for influence in this region.

Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the former prime minister and head of Dawa, visited Iran while he was in office. The head of the main Shiite bloc in Parliament, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, is considered extremely close to Iran's top leaders. His party was founded in Iran and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, fought against Iraq in the eight-year Iran-Iraq war in the 1980's.

On Friday, an Interior Ministry official said Iranian troops had arrested five members of the Iraqi security forces and their interpreter last week while the Iraqis were patrolling the Iraq-Iran border northeast of Baghdad. The official Iranian news agency said seven Iraqis had been captured.

The American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, and American commanders strongly condemned Iranian interference in Iraq last month, saying they had evidence that individuals or groups in Iran were training and supporting Shiite militias here. Mr. Khalilzad said Iranians were urging militia groups to step up attacks against the Americans.

The United States has been pressing Iran over its nuclear program as well. The Bush administration is urging the United Nations Security Council to pass a resolution that would impose economic and political sanctions on Iran if Iran persists in its uranium enrichment program, which the Americans say is intended for the manufacture of nuclear weapons.

But it would be difficult for the White House to persuade Iraq to take a strong stand against Iran. Besides the political ties among Shiite politicians, the border is very porous, and Shiite pilgrims from Iran often come to Iraq to mingle freely in the religious cities here. Iranians helped make up the hundreds of thousands of Shiites, possibly millions, who gathered in the city of Karbala on Saturday to celebrate the birthday of a vanished Shiite imam known as the Mahdi.

Three pilgrims en route to Karbala were killed in the town of Musayyib by a mortar round, an Interior Ministry official said.

In Baghdad, gunmen killed a secretary for a government-financed newspaper, Al Sabah, in a drive-by shooting. A minibus driver was killed when his vehicle exploded. A bomb in a parked car killed a policeman and wounded six others, and another bomb exploding near an American convoy killed one civilian and wounded at least six.

A homemade bomb that was detonated near a bakery in Kirkuk killed three civilians, two of them children, and wounded eight others, all women and children, police officials said. Another bomb in the city killed a policeman and wounded two others.

Iraqi's Trip To Iran Accents An Unsettling Friendship (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki is set to begin a state visit to neighboring Iran on Monday in a trip that would spotlight the close relations between the U.S.-backed government here and a Tehran regime at loggerheads with Washington.

The Iraqi leader plans a two-day visit "to discuss security and political matters and strengthen the relations between the two countries," government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said..

Traditional enemies that warred in the 1980s, Iraq and Iran have grown close since a Shiite-led government with strong links to Tehran won electoral control of Iraq last year.

Shiite mullahs hold the reins of power in Iran, where Sunni Muslims — the other major sect of Islam — are a distinct minority.

Iraqi leaders such as President Jalal Talabani and Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih have made state visits to Iran on diplomatic and trade missions. As prime minister last year, Ibrahim Jafari also visited Tehran. The Iranian government sees a strategic and commercial advantage in courting the new Baghdad leadership.

Maliki's visit would underscore an emerging regional Shiite alliance that deeply troubles the Bush administration and much of the Arab world.

Sunni Muslims rule most Arab lands, where Shiites often are restive minorities. Many Arab leaders fear growth of a Shiite crescent and militancy emanating from the newfound Iraq-Iran friendship.

DOJ_NMG_0060782

The two nations' embrace is an unintended consequence of the U.S.-led toppling of Saddam Hussein, a Sunni Muslim who repressed Iraq's Shiite majority and viewed Persian Iran as a historic and bitter rival.

Shiites' rise to power in Iraq is viewed as signaling a power shift in the Arab world with far-reaching consequences yet unknown.

Today, Iranian products line the shelves of Iraqi shops and Iranians join pilgrimages to Shiite shrines in the Iraqi cities of Najaf and Karbala. Iranian currency even circulates in some Iraqi border towns.

Such commerce and interaction was unheard of during the Hussein regime, which tightly controlled Iranian visitors and influence.

Many Iraqi Shiite lawmakers, including Maliki, have warm relationships with Iran and took refuge there for many years from Hussein's Baath Party dictatorship. Maliki, a longtime Islamist who lived for years in exile in Iran and Syria, is making his first visit to Iran since being elected prime minister in May.

From the standpoint of some in the Bush administration, Iran belongs to what the White House has called "an axis of evil" and is bent on acquiring nuclear weapons and arming militant Shiite groups such as Lebanon's Hezbollah (Party of God), an Iranian client.

U.S. officials suspect that Iran has bankrolled Shiite politicians in Iraq and may be arming powerful Shiite militias, though proof of such aid has not emerged publicly. U.S. field commanders in Iraq regularly refer to armor-piercing roadside bombs as Iranian-made.

Nonetheless, some experts say the Bush administration probably has recognized that Baghdad and Tehran will inevitably grow closer and that fanning anti-Iranian sentiments here could be counterproductive. Moreover, some observers argue, Iran could eventually assist the U.S. agenda in creating a functional Iraqi government.

A greater Iranian role in stabilizing Iraq "seems to me to be a necessary step forward, even if that ultimately means considerable Iranian influence over the government in Baghdad," said Charles A. Kupchan, a professor of international affairs at Georgetown University and former National Security Council director for European affairs. "That influence already exists, and it would be in America's interest to try and support that relationship."

But whether closer ties between Iraq and Iran will ultimately increase stability remains a question.

The Tehran-Baghdad thaw is a major irritant to Iraq's Sunni minority, which fears an Iranian takeover. Iraq's Sunni Arabs, from the man on the street to politicians and insurgents, routinely denounce certain Shiite politicians and clerics as pawns of Iran.

Despite the diplomatic ties, the two oil-rich nations have many differences, and each harbors a certain distrust of the other.

Their distinct ethnic makeups — Iraq is Arab, Iran is Persian — have contributed to their historical rivalries.

Iraqi officials have reported occasional skirmishes along the two nations' long border. Iraq's Ministry of Defense disclosed Friday that Iranian authorities had detained five Iraqi soldiers near the border; no other news was available Saturday on the five.

Meanwhile, sectarian violence continued in Iraq, though authorities reported no major incidents as hundreds of thousands of Shiites descended on the southern shrine city of Karbala for a religious celebration.

Eight people were reported slain in Baqubah, northeast of Baghdad, where, as in the capital, unrelenting civil conflict pits Shiites against Sunnis.

The Associated Press reported six bullet-riddled bodies were found on the streets of Mahmoudiya, a mixed Shiite-Sunni city south of Baghdad that has seen ferocious internecine violence.

And the design director of the state-funded Al Sabah newspaper, Abdul-Kareem Rubaie, was assassinated in a drive-by shooting in Baghdad. That ambush came a few days after a car bomb outside the newspaper's offices killed two and wounded more than two dozen.

Scores of journalists and other media workers have been slain in the Iraq conflict.

Bombs and other attacks in Baghdad and the northern cities of Kirkuk and Baiji killed at least eight and wounded more than a dozen, authorities said.

Iraq Shiite Pilgrims Celebrate Festival (WP/AP)

By Elena Becatoros

The Washington Post/AP, September 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0060783

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Iraq's Sunni Arab vice president renewed his call for Sunni-led insurgents to quickly join the Shiite prime minister's national reconciliation effort, while a Shiite festival that drew millions of pilgrims was held without bloodshed Saturday.

Attacks around Iraq killed at least 12 people, including two gunmen and two would-be bombers. Seven apparent victims of sectarian killings, their bodies all showing signs of torture, also were found dumped on city streets and in a river.

During a meeting with community leaders from a predominantly Sunni Arab district in Baghdad, Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi said it was not too late to stop spiraling sectarian conflict, "as the rules of the game have been changed and problems can't be solved only by weapons."

"This is a call for the Iraqi resistance to think ... and sit around the negotiating table before it's too late," he told about 100 people at Islamic University in the Azamiyah neighborhood. "Differences will devastate Iraq and this division is not to our benefit."

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who announced he will be visiting Iran on Monday for talks on security and bilateral relations, unveiled a 24-point reconciliation plan last month that he hopes will bridge the religious, ethnic and political divisions feeding Iraq's violence.

The plan includes an offer of amnesty to members of the Sunni Arab-led insurgency not involved in terrorist activities, and calls for disarming primarily Shiite sectarian militias.

But no major Sunni Arab insurgent group has publicly agreed to join the plan, and many Shiite militias are controlled by legislators themselves. Car bombings, mortar attacks and shootings have killed hundreds of Iraqis the past few weeks.

Amid worries about sectarian attacks, including an assault by snipers that disrupted a Shiite observance in Baghdad last month, a major security operation was mounted in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, 50 miles south of Baghdad, to protect Saturday's festival observing the birthday of Imam al-Mahdi, a 9th century religious leader.

In most Shiite Muslim sects, Mahdi is considered the last "imam," or leader of the Shiite community. The son of the 11th imam, Hasan al-Askari, he is said to have disappeared in the 9th century. But Shiites believe he is still alive and will one day return as a savior of mankind.

Authorities imposed a four-day vehicle ban in Karbala, while thousands of Iraqi police and soldiers _ backed by air support from the U.S.-led coalition _ fanned out across the city to ward off potential suicide bombers.

Hundreds of people have died in suicide bombings and other attacks in Karbala since Saddam Hussein was ousted in 2003. Suspicion has fallen on Sunni Arab extremist groups, including al-Qaida in Iraq, which consider Shiites to be heretics and collaborators with the Americans.

Many pilgrims walk to Karbala from across Iraq. But while several attacks on processions heading to the city were reported in the days before the festival, the event itself passed off without violence and authorities lifted the vehicle ban Saturday afternoon.

Authorities estimated that 3 million to 4 million pilgrims from across the Arab world, as well as from Iran, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Nepal and India, attended the festival.

The "festival today ended without any incident," Minister of State for National Security Sherwan al-Waili said, thanking Iraqi and coalition forces.

But no day in Iraq goes by without violence.

Two roadside bombs planted near each other exploded as a police foot patrol passed in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing four people and wounding 16, police said.

A parked car bomb struck a U.S. military convoy in eastern Baghdad, killing at least two passers-by and wounding five, police said. The U.S. military said three coalition soldiers were wounded.

Police prevented a suicide car bomber from striking a police station near a mosque in northern Baghdad by shooting the driver before he could reach the building. But the explosives in his car detonated, killing an officer and wounding 10 civilians, the Interior Ministry said.

In the center of the capital, a bomb exploded as a man planted it by the side of a road, killing him and wounding another person.

Authorities found the bullet-riddled bodies of six people dumped on streets in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad, the army said. All had their hands and feet bound and bore signs of torture, a hallmark of sectarian killings that have escalated since a Shiite shrine was bombed in February.

Police also found an unidentified body in the Tigris River in Suwayah, 25 miles south of Baghdad. The blindfolded and bound body had been shot several times, Kut city morgue said.

Why The Numbers Don't Add Up In Iraq (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0060784

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

The Pentagon's fondness for secrecy along with partisan agendas in Baghdad often lead to contortions with death tolls and other details.

BAGHDAD — In this besieged capital, it was a rare good-news story: Killings had plummeted by as much as 50% since U.S. and Iraqi forces hit the streets last month in a show of strength after the sectarian bloodbath of July.

"We're actually seeing progress out there," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief military spokesman here, said when making the announcement.

Not so fast.

Last week, Iraqi officials released new figures showing the city morgue had received more than 1,500 victims of violent death in August — a significant drop of about 17% from the record of more than 1,800 killings in July, but hardly a great leap forward.

How the U.S. military arrived at the 50% figure remains a mystery. Commanders won't release the raw data, saying such specifics could help the enemy.

In the volatile atmosphere of today's Iraq, numbers can lie and statistics can be notional, be they from U.S. or Iraqi sources.

Government agencies here rarely keep reliable statistics. Fear and partisan agendas sway Iraqi officials, making them reluctant to divulge what little data they collect. The U.S. military's fondness for secrecy tends to clash with the brass' demands for "metrics" to quantify any progress.

This tension often leads to curious contortions of numbers and nomenclature.

During weekly news briefings deep inside barricaded compounds, commanders regularly display slick charts, multicolored bar graphs and PowerPoint presentations, all heralding good news.

"One more indicator that operations are in fact reducing the amount of attacks on civilians is shown here on this graph," Caldwell assured reporters the other day, pointing to a bar chart dutifully placed on an easel by a stone-faced uniformed subordinate. But all the numbers had been carefully scrubbed. They were classified.

"We typically characterize trends in ways that do not divulge raw data," explained a military spokesman, Lt. Col. Barry Johnson.

Commanders have consistently declined to say how many civilians have been killed by U.S. forces, although officials have acknowledged tracking the number. Avoiding the Vietnam-era stigma of "body counts," authorities also refuse to divulge "kill" totals for suspected insurgents.

A similar imprecision applies when it comes to describing the enemy.

At the conflict's outset, U.S. officials used phrases such as "dead-enders," Saddam Hussein "loyalists" and "foreign terrorists" in an attempt to label the armed opposition a marginal force.

Gradually, as it became clear that Iraq was in the midst of a protracted guerrilla war, the U.S. military rejected the title "resistance," with its connotations of legitimacy, and settled on "insurgents" or "terrorists" as operative labels.

But the evolving nature of the battle has thrown those terms into question too.

"The core conflict in Iraq [has] changed into a struggle between Sunni and Shia extremists," the Pentagon wrote in an unusually frank report to Congress last month. "Death squads and terrorists are locked in mutually reinforcing cycles of sectarian strife."

Trained and equipped by the U.S. government, Iraq's security forces have been infiltrated by thousands of militiamen loyal to Shiite clerics and factions. There is widespread agreement among military commanders that Shiite militiamen are behind most death squad killings.

The term "death squad" entered public discourse during the dirty wars in Central America to describe clandestine assassins who often plied their trade with the tacit approval of government authorities in the region. But the issue of Shiite death squads is an extremely touchy one for the U.S.-backed, Shiite-dominated government.

Members of the fiercest death squad are allegedly recruited from the Al Mahdi militia, a group under the command of Muqtada Sadr, a virulently anti-U.S. cleric whose supporters are key players in the ruling coalition of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

U.S. officials were reluctant to use the term until July, when Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top military commander here, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a joint statement condemning "in the strongest possible language the recent attacks by terrorists and death squads against innocent Iraqi civilians."

The following day, Caldwell used the term repeatedly when speaking with reporters — but he applied the term to both Sunni and Shiite Arab groups.

"We're really not boring in on what organization they're from," said Col. Michael Shields, commander of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade Combat Team.

DOJ_NMG_0060785

By unmooring death squads from the context of government-backed Shiite militias, U.S. officials have redefined the problem — and avoided a direct confrontation with the U.S.-backed Iraqi leadership.

Like their U.S. colleagues, Iraqi authorities have demonstrated an adroitness with numbers, terms and dates.

A week ago, Mowaffak Rubaie, Iraq's national security advisor, went on television with great fanfare to declare that authorities had arrested Hamed Jumaa Farid Saeedi, allegedly the No. 2 man in Al Qaeda here.

"This is a major blow for Al Qaeda in Iraq," Rubaie declared, trumpeting a story that spread across the globe.

Later in the week, U.S. officials acknowledged that the suspect had been captured more than two months earlier, and had been sitting in detention all that time.

"When Dr. Rubaie said we had just captured him this week, we've gone back and what he really meant was they had just been cleared to announce that he was in fact in captivity," Caldwell told reporters.

The question of Iraqi casualties has also been a contentious one.

Iraqi officials stopped giving out daily death counts more than a year ago, Iraqi authorities said, after government officials decided that the steady stream of casualties was too bleak.

One of the most reliable barometers of the bloodshed here has been the monthly numbers report from the Baghdad morgue, where coffins strapped to car roofs arrive hourly, and residents trying to identify loved ones look through gruesome autopsy photos.

Last week, health officials unveiled a change in morgue policy: All requests for statistics would henceforth be routed through the Health Ministry. Morgue officials who previously provided details have abruptly "retired" or left the country.

Iraqis worry about a sinister turn. Sadr loyalists head the Health Ministry. In effect, Sadr controls an agency in charge of putting out information on killings reportedly committed by his own gunmen.

Even as information sources have been squeezed, Iraqi authorities have cracked down on the media, threatening to close newspapers and TV stations whose reporting falls afoul of the government line. Last week, the Iraqi government closed the widely watched, U.S.-style satellite channel Al Arabiya for a month, dispatching police to the channel's Baghdad offices. The Shiite government charged that the station, based in Sunni-dominated United Arab Emirates, had aired "sectarian" reports.

Even Iraqi officials acknowledge that Al Arabiya's reports about Iraq are more straightforward than dispatches from Al Jazeera, the Qatar-based channel that authorities here considered pro-insurgency and whose Baghdad office was shut down two years ago.

Still, the government Friday issued a public warning — this is the final chance for Al Arabiya to "correct its behavior."

"We have a problem in Iraq with media that is against the Iraqi people," explained Ali Dabbagh, a government spokesman. "They present reports that have a hostile character and try to foment the view that Iraq is about to fall into a sectarian war. This is a problem."

Changing Of The Guard (MJS)

By Bill Glauber And Meg Jones Bglauber@journalsentinel.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 10, 2006

Five years after Sept. 11, state soldiers are working, fighting on new fronts

Five years later, and they are in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan.

Five years later, and they are on the border with Mexico.

Five years later, and they still train for floods, tornadoes and riots, natural disasters and man-made catastrophes.

This is the Wisconsin National Guard and its soldiers and airmen, five years after Sept. 11, 2001.

Remember how the events of that day were supposed to change everything? Did they really? Or did most of us go back to our lives, routines, jobs, families, while war echoed far away?

The Guard and its members were catapulted into a new, more uncertain and violent era. When terrorists flew planes into New York's World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field, they set in motion a chain of events that would transform weekend warriors into global war fighters.

The ripples have been felt throughout the state, in every small-town police force with an officer dispatched overseas, in every office missing a worker who was called up, in every college and technical school whose students traded book bags for M-4 rifles. Not since the Vietnam-era draft have so many Wisconsin neighbors, colleagues and drinking buddies been off to war, or newly returned.

Bloodied in combat, stretched through deployments, its equipment pushed to the limit in searing desert heat, the Guard still stands - battle tested and perhaps battle weary, but in many ways more able to carry out missions and more indispensable.

If you want to know how the Wisconsin National Guard has changed since Sept. 11, you could look at the broad brush strokes of war - seven members of the Guard killed in combat in Iraq, scores more injured, including 43 who received the Purple Heart.

Guard members have rebuilt Iraqi schools and police departments, brought fresh water to impoverished neighborhoods, tried to keep peace in a tinderbox of heaving ethnic rivalries.

"We have effectively mobilized every unit in the Wisconsin National Guard except the band," said Brig. Gen. Kerry Denson, leader of the Wisconsin Army National Guard.

Despite the burden borne by the Guard, recruitment targets have been met, and re-enlistments have risen, officials say. 'How did this happen?'

Yet to truly understand the change in the Wisconsin National Guard, you have to go back to April 9, 2004, around 11:30 p.m., on Baghdad's bleak streets.

It was the moment the war came home, more shockingly than ever, to Wisconsin, the night Michelle Witmer went out on her final patrol.

That night, troops from the 32nd Military Police unit exited Baghdad's well-fortified Green Zone through the terrifyingly named Assassin's Gate. The convoy split - three vehicles turned right to cross a bridge over the Tigris River, and three vehicles moved straight ahead. The unit's mission was to root out local gunmen who occupied a police station.

Inside one of the vehicles that headed straight was Charles E. Crowley of Middleton, a licensed practical nurse and battle-hardened lieutenant, the very definition of a citizen-soldier whose civilian skills could be used in the battlefield.

In an instant, Crowley saw the flash of a rocket-propelled grenade igniting on the curb and heard the unmistakable plink-plink of bullets riddling his armored Humvee. One of the other vehicles was hit and veered sharply right. Crowley's driver shouted, "Get going, get going!" and then rear-ended the limping vehicle, forcing it ahead.

At that moment, as tracer bullets flecked the night sky, Crowley looked up through the hatch to his 20-year-old gunner, Witmer, a bright, ebullient woman with an infectious smile, everyone's little sister.

But that night, Witmer's smile was erased forever.

"She was looking down," Crowley said.

The New Berlin woman was shot in the shoulder area. Crowley took Witmer in his arms, placed her across the back seats of the Humvee and tried to resuscitate her as the convoy raced through a three-block gantlet of high-caliber gunfire, crossed the Tigris River and reached the relative safety of a field artillery base.

Just after midnight, April 10, Witmer was pronounced dead.

Crowley broke the news to the patrol.

"They took it hard," he said. "Obviously, everyone was weeping, pounding stuff, pounding the ground, asking, 'How did this happen? How did this happen?' "

Witmer's death - the first in combat for the Wisconsin National Guard since World War II and the first female Guardsman in the nation to die in battle - marked the Guard's loss of innocence. Father criticizes training

Everyone walking into the Guard's headquarters in Madison passes by Witmer's bronze bust next to the theater named in her honor, a reminder not just of her death, but of six other Guard members killed in action in Iraq. Overall, 61 Wisconsin soldiers, sailors and Marines have been killed in Iraq.

Two Guard deaths this summer symbolized the toll war has taken on the state. One soldier died on his last scheduled mission in Iraq and another died during his first.

The father of one of those soldiers criticized the training and equipment his son's unit received, accusations denied by the Pentagon. Stephen W. Castner, 27, who had just arrived in Iraq, died July 24 after the Humvee he was riding in was struck by a roadside bomb in Tallil.

Scores of Wisconsin National Guard members have been injured, from small cuts to the loss of an eye, shrapnel wounds to brain injuries. Some have suffered post-traumatic stress once they returned to their homes and farms after a year living in a country where death can happen without warning, in the time it takes a heart to beat.

A total of 7,600 soldiers and airmen have been mobilized since Sept. 11, 2001 - 81% of the Wisconsin National Guard. Some were mobilized within hours of the toppling of the Twin Towers. Other Guardsmen waited until this summer for their turn to be deployed. Equipment takes a beating

Equipment has been retrofitted, lost in combat and left behind for other units, a materiel merry-go-round requiring split-second logistics to supply and equip not just soldiers at war, but soldiers prepared to deal with natural disaster at home.

"We're short equipment, and the equipment we're bringing back needs work," Denson said.

But he added, "We've got enough Humvees, 5-ton trucks, 2 1/2 -ton trucks, enough aviation equipment to respond to any (domestic) emergency."

When the Wisconsin Guard deployed for Katrina, for example, there was no shortage of trucks, water tanks, Humvees, wrecker vehicles and fuel tankers, according to those who were part of the mission.

Early on in the Iraq conflict, there were some glaring equipment shortfalls. The 32nd MPs arrived in Baghdad in the summer of 2003 driving soft-skinned Humvees with fiberglass doors and sandbags on the floors. As the insurgency flared, the unit improvised and bought scrap metal off the local market and welded the pieces onto the Humvees - "cowboy armor."

When the up-armored Humvees finally arrived, the unit discovered another problem: they had longer-barreled M-16 rifles, which were difficult to maneuver in the close quarters of the newer Humvees.

The unit eventually left Iraq, and left those armored Humvees for other soldiers but did bring back its share of soft-skinned Humvees. The unit is still using M-16 rifles, but many would prefer the more modern and agile M-4, designed for close-quarter battle.

The maneuver - equipment left, equipment taken - has been repeated many times.

"To be an effective combat force, we're going to have to be re-equipped," Denson said.

But it's not the equipment that makes the Guard unique - it is the people.

All of Wisconsin's 67 communities that are home to National Guard units have seen someone, and in many cases everyone, from their companies and battalions deployed to a war zone.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, 5,716 people have joined the Wisconsin Guard for six-year enlistments, officials said, with the state's Army National Guard currently at 98% strength and the Air National Guard at 105% strength. The authorized strength of the Wisconsin Guard is 9,749, with 7,500 Army soldiers and the rest Air Guard members.

Much to the surprise of commanders, soldiers are staying in the Guard, especially in units that have been called to war.

"We thought we'd have a mass exodus," Denson said.

Instead, the annual attrition rate has been cut - from as high as 24% pre-Sept. 11 to 17% now, officials said. Denson, a helicopter pilot in Vietnam, attributes that to a sense of patriotism and the pride felt by Guard members when they return home to exuberant, flag-waving crowds - a far different reaction from what Vietnam veterans saw. Getting out, staying in

Whether to leave or re-enlist becomes a personal choice.

Anna Gates and Sgt. Carrie Peterson shared a trailer at a base in Tikrit, Iraq, while serving there for 11 months with the 264th Engineer Battalion.

When the deployment ended earlier this year, Gates, a single mom, left the Guard to spend more time with her son, Dylan, now 4, and to receive her degree in criminal justice at her hometown school, the University of Wisconsin-Eau Claire. Gates could have re-enlisted in Iraq and earned a $15,000 bonus.

"Just short of giving away vehicles, they were doing anything they could to get people to stay in," Gates said.

Meanwhile, Peterson, 24, re-enlisted for another six years.

"I plan on doing a lot more with my military career," said Peterson, who attends UW-Eau Claire and lives in an apartment a few doors down from Gates.

Peterson, who recently completed officer candidate school, yearns to become a helicopter pilot.

"I think there is a lot of patriotism," Peterson said. "People when they come back from deployment feel proud they got to be a part of that.

"Some people don't want to leave that part of their life. This is one of the best things that happened to my life." 'Wisconsin International Guard'

In many ways, Crowley, now 42 and a captain, reflects the Guard's experience of the last few years, before and after Sept. 11. He pulls out a sheet of paper that tracks his deployments, from peacekeeping in the former Yugoslavia to rushing to New Orleans with more than 400 other Wisconsin Guardsmen after Hurricane Katrina.

Now, he's the operations officer, one of 22 full-time members of the 54th Civil Support Team, a 24/7 rapid-response team designed to detect weapons of mass destruction.

And then, of course, there is Iraq, the long tour when he was deployed with the 32nd MP unit. In a Baghdad palace where Saddam Hussein's vice president lived until Tomahawk missiles blew giant holes in the roof, the unit created a mini Garden of Eden. Plumbers and electricians hooked up water and power lines, carpenters built bunks and housing. The large swimming pool was scrubbed and filled with clean water. A bunch of the soldiers made up T-shirts that read "We're part of the Wisconsin International Guard."

"No one, including our commander, thought a little MP company from Wisconsin would be deployed to a combat zone in the middle of Baghdad," Crowley said.

But his job was to follow orders, which meant trying to reinvent a local police force in Baghdad, where he was shot at, mortared and bombed.

"I don't know everything of why we were there," he said. "We were given a mission and given objectives. We carried them out."

Crowley carries the scars of combat - a half-moon scar on the back of his head and shrapnel that remains in his arm. They are remnants of an October 2003 blast that leveled a police station and left up to 14 civilians dead and dozens more wounded. Crowley and fellow Guardsmen survived the blast, he said, because of divine intervention. Amid the rubble, a surgeon reattached Crowley's right ear and sutured the head wound.

"It felt as if my whole head and face were on fire," Crowley said.

In the years since, Crowley has coped with his wounds and his memories, coped with being a National Guardsman in the age after Sept. 11, a radically different Guard from the organization he joined in the mid-1990s, when the world seemed a quieter place.

"I don't have any close friendships anymore," he said.

But he has pictures of friends and comrades snapped while on deployment. In his wallet he carries a single photo of a smiling young woman sitting on a building in Iraq. And he carries that woman's name on a wrist bracelet: Michelle Witmer.

"She was so young," he said. "Such a waste." From the Sept. 10, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Wisconsin Pilots Ready To Thwart Air Attack (MJS)

By Meg Jones

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 10, 2006

Weeks after 9-11, Guard responded to threat over U.S.

Madison - If ever there was a time to travel at the speed of sound, this was it.

Commanders at the 115th Fighter Wing received word that two of the Wisconsin Air National Guard's F-16s parked at Truax Field were needed. The reason? Some sort of disturbance on an American Airlines flight en route to O'Hare International Airport.

It was 3 1/2 weeks since passenger planes had been used as weapons, toppling the World Trade Center, smashing a hole in the Pentagon and leaving a giant black groove in the Pennsylvania countryside. What had seemed unthinkable a month before could be happening again.

Lt. Col. Joe Brandemuehl was on duty that day in the command center.

"They said get the jets there as fast as they could. The crews got there as fast as they could, which meant they went supersonic," said Brandemuehl, 45, of Lancaster.

Some southern Wisconsin residents heard sonic booms and saw their windows crack as the F-16s traveled at Mach 1, zooming the equivalent of four football fields per second. At that speed it took the two pilots 10 minutes to reach Chicago and find the American Airlines plane, where a 31-year-old passenger with a history of mental illness had tried to break into the cockpit.

As the Wisconsin jets escorted the airliner to a safe landing at O'Hare, Brandemuehl, a United Airlines pilot as well as a National Guardsman, watched the scene on MSNBC. He breathed a sigh of relief: The Wisconsin F-16 pilots were not forced to shoot down the plane full of people.

The mission of the 115th Fighter Wing changed on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001. The wing of roughly 1,000 airmen switched from one that trained in the U.S. for overseas deployments - such as enforcing the no-fly zones over Iraq - to a first-response unit on call 24/7 that could face enemies in American airspace. Wing members also have been deployed several times to war zones since the war began in Iraq.

"We stood up within those first eight to 10 hours and have never really come off that," said Brig. Gen. Fred Sloan, head of the Wisconsin Air National Guard.

Every hour of every day since then, 115th Fighter Wing airmen have been on duty, ready to scramble any of the unit's 17 jets within minutes. That meant building quarters for pilots and crew members to stay in while they wait to hear the Klaxon horn, changing duty rosters and adding 70 full-time positions.

Now the F-16s are kept in what's called "hot cocked" mode so pilots can jump in, pull the stick back and fly. Inside the crew quarters, it's kept quiet - no incoming calls are allowed - so pilots can rest and stay focused during their 24-hour shifts, which sometimes stretch up to seven consecutive days; even the stove and washer/dryer automatically shut off when the horn sounds.

The 115th Fighter Wing has been scrambled since the October 2001 incident over Chicago, though military officials declined to release details for security reasons. Many of the Air National Guard crew members are also civilian pilots, and it's never far from their minds that should a terrorist hijacking happen again, they could find themselves aiming their missiles at a passenger plane.

"If they were called upon to follow the rules of engagement, they will," said Brandemuehl, the wing's commander, adding that those rules are "designed to protect citizens."

And if communications fail and there's no way to contact a plane, it would be up to military pilots to fly next to the aircraft and find out if there's a threat or if the problem is accidental, such as a rapid decompression, said Lt. Col. Tom Kahle, 40, of Hazel Green.

"We treat ourselves as the last line. Hopefully it will happen like in Britain where it's foiled on the ground," said Kahle, who is on leave from his civilian job as a FedEx pilot. On Sept. 11, 2001, he was flying from Memphis to Houston when his plane filled with packages was grounded as the Federal Aviation Administration shut down the skies.

Now he folds his 6-foot-4 frame into the tight F-16 cockpit, handles scheduling for the fighter wing and takes his turn in the on-call rotation, hoping that his skills as a fighter pilot won't be needed in American airspace.

"It's just an added stress, but it's an honorable one," Kahle said. From the Sept. 10, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Still Touched By War (MJS)

By Bill Glauber

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 10, 2006

Memories, mixed feelings linger for those who served in Iraq

Tony Gatlin can reach out and touch the Iraq war.

It's there, on the basement walls of his tidy suburban home in Oconomowoc, reminders of his 14 months in-country with the 32nd Military Police Company of the Wisconsin National Guard.

Near the bar hang two maps of downtown Baghdad that detail every nook and cranny of the sun-bleached neighborhood where he and his fellow citizen-soldiers patrolled, tried to bring law to a lawless place. On another wall hang three medals - two Purple Hearts and a Bronze Star. There's also an American flag that flew in Iraq.

How often does he think of the war?

"Every day," said Gatlin, 30, a City of Brookfield police officer.

The war has followed thousands of Guardsmen back to Wisconsin. Some can talk with their families and friends about their experiences. Others keep those experiences close, unable to express just what they felt and absorbed during the long months away from home.

They also have their opinions about how the war is going, what the stakes are and whether America should keep the troops in Iraq.

"I don't know what people expect sometimes," Gatlin said. "How long did it take this country to get it right, hundreds of years? You've got a culture that has been fighting for eons."

Gatlin is a doer. In Iraq, other units might have waited for sandbags. Not Gatlin's. He and his troops hauled 150-pound slabs of concrete up three flights to create fighting positions in a burned-out Baghdad palace.

"That's the attitude you have to have, otherwise you're a victim," he said. "Just grab your bootstraps and get the job done because otherwise you're just a statistic. And nobody in my unit is going to be a statistic."

He calls his attitude a military mind-set, and it colors his view on what the United States should do now in Iraq.

"You commit to doing a job and you see it through," he said. "That's what we're doing. You liberate millions of people and you see it through so they can stand on their own two feet."

But he said Iraqis need to take responsibility for their country's future.

"You can only lead them so far," he said. "You take the training wheels off their bike, they might crash, but you know they'll get the hang of it."

When something happens in Iraq, Wisconsin soldiers feel it at home.

In February, insurgents blasted the golden dome of the Askariya mosque in Samarra, one of Shiite Islam's holiest shrines.

"Why would you want to do a thing like that?" said Bob Randall, a farmer from Soldiers Grove who joined the Guard in 1988 and deployed to Iraq with the 1st Battalion, 128th Infantry. Randall's unit was stationed in Samarra for a year, guarding the main thoroughfare that pilgrims traveled to visit the sparkling Askariya mosque.

To Randall, a sergeant, the mosque was a vision of beauty amid a harsh landscape.

"We came from rural Wisconsin, rural America, where we trust everybody," he said. "We keep the keys in our vehicles at home. And over there you could trust nobody."

Some soldiers lost a lot in Iraq. Friends were killed, illusions shattered.

"There were times I thought, 'Why are we here?' They were blowing up their own people," said Troy Davis of Lancaster, a former member of the 1st Battalion 128th Infantry. Davis, a construction worker, recently left the Guard.

Davis and Randall shared a difficult tour that began harshly, with the death of Staff Sgt. Todd Olson of Loyal, who died Dec. 27, 2004, from injuries he suffered in a roadside bomb blast, leaving behind a wife, daughter and three sons. The three men, all in their 30s, were friends who bonded during training. Davis and Randall were on the same foot patrol and heard the bomb that killed their buddy.

"I think a lot of times how close I came to getting hurt and not coming home," Davis said. "I try to be a strong man. And then I think Todd is never going to be with his boys."

Capt. Scott Southworth, Juneau County's district attorney, commanded the 32nd MP unit during its 14-month tour of Iraq. Southworth said there were moments of horror in Iraq, when comrades died and civilians were murdered.

And yet, he also recalls moments of small triumphs, training Iraqi police in the fine arts of investigation, interrogation and incarceration.

"Those were the moments when you said, 'I'm doing something, helping the Iraqi police service move from dictatorship to democracy,' " he said. "You feel relevant."

The war remains close. Southworth cares for an Iraqi orphan named Ala'a, 11, now a fifth-grader with a growing command of English.

Southworth hears growing dissent about the war, understands the passions on both sides, but also wants to tell those who ask him why it is important for American troops to remain in the country.

"We took out their government, and when we did that, with that act, we accepted a responsibility to make sure that the government that came after was stable enough and they didn't fall into a civil war," he said. "If we leave now, we will have condemned hundreds of thousands of people to their death. And that blood will be on our hands as Americans, period. That's a pretty harsh statement, but it is the reality."

Others, though, are not convinced that American troops should remain long.

"I'm a little torn on my thoughts on how long we should stay there," said Anna Gates, who served 11 months in Iraq with the 264th Engineer Battalion. "I know we're helping them, but we're going to need help at home, too."

Troy Stoneberg, a combat medic who served in Iraq for 11 months with the 1st Battalion, 128th Infantry, tries to avoid watching news about Iraq.

"I think it's clear that it's getting worse over there," he said.

Stoneberg's medical unit treated civilians in villages near a massive U.S. air base.

"I think we did a good job over there," he said. "But when you look back you ask, 'What was the purpose?' Our guys did humanitarian support, but in the grand scheme of things, did it matter?" From the Sept. 10, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

At Least 40 Insurgents Killed In Afghanistan (WP/AP)

By Rahim Faiez, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan, Sept. 9 -- NATO and Afghan soldiers killed at least 40 suspected Taliban fighters in fierce raids that destroyed insurgent hideouts and a weapons factory, the European military alliance said Saturday. One NATO soldier also died.

The insurgents were killed late Friday and early Saturday in Kandahar province's Panjwai district, where an anti-Taliban operation was launched Sept. 2. The latest deaths brought to at least 320 the number of suspected insurgents reported killed by NATO in Operation Medusa.

A NATO spokesman, Maj. Scott Lundy, said the casualty count was based on reports from troops viewing the battlefield through weapons sights and other devices.

In Kabul, thousands of people joined Afghan President Hamid Karzai at a memorial ceremony marking the fifth anniversary of the assassination of Ahmed Shah Massoud, a mujaheddin commander who had battled the Taliban. Massoud was killed in an al-Qaeda suicide bombing in northern Afghanistan two days before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0060791

"Massoud was a great martyr for this land, and like him, today, each son of this country is ready to sacrifice his life to make the nation free," Karzai said in a speech. "We are still not free, and our nation's children are still being sacrificed, like yesterday in Kabul when more people were martyred in a terrorist attack."

Massoud was the most famous of the mujaheddin commanders who fought the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan during the 1980s, and he later led the resistance to the Taliban after the religious militia seized power in 1996.

The ceremony came a day after a car bombing in Kabul killed at least 16 people, including two American soldiers, in the deadliest suicide attack in the Afghan capital since U.S.-led forces overthrew the Taliban for harboring al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

In the south, NATO said that alliance and Afghan troops destroyed three insurgent positions, a bomb factory and a weapons cache in battles that killed more than 40 militants in Panjwai, a district west of Kandahar city that has long been regarded as a Taliban stronghold.

One NATO soldier was killed Saturday, the alliance said in a statement. The soldier's nationality was not released, but Canadian forces are leading the Panjwai push, and at least five Canadian soldiers have been killed since the operation began.

NATO Forces Kill More Than 40 Taliban (WP/AP)

By Noor Khan

The Washington Post/AP, September 10, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan -- NATO and Afghan forces killed more than 40 militants Saturday on the fifth anniversary of the death of a legendary mujahedeen commander killed by al-Qaida days before the Sept. 11 attacks.

The insurgents were killed in Kandahar province's Panjwayi district as part of an anti-Taliban operation launched Sept. 2. The latest deaths brought the number of suspected militants claimed killed by NATO in Operation Medusa to at least 320.

The anti-insurgent blitz came as a top NATO general said he would ask alliance members Monday to provide up to 2,500 more soldiers to combat Afghanistan's deadliest spate of violence since the Taliban regime was ousted in late 2001.

In Kabul, thousands of people attended a memorial ceremony marking the fifth anniversary of the assassination of mujahedeen leader Ahmad Shah Massood, who died in an al-Qaida suicide bombing in northern Afghanistan two days before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on America.

"Massood was a great martyr for this land and like him, today, each son of this country is ready to sacrifice his life to make the nation free," President Hamid Karzai said in a speech. "We are still not free and our nation's children are still being sacrificed like yesterday in Kabul when more people were martyred in a terrorist attack."

Massood fought the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan during the 1980s, and later led the resistance to the Taliban after the Islamic militia seized power in 1996.

In the anti-Taliban push, NATO and Afghan have pounded insurgents in Panjwayi with airstrikes, artillery and mortars in one of the most intense military confrontations since the campaign that toppled the Islamist regime.

The operation comes amid concerns that NATO lacks enough troops to succeed in its mission. In Poland, Gen. Ray Henault, chief of NATO's military committee, said he would formally ask the alliance's 26 member states on Monday to provide the additional 2,500 troops.

NATO, which took command in the south from a U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1, has deployed about 8,000 mostly British, Canadian and Dutch forces. It has about 20,000 forces nationwide.

In the latest fighting, NATO said it had destroyed three insurgent positions, a bomb-making factory and a weapons cache in the battles that killed more than 40 militants. One NATO soldier was killed Saturday. The soldier's nationality was not immediately released.

Canadian forces are leading the Panjwayi push and have had at least five soldiers killed since the operation began.

A NATO spokesman, Maj. Scott Lundy, said the casualty count was based on reports from troops viewing the battlefield through weapons sights and other devices.

In all, the alliance has reported 330 militant deaths since the Operation Medusa began. NATO's count has been strongly disputed by a Taliban commander and has not been independently verified. Reporters cannot access the site of the fighting.

Troops now occupy parts of Panjwayi and neighboring Zhari district and reopened a section of highway that had been closed to civilian traffic during the operation, NATO said.

"There is severe pressure on the insurgents remaining in the area, which will continue until they are either defeated or choose reconciliation through surrender," said Canadian Brig. Gen. David Fraser, commander of NATO forces in southern Afghanistan.

In Rome, Italian Premier Romano Prodi said Italian troops will remain in Afghanistan despite calls by some government allies for withdrawal after four Italian soldiers were wounded Friday.

NATO Commanders To Meet On Afghan Troops (WP/AP)

By Monika Scislowska

The Washington Post/AP, September 10, 2006

WARSAW, Poland -- NATO will hold two more conferences aimed at pushing member states to commit more troops to the alliance's mission in Afghanistan as it faces tough resistance from insurgents there, a spokesman said Saturday.

Military leaders decided after two days of closed-door discussions in the Polish capital that further efforts were needed to plug shortfalls in the force, which has faced increased violence from a resurgent Taliban along Afghanistan's southern border, NATO spokesman Col. Brett Boudreau told The Associated Press.

Earlier Saturday, Gen. Ray Henault, chairman of the NATO military committee, said he would appeal formally to the alliance's council Monday for member states to commit another 2,000-2,500 soldiers to confront the Taliban guerrillas.

NATO military leaders also will hold further conferences on Wednesday and Friday to address the issue of the shortfall of troops in southern Afghanistan and urge member states to live up to the numbers they had pledged to the mission, Boudreau said. Commitments to other missions also will be discussed.

Last week, alliance commander Gen. James L. Jones called for extra troops and aircraft to be sent to southern Afghanistan, where NATO relieved U.S.-led troops one month ago.

But the appeals were running into donor fatigue from several key NATO members, many of whom have indicated they had reached the limit of their capabilities.

"Afghanistan is the most complex mission NATO has ever undertaken," Henault said. "Our collective assessment is that we are satisfied with the military-related progress to date, particularly in the north and the west, but less so in the south, where it's been more difficult."

Henault said only 85 percent of forces required for the mission have been supplied by the member nations so far.

That was "considered acceptable by the commanders ... to undertake the level of mission activity that they had anticipated ... until they discovered the intensity of the resistance" from Taliban forces, he said.

The NATO military leaders' conference on Wednesday will "look to obtain the people and the equipment required to bring that 85 percent as close to 100 percent as possible," Boudreau said.

The second meeting will "look at addressing a shortfall in the immediate requirement and for subsequent rotation of forces" that the alliance has on other missions.

Some 20,000 NATO soldiers and a similar number of U.S. forces in Afghanistan face an emboldened Taliban insurgency that demonstrates how shaky Afghanistan's Western-backed government remains.

Jones is seeking reinforcements for the 8,000 mainly British, Canadian and Dutch troops that took over the region in August. Fighting since then has left at least 35 NATO troops and hundreds of militants dead.

Ex-Taliban Chief Details Massood Killing (AP)

By Matthew Pennington, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

The beat-up video camera was delivered to Afghanistan in a box, and picked up by two clean-shaven Arabs posing as journalists. They met with Osama bin Laden before leaving on their mission — to kill mujahedeen hero Ahmad Shah Massood.

Five years after the Taliban opponent was slain by a bomb hidden in the camera, a former Taliban official on Saturday described how al-Qaida staged the killing — two days before the Sept. 11 attack on America — hoping to strike a fatal blow to the pro-U.S. Northern Alliance.

Waheed Mozhdah, director of the then-Taliban Foreign Ministry's Middle East and Africa department, also showed The Associated Press a copy of what he said was a signed letter dated Sept. 13, 2001, from bin Laden to Taliban leader Mullah Omar, urging him to launch an offensive against the alliance.

In the letter, written in Arabic, bin Laden said that if America failed to respond to the Sept. 11 attacks, it would decline as a superpower. But if the U.S. started fighting, he added, its economy would suffer a major blow and it would face the same destiny as the Soviet Union — whose ill-fated 1980s occupation of Afghanistan heralded its disintegration.

Few details have emerged previously about how al-Qaida plotted to murder Massood, the "Lion of Panjshir" who fought Soviet troops and led resistance to the Taliban regime. At the time, his Northern Alliance was under siege, barely clinging to a mountainous northern corner of the country.

But the U.S. military campaign after Sept. 11 to punish the Taliban for giving refuge to bin Laden propelled Massood's supporters to power, and the bearded commander has achieved iconic status. Giant portraits of him adorn government offices and public spaces in Kabul, and the Sept. 9 anniversary of his death is marked in grand style.

President Hamid Karzai on Saturday addressed a crowd of thousands at a Kabul stadium attending an official Massood commemoration.

"They came from outside to kill him. They put a bomb inside a camera pretending they wanted to interview him. Why did they kill him? Because he said they would defeat them," he said.

The attackers apparently were North African Arabs traveling on forged Belgian passports who managed to pass through the front line between the warring Taliban and Northern Alliance carrying their bomb.

"We never suspected journalists. Our leaders were careless," said Massood Khalili, a former Massood adviser who was seriously wounded in the blast.

One of the Arabs died in the bombing. The other, who survived the blast, was shot dead by enraged bodyguards.

Mozhdah said bin Laden appeared to hint at the plot during a meeting with Taliban Information Minister Amir Khan Muttaqi in the southern city of Kandahar — the seat of the ousted Taliban regime — just after the Islamic fasting month of Ramadan in 2000.

Citing an account provided by a translator at the meeting, Mozhdah said bin Laden complained to Muttaqi about Taliban restrictions that prevented al-Qaida from contacting the media. "My hands are tied behind my back and my mouth is taped shut," an annoyed bin Laden reportedly said.

When Muttaqi blamed international pressure — including sanctions — facing the Taliban regime for hosting al-Qaida bases and fighting the Northern Alliance, bin Laden thought for a while before replying, Mozhdah said.

"I know your difficulties. I'm looking at how to solve your problem," the al-Qaida leader said, without elaborating, according to Mozhdah.

Mozhdah said that the following spring — he was unsure of the precise date — a parcel from Pakistan was received at an official media office used by al-Qaida and the Taliban in Kandahar.

The box looked new, but it contained a rather old-looking video camera, Mozhdah said, and the computer technician at the office expressed puzzlement about it. A day later, he said, it was picked up by an al-Qaida official accompanied by two Arabs with shaven faces — a curious sight in Taliban-dominated Afghanistan, where men were made to wear beards.

The Arabs, known to Mozhdah only as Karim and Arbet, subsequently had the camera while purportedly taping an interview with Taliban Foreign Minister Abdul Wakil Mutawakil but never gave a requested copy to him, he said.

Mozhdah said the Arabs later met with bin Laden, top deputy Ayman al-Zawahri and Mullah Omar, who gave them a warm send-off before they flew to Kabul. There, he said, the Foreign Ministry gave them a letter of permission to cross the front line into Northern Alliance-held territory in the Panjshir Valley, Massood's domain north of the capital.

To win acceptance on the other side, the journalists had an introduction from an Islamic group in London to Abdul Rasul Sayyaf, a Northern Alliance commander in Panjshir with strong contacts to Arab mujahedeen from the days of the Soviet resistance, said Abdullah Abdullah, another close associate of Massood.

Abdullah, who served as Afghan foreign minister until earlier this year, said this facilitated the Arabs' entry into Panjshir. Sayyaf hoped their report could help the alliance's standing in the Muslim world but also warned the commander at the front line, Bismullah Khan, now chief of Afghan army staff, "to be watchful of them," Abdullah said.

Abdullah said he saw the Arabs in Panjshir about 20 days before the assassination.

"It was a very brief encounter. When I wind my mind back, I remember their gaze was one of hatred," he said.

The journalists waited for a chance to speak with Massood. When the opportunity came, at his redoubt in the town of Khodja Bahauddin, they had 15 questions — eight of them about bin Laden.

Khalili, now the Afghan ambassador to Turkey, said that as the camera supposedly began rolling, he started to translate the first question for Massood from English — "What is the situation in Afghanistan?" — when a fireball ripped through the room.

Massood died, and Khalili spent seven days in a coma.

The death wasn't reported for six days, in fear of undermining the Northern Alliance. By the time of the announcement, the Sept. 11 attacks had transformed the world. Two months later, Massood's once beleaguered forces routed the Taliban with the support of U.S. air power.

Air Force Officer Leaves Kyrgyzstan (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0060794

MOSCOW, Sept. 9 — A United States Air Force officer who had been missing in Kyrgyzstan for more than three days was flown from the Central Asian country early Saturday, the Air Force said, while the investigation into her disappearance continued.

The officer, Maj. Jill M. Metzger, 33, was found alive late Friday night outside Bishkek, the Kyrgyz capital, and was taken to the hospital by the police, the Kyrgyz authorities said. The Air Force swiftly claimed her and returned her to Manas Air Base, where she had been stationed as a personnel officer.

The American Embassy in Bishkek said in a statement that it appeared she had been abducted but that the investigation had not ended. After determining that her medical condition was stable, her command flew her to an undisclosed location.

The air base declined to disclose the nature of any injuries she might have, citing privacy concerns, but said her blond hair had been cut and darkened. The Air Force also expressed relief that she had been found, but noted that many questions remained.

"The first thing is that we're excited that she's alive and that we're going to be able to send her back to her family and friends," said Capt. Anna Carpenter, an air base spokeswoman. "The second thing is that we're going to find out what happened to her."

Since the major disappeared on Sept. 5, just days before she was scheduled to return to the United States, her case has confounded investigators. Her reappearance added new layers of mystery.

Major Metzger vanished in civilian clothes while on an off-duty shopping trip with co-workers at a department store in central Bishkek.

Kyrgyz police officials said the store's security videotapes recorded her walking out of the store alone. They also said her cellphone records showed she had called numbers outside Bishkek and that witnesses said she traveled by car to a bus station on the capital's eastern side.

Bishkek is not generally considered dangerous, and northern Kyrgyzstan, where Manas Air Base is situated and whose population is almost unfailingly friendly to outsiders, is far from the combat zones in Afghanistan that the air base supports.

But members of the military stationed at Manas are allowed to leave the base only with permission and in groups; once off-base they are expected to remain in pairs.

Her departure from her co-workers, by the Kyrgyz description, would appear to violate those rules and clash with her professional reputation.

Major Metzger, the daughter of a retired Air Force colonel, married an Air Force captain this year. She has been described by the Air Force as an accomplished officer and a disciplined, standout athlete who specialized in running marathons.

No breakthrough occurred until Friday night, when the major surfaced in Kant, a town east of the capital. The Kyrgyz Interior Ministry said in a statement that she appeared about 11:45 p.m. at a residence there, and, speaking in broken Russian, told a family that she had been kidnapped.

The police picked her up, the statement said, and found her disheveled and with a scratch on her forehead and another on her neck, but without serious injury. She was then treated at the hospital before being picked up by an Air Force team.

Police officials have said that no one has claimed to have kidnapped her, and there were no calls for ransom or political demands surrounding her disappearance. There were no immediate signs that she had been robbed and no arrests in the case.

Speaking to reporters in Bishkek, Kyrgyz law enforcement officials presented a variety of contradictory accounts of her disappearance and re-emergence, further confusing the case.

Captain Carpenter declined to comment on the Kyrgyz statements, and said the Air Force was conducting an investigation of its own.

U.S. Officer Tells of Being abducted (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

MOSCOW, Sept. 9 -- A U.S. Air Force major who disappeared while on an off-base trip in Kyrgyzstan, where she was stationed, surfaced late Friday and reported that she had been abducted, U.S. and Kyrgyz officials said Saturday.

Maj. Jill Metzger, 33, walked out of a department store in the capital, Bishkek, on Tuesday and vanished, setting off a nationwide search in which more than 20 U.S. agents participated.

Air Force Maj. Jill Metzger's report of a kidnapping is still under investigation. (AP)

Late Friday evening, Metzger showed up at a house in the town of Kant, about 20 miles from the capital. Accounts about what had happened to her were fragmentary, and the U.S. Embassy said in a statement that "it now appears that Major Metzger had been abducted."

Metzger was stationed at a U.S. base in Kyrgyzstan, a former Soviet republic in Central Asia, that is used to support operations in Afghanistan. Air Force officials said she was in stable condition and had been flown to another base in the region.

"Her condition will be determined by a team of medical professionals," the military said in a statement. "The investigation concerning her disappearance is continuing."

A Kyrgyz police official, Kemilbek Kiyazov, told the Associated Press that Metzger had given a dramatic account of being kidnapped.

According to Kiyazov, Metzger said that while she was shopping at a department store in Bishkek, someone placed an object in her back pocket with a note saying it was a bomb and telling her to go to an address in Bishkek.

Metzger went to the address "as if she were in a trance," Kiyazov said. Three men and a woman then forced her into a van and took her to a house in a rural area outside the capital.

Other Kyrgyz officials, speaking to reporters on condition of anonymity, said they found her story baffling.

Metzger was on a shopping trip with other U.S. personnel who reported her missing after she failed to meet up with them for the return trip to the base. She reportedly does not speak any of the major local languages, Kyrgyz, Russian or Uzbek. And investigators said they determined that she appeared to have left the store of her own volition.

Metzger, who is permanently assigned to Moody Air Force Base in Georgia, had nearly completed a four-month tour in Kyrgyzstan and was scheduled to ship out Friday. Military officials said she had recently married and was planning to join her husband on a belated honeymoon.

On Friday night, Kyrgyz officials said, she turned up in Kant exhausted and with her hair dyed brown. Kiyazov told the AP that Metzger's hands were stained with dye. It was unclear how Metzger eluded her kidnappers.

Metzger's father-in-law, Kelly Mayo, told the AP in Colorado Springs that the Air Force's Office of Special Investigations said she was found on the side of a road with her head shaved. He suggested that she may have suffered some physical injuries. U.S. officials have not provided any details on what Metzger has said to them.

U.S. Major 'Stable' After Reported Kidnapping (WT/AP)

By Leila Saralayeva, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan -- A U.S. Air Force officer who went missing for three days said someone stuffed an object in her jeans pocket with a note saying it was bomb and telling her to go to a site in Bishkek, where kidnappers grabbed her, Kyrgyz authorities said yesterday.

They said Maj. Jill Metzger reported feeling as if she were in a trance as she followed the instructions.

U.S. officials said the 33-year-old officer was in "stable condition" after she turned up Friday night and had been moved to another American base in the region.

Maj. Metzger disappeared Tuesday in Bishkek, capital of this former Soviet state in Central Asia, while shopping at the TsUM department store for souvenirs before a scheduled departure from the country Friday.

Her disappearance touched off an extensive search by Kyrgyz police and by U.S. military personnel, including 22 special agents.

But no trace was found until late Friday when Maj. Metzger knocked on the door of a house in Kant, a town about 22 miles from Bishkek, and told its residents she had been abducted, Kyrgyz Deputy Interior Minister Omurbek Suvanaliyev said.

Military officials said Maj. Metzger was a newlywed and had been scheduled to travel with her husband to Jamaica for a belated 10-day honeymoon.

Maj. Metzger told Kyrgyz police she had been abducted by three young men and a woman in a minibus and held in a rural area about 30 miles from the capital, Mr. Suvanaliyev said.

Kemilbek Kiyazov, chief of the Chuysk regional police department, said, "Her first testimony was that when she split up with her group in the department store, someone put a hard object and a note saying it was an explosive in a back pocket of her jeans.

"In the note there were also detailed instructions about where to go and what to do. Metzger says it was as if she were in a trance and fulfilling someone else's wishes."

Mr. Kiyazov said the major reported that she was met by three men and a woman who put her into a vehicle, took her to a house and placed her in a dark room. He quoted her as saying she managed to escape after an abductor brought her food and she struck him.

Mr. Kiyazov, who said he talked with Maj. Metzger, said her blondish hair had been dyed dark brown and her hands were stained with dye.

Capt. Anna Carpenter, a spokeswoman at the U.S. air base at Bishkek's Manas airport, where Maj. Metzger had been temporarily stationed, said the major was in "stable condition."

DOJ_NMG_0060796

Maj. Metzger was taken several hours later to another base in the region, Capt. Carpenter said, but declined to say where. Manas is the only U.S. base in Kyrgyzstan.

Maj. Metzger was serving a four-month stint with the 376th Air Expeditionary Wing at Manas. She had been scheduled to return Friday to her regular post at Moody Air Force Base in Georgia.

Maj. Metzger's father-in-law, Kelly Mayo, said her husband, Air Force Capt. Joshua Mayo, was overjoyed when he was told Friday that his wife had been found.

"I can't even describe it. He's just beside himself, just unbelievable joy," Mr. Mayo said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Backdating Is Seen As Option In Tech Realm (LAT)

By Tom Petruno And Chris Gaither, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Silicon Valley probes are targeting practices that many consider legitimate means to advance firms' goals.

SAN FRANCISCO — Gregory Reyes was facing a personnel crisis. The executive he had just hired for a top sales job at his Silicon Valley company suddenly was threatening to jump to a competitor.

So Reyes, then chief executive of computer networking firm Brocade Communications Systems Inc., decided to offer the recruit a much bigger pay package. Instead of options to buy 285,000 Brocade shares — the initial offer — Reyes anted up 500,000.

He didn't stop there, according to federal prosecutors. They say Reyes dangled a sweetener: The purchase price of the options would be fudged — "backdated" — so that the employee would have an immediate paper profit of $2.5 million on the shares.

The government says that was a crime, one that could put Reyes behind bars for 20 years if the charges stick. And more executives could find themselves joining Reyes in court dockets, as prosecutors and securities regulators examine past option grants at more than 100 companies nationwide, most of them technology firms.

The widening probe is of particular concern in the nation's tech center — Silicon Valley and the San Francisco Bay Area — where options have long been the coin of the realm. At least 30 firms in the area have disclosed federal inquiries.

But even as the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission bear down in their investigations, there is a sense of disbelief among many in the tech sector that companies' option practices of the last decade have literally become a federal case.

"Clearly, they did something wrong, but it's very different from a WorldCom or Enron situation, where it appeared the fraud was just to fleece investors," said Tom LaWer, an executive compensation lawyer in East Palo Alto. "It seems as if there was a bit of laziness and stupidity involved."

In the hard-charging entrepreneurial culture of Silicon Valley, the creative use of stock options to reward favored employees is seen by many as a reasonable means to further a company's goals — not the basis of a criminal conspiracy.

"I'm reluctant to read a gigantic morality tale into this," said Paul Kedrosky, a former tech stock analyst who now runs the von Liebig Center for Entrepreneurism and Technology Advancement at UC San Diego. "It's more like speeding on the highway. Everyone saw other people doing it and thought it was OK."

That doesn't wash with many big investors and corporate governance experts, who note that the crux of the government's concern is that executives flat-out lied to shareholders and handed out unauthorized stock wealth to colleagues and to themselves.

To some critics, it's no surprise that the tech industry is playing a starring role in the option scandal. Silicon Valley has long had a reputation for being disdainful of outside shareholders' demands for accountability.

"They thought they lived by different rules," said Jeffrey Sonnenfeld, a professor of management at Yale and founder of the Chief Executive Leadership Institute in Atlanta. "They said e-governance was different."

A stock option is the right to buy shares for a set amount — the exercise price — within a certain period of time. For the tech industry, options were a favored compensation tool beginning in the 1980s because many up-and-coming firms couldn't afford to pay big salaries to workers. Stock was the logical alternative.

A key argument for using options as a carrot has been that they aligned workers' interests with those of shareholders. With skin in the game, employees would have a greater incentive to work hard and boost sales and earnings, thus driving up the share price.

With the tech industry boom and rocketing stock prices of the late 1990s, options became the most coveted currency of Silicon Valley.

"The temper of the time was equity uber alles," Kedrosky said. "The whole game was stock, which was totally motivated by the perception that stock had unlimited upside and the upside happened within six months."

If the market price of a firm's shares soared, an employee with vested options could immediately sell and haul in a handsome capital gain.

But from shareholders' viewpoint, a crucial feature of options is that the exercise price normally is the stock's final market price the day the option is granted by company directors. In other words, there is no built-in gain for the employee when options are awarded.

It now is clear that some companies in fact awarded options that already were profitable, or "in the money," at least on paper.

"The whole point is to incentivize performance" via options, said Carol Bowie, director of governance at the Investor Responsibility Research Center, a Washington-based group that counsels institutional investors on governance issues. "If you're giving in-the-money options, that defeats the purpose."

Investigators are focusing largely on so-called backdating, which at its most extreme amounts to looking back on the calendar and cherry-picking the most favorable recent prices for option grants.

Backdating itself isn't illegal, as long as it's disclosed to shareholders. Over the last decade, however, most companies repeatedly assured shareholders that options were granted only at market prices, not at discounts, said Patrick McGurn, a corporate governance expert at investor advisory firm Institutional Shareholder Services.

For most of that period, he noted, the tech industry also fought aggressively to beat back proposals from accounting regulators and shareholder activists to require the formal expensing of stock options in corporate financial statements. The industry said such expensing would unfairly shrink companies' reported profits.

Now, with dozens of firms acknowledging backdating, many have been forced to reduce previously reported earnings. That's because the granting of discounted options understated expenses and overstated profit.

But was backdating premeditated fraud or something more akin to cutting corners?

Some tech veterans say there could be legitimate explanations for some of the pricing disparities that companies, and the government, are finding as they review past option grants.

John Duncan, a tax lawyer in Silicon Valley during the dot-com heyday, said option paperwork might have often languished on administrators' desks, or corporate officers might have known they had decided to grant options sometime in the prior weeks but couldn't remember exactly when.

So option program administrators may have just picked the most favorable recent date to price the awards, figuring it wouldn't make much difference if their companies' shares rose over the long run, said Duncan, now general counsel for Slide Inc., a San Francisco-based Internet company.

"Silicon Valley entrepreneurs dramatically undervalue the headaches and issues of paperwork and are so optimistic about the upward movement of stocks that they blind themselves as to whether these things really could hurt somebody," he said. "My guess is the vast majority saw it as a gray area."

Paperwork mistakes form the basis of Reyes' defense in the case the Justice Department and SEC brought against him and another former Brocade executive, Stephanie Jensen, in late July.

"Any variance between the date Mr. Reyes granted stock options and company documentation is the result of paperwork processing delays and/or administrative errors," said Richard Marmaro, his attorney.

The government accused Reyes and Jensen of routinely backdating option grants from 2000 through 2004. The two pleaded not guilty Aug. 30.

If proper accounting for options was gray to some companies, however, there was only black or white for Silicon Valley's two most prominent companies: Chip giant Intel Corp. and computer networking titan Cisco Systems Inc. say unequivocally that they never engaged in option backdating.

That is a blow to attempts to defend the practice by contending that it was accepted throughout the tech industry.

Another defense offered by some in Silicon Valley — although few will attach their names to it — is that fudging option prices was good for shareholders because it kept valuable employees on board.

Mark Jaffe, president of executive recruiting firm Wyatt & Jaffe, said he believed that some tech executives who backdated options convinced themselves that " 'I didn't do it for myself. I did it to hold my team together, I did it to maintain integrity and the continuity of executive staff, I did it so the employees didn't lose morale,' and so on."

But in the Brocade case and a case filed against Comverse Technology Inc. of New York, the SEC alleges that top executives backdated not only employees' options but their own — belying the idea that personal enrichment wasn't a motive.

"This was a fairly widespread situation of at best poor judgment and at worst unmitigated greed," said Bowie of the Investor Responsibility Research Center.

Prosecutors take the low road in their grab for the assets of the late Ken Lay's estate

The Justice Department is asking for lightning-swift passage of a federal law that would prevent Ken Lay's lawyers from having the late Enron founder's criminal record wiped clean. The prosecution appears poised to give up the high ground — the trial's noble pursuit of justice — for the low road of an ill-considered, desperate grab at the estate's assets.

In May, Lay was convicted in two separate cases of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks. But before final judgment in the case, Lay died of heart disease while vacationing in Aspen, Colo. According to a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruling from 2004, a defendant who hasn't had the benefit of a full appeal should have his conviction nullified.

However, there is $43.5 million standing between federal prosecutors' acceptance of this legal precedent and their waging an unseemly battle with a dead man's estate.

Lay is no hero in death. His victims will not forget his complicity in Enron's destruction in 2001. His actions helped destroy a company, wipe out thousands of employees' jobs and retirement savings, and convert some $60 billion in stock value into practically worthless shares.

Lay's demise does nothing to diminish his victims' financial claims. Neither does the former CEO's death prevent victims from continuing to seek justice. In fact, their legal demands are proceeding apace in civil court, the better venue at this point for this pursuit. The government pleadings cite both forfeiture and restitution as the rationale for carrying on with what now must be seen as a pointless raid on Lay's assets. As a civil matter, all aggrieved parties, including the government, can have their day in court.

In fact, contends Nancy Rappoport, former dean of the University of Houston Law Center and co-editor of Enron: Corporate Fiascos and Their Implications, prosecutors' dogging of the Lay estate will drain assets otherwise available to compensate victims.

"They are making matters worse for everybody, and they are not keeping their eye on the ball," Rappoport said. "Prosecutors have a highly developed sense of right and wrong. They are frustrated that Lay cheated the system out of his just punishment."

The government's Hail Mary pass to Congress is a testament to the weakness of its case. On Wednesday, federal prosecutors asked U.S. District Judge Sim Lake to wait until Oct. 23 — what would have been Lay's sentencing date — before deciding whether to grant a request by lawyers for Lay's estate to set aside his convictions. Prosecutors hope, against all expectation, that the delay will give Congress time to pass a bill that would preserve a conviction even after a defendant's death and convert the government's criminal forfeiture proceedings to one in which the government would not have to compete with other creditors.

That would harm the victims the government purports to want to help. It would also harm other potentially innocent defendants who die before their appeals are heard. This mad dash to change the rules retroactively is an excellent way to create in haste a bad law that will be repented at leisure.

Less than a month ago, prosecutors tried a different shot in the dark: They sought to make former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling responsible for the entire $182.8 million in ill-gotten gains the government alleges against Skilling and Lay. Observers say this tactic also has only a slim chance of success.

The Justice Department's proposed legislation has not yet found a congressional sponsor. There are too many good reasons why lawmakers should continue to stay away from it.

Web Site Owner Gets 7 Years For Piracy (AP-Y)

AP, September 10, 2006

The owner of one of the nation's largest Internet software piracy Web sites has been sentenced to more than seven years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0060799

Nathan Peterson, 27, of Los Angeles, sold products copyrighted by companies such as Microsoft Corp. and Adobe Systems Inc. at a huge discount on his site, iBackups.net, prosecutors said. The site began operating in 2003 and was shut down by the FBI in February 2005.

In addition to Friday's 87-month sentence, U.S. District Court Judge T.S. Ellis III ordered Peterson to pay restitution of more than $5.4 million and to forfeit the proceeds of his scheme, which included homes, cars and a boat.

Peterson pleaded guilty in December in Alexandria to two counts of copyright infringement.

Justice Department and industry officials called the case one of the largest involving Internet software piracy ever prosecuted.

Last month, Ellis sentenced a Florida man to six years in prison for selling illegal copies of computer programs on another site, BuysUSA.com.

The owner of a software piracy Web site has been sentenced to more than seven years in prison--the longest sentence ever handed down for software piracy.

Nathan Peterson, 27, of Los Angeles, sold copyrighted software at a huge discount on his site, iBackups.net, prosecutors said. The FBI began investigating the site in 2003 and shut it down in February 2005.

U.S. District Court Judge T.S. Ellis III on Friday ordered Peterson to pay restitution of more than $5.4 million. Peterson pleaded guilty in December in Alexandria, Va., to two counts of copyright infringement for illegally copying and selling more than $20 million in software.

Justice Department and industry officials called the case one of the largest involving Internet software piracy ever prosecuted.

Last month, Ellis sentenced Danny Ferrer, a Florida man who pleaded guilty to copyright charges in connection with multimillion-dollar sales of pirated software, to six years in prison.

Software piracy resulted in a loss of $34 billion worldwide in 2005, a $1.6 billion increase over 2004, according to a study commissioned by the Business Software Alliance.

Report: Harris Official Interviewed (AP)

AP, September 10, 2006

U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' former campaign manager has been interviewed by federal investigators as part of an inquiry into her relationship with a convicted defense contractor, a newspaper reported Saturday.

Jim Dornan spoke to FBI and Defense Department investigators in Washington for about 90 minutes Thursday, the St. Petersburg Times reported.

Dornan, who left Harris' Senate campaign in November, declined to comment to the paper, and messages left Saturday for Dornan by The Associated Press were not immediately returned. The Department of Justice has said previously it does not comment on pending investigations.

Harris has been in the spotlight for her dealings with Mitchell Wade, a defense contractor who pleaded guilty to bribing a California congressman and admitted funneling $32,000 in illegal donations to Harris. She later said she gave the money to charity. Dornan was not Harris' campaign manager when she accepted the donations.

The Justice Department investigation already has involved interviews with former top campaign strategist Ed Rollins and Fred Asbell, who quit in June as Harris' chief of staff in Congress. Harris has said previously she is cooperating with the investigation but is "not a target."

Though she won the recent Republican primary, Harris has not had an easy campaign season. She has faced the departure of staff members, and Republican leaders have not gotten behind her campaign.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Warner Worries Bill Will Allow Casinos (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0060800

RICHMOND (AP) -- Sen. John W. Warner, a strong supporter of legislation to grant sovereign status to Virginia Indian tribes, is expressing new concerns about the law potentially paving the way for Indian-operated casino gambling in the state.

Mr. Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a co-sponsor of the so-called federal recognition bill, has asked the Virginia congressional delegation to take a closer look at the legislation.

Six Indian tribes have sought recognition through legislation sponsored in the House by Rep. James P. Moran, a Democrat, and in the Senate by Sen. George Allen, a Republican. The tribes say the legislation will give them access to federal funds.

Mr. Moran introduced recognition legislation in 2000. The Senate version is in the chamber's Committee on Indian Affairs. The House version has been referred to its chamber's Committee on Resources.

Mr. Warner recently said he didn't want legislation that could "thwart the ability of a state, whether it's Virginia or any other state, to prohibit gambling."

He also said, in light of federal court decisions, "It's tough [to determine] whether or not the state can prohibit gambling, once sovereignty is granted to these tribes."

Supporters of the legislation didn't take Mr. Warner's concerns as a setback.

Wayne Adkins, a member of the Chickahominy Tribe and president of Virginia Indians Tribal Alliance for Life, an advocacy group pushing for federal recognition, said Mr. Warner's statement is a step in the right direction.

"He wants to see us have recognition," he said. "It looks like he's trying to remove the stumbling blocks."

Mr. Moran thinks Mr. Warner is simply being thorough and politically practical about the legislation.

Mr. Allen was equally optimistic, spokesman David Snepp said.

"He wants these questions to be settled by the Virginia delegation," Mr. Snepp said. "That's the only way this bill will be in the strongest position going forward."

The tribes are asking for the same status given to more than 560 other tribal governments.

The tribes mentioned in Mr. Allen's bill are the Chickahominy, the Eastern Chickahominy, the Monacan Indian Nation, the Nansemond, the Rappahannock and the Upper Mattaponi.

The Senate's Committee on Indian Affairs is expected to meet again this month.

Volunteers Come To Aid Of Parks Hurt By Cutbacks (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

MOUNT WASHINGTON, Mass. — Ever wonder who builds the stairs on hiking trails deep in the woods? Along the Appalachian Trail near the Connecticut border here this summer, the credit went to a group of young volunteers who spent four weeks turning stray rocks into staircases.

The seven teenagers and two crew leaders are part of the Student Conservation Association, a 50-year-old organization that among other things does grunt work in public outdoor spaces — cutting trails, building walls, tending plants.

In recent years, the group has taken on the added role of helping the national parks continue programs that might otherwise have been abandoned because of budget cuts.

Dale Penny, the association's president, said his crew of 3,000, mostly high school and college students with a few retirees and professionals on sabbatical, are not labor replacements. Rather, the students are a cadre of helpers assembled to assist park staff members in any way necessary. The volunteers work with state and federal land agencies, including the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Forest Service.

"They're there to support the Park Service and do work that wouldn't otherwise get done," Mr. Penny said.

Scott Gediman, a ranger at Yosemite National Park, said the association's interns have supplemented the park's trail efforts, maintaining and repairing some of Yosemite's 800 miles of trails, including some backcountry ones that would have probably gone untended. Other members have filled in as park guides.

"These crews allow us to do more than we can do with our existing budget," Mr. Gediman said of the organization and others like it. "It allows us to keep up with a lot of the extra things, if you will, the kind of things that keep up the margin of excellence."

Kathy Kupper, a National Parks Service spokeswoman who recently worked as a ranger at the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal National Historical Park in Washington, said the Student Conservation Association started running tours on a riverboat that had been taken out of service and restored by local volunteers.

"The only way the park could do it was to hire the S.C.A. because it didn't have the money. They didn't have the staff up there for three years, and the money got absorbed into other things," Ms. Kupper said. "A friend of the park group raised all the money for the boat, and there's just no money in the budget there to pay for another ranger. So the S.C.A. will run the boat."

The association is a public-private partnership supplemented by government grants, money from parks' operating budgets and private contributions. It received $23,462,000 in revenue and contributions last year, and spent $22,771,000 on operating expenses.

It deploys three types of workers among various public land agencies. Conservation interns are undergraduate or graduate students who spend 3 to 12 months working on field projects like land surveying or bird tracking. Interns' expenses are paid, and they receive a stipend. The association also dispatches interns to tackle large-scale land projects like fire prevention and detection of burn-prone areas and weeding out of invasive plant species. Each summer it also deploys conservation crews of six to eight high school students recruited through their school and two adults on 15- to 35-day labor-intensive projects like clearing and maintaining trails.

The stair-maintenance crew here spent eight-hour days hauling rocks from a riverbank and constructing dam-like structures that ensure trails drain properly. Showers were nonexistent and meals consisted generally of trail mix and instant macaroni and cheese, although some crew members got creative, fashioning peanut butter and noodles into a roughing-it approximation of pad Thai.

Though they were craving pizza, the students said that the experience taught them the value of the outdoors and hard work, and that they would do it again.

"I really love nature, and I want to do something important," said Graham Thompson, 17, from Irvine, Calif. "You focus entirely on your project and fall into this groove where it's really all about the work."

Starving The People To Feed The Cars (WP)

By Lester R. Brown

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

High oil prices are much more than just a drain on drivers' pocketbooks or a sign of tough economic times ahead; they could also prove to be a leading indicator of the unraveling of our global civilization.

That may sound unlikely, or melodramatic. But consider this: Now, almost everything we eat can be converted into automotive fuel. And once the price of oil surpassed $60 a barrel last year, the business of transforming wheat, corn, soybeans and sugarcane into fuel for cars instead of food for people became hugely profitable. As crops that have long sustained us are diverted to provide fuel, we may encounter the same fate that brought down great civilizations of the past.

Plans for new ethanol distilleries and biodiesel refineries are announced almost daily, setting the stage for an epic competition. In a narrow sense, it is one between the world's supermarkets and its service stations. More broadly, it is a battle between the world's 800 million automobile owners, who want to maintain their mobility, and the world's 2 billion poorest people, who simply want to survive.

Whenever the food value of a crop drops below its fuel value, the market will convert it into fuel. Ultimately, this dynamic risks driving up world food prices, destabilizing governments in low-income nations and disrupting global economic growth.

Ours is not the first society to face a predicament of this kind. In his book "Collapse: How Societies Choose to Fail or Succeed," Jared Diamond assesses our current civilization against the backdrop of earlier ones, some of which recognized only too late how their future depended on safeguarding their basic resources.

Take the Sumerian civilization of the fourth millennium BC, which was based on an ingeniously engineered irrigation system -- one yielding a food surplus that supported the first cities. Some of the irrigation water percolated downward, slowly raising the water table. As the water rose, it began to evaporate, leaving a residue of salt. Over time, the accumulating salt lowered wheat yields, and the Sumerians turned to barley, a more salt-tolerant crop. But eventually the yields of barley also fell, bringing down this once-great civilization.

The New World counterpart to Sumer was the Mayan civilization in the lowlands of southern Mexico and Guatemala, a society that flourished from AD 250 until around AD 900. But deforestation and the resulting soil erosion undermined their agriculture. Today this region is covered in jungle, reclaimed by nature, and the Mayan civilization is a mere archaeological curiosity.

Some early societies recognized environmental trouble and fashioned an effective response. In the 15th century, Icelanders realized that overgrazing of their grasslands was leading to soil erosion. Farmers then calculated how many sheep the land could sustain and allocated quotas among themselves, thus preserving their grasslands -- and a wool industry that thrives today.

What salt levels, deforestation and soil erosion foretold for past societies, high oil prices could reveal about our own.

Among the many environmental threats to our future -- increasing CO2levels, melting ice sheets, rising sea levels, falling water tables and shrinking forests -- the depletion of oil reserves may be the most immediate for our oil-based global civilization.

DOJ_NMG_0060802

The price of oil has more than tripled over the past four years, jumping from $20 to nearly $70 a barrel. Mainstream analysts talk about prices rising to $100 a barrel or more if major disruptions in supply occur -- such as the explosion of violence and chaos in the oil-rich Middle East. And even though the discovery of oil reserves last week beneath the Gulf of Mexico was hailed as a boost for the U.S. oil industry, it will only temporarily delay the ongoing depletion. The real news is that so few such discoveries are made.

These runaway oil prices are now driving biofuel production, once spurred mainly by government subsidies. Brazil, the world's largest exporter of sugar, converts half of its crop into ethanol for cars, contributing to a doubling of the world sugar price over the past two years. In Europe, where rapeseed is grown for both biodiesel and cooking, margarine manufacturers have asked the European Parliament for protection from the heavily subsidized biodiesel refineries.

However, it is Malaysia, the leading producer and exporter of palm oil -- the most widely used vegetable oil -- that plans to lead the world in biodiesel production. Within the past 18 months, it has approved 52 proposals to build palm-oil refineries, raising doubts as to whether there will be enough palm oil to satisfy its export commitments and to feed these refineries.

And in the United States, investors are jumping on the biofuel bandwagon, pumping billions into new ethanol distilleries and biodiesel refineries. Last year, the United Sates produced more than 4 billion gallons of ethanol. Corn use by the ethanol distilleries has increased from 18 million tons in 2001 to an estimated 55 million tons from the 2006 crop, or nearly one-sixth of the U.S. grain harvest.

In some Corn Belt states, ethanol distilleries are taking over the corn supply. In Iowa, a staggering 55 ethanol plants are already operating or are planned. Iowa State University economist Bob Wisner observes that if all these plants are completed, they would use virtually the entire Iowa corn harvest.

With so many distilleries being built, livestock producers fear there may not be enough corn to feed animals, possibly leading to shortages in milk, eggs, beef, pork and poultry. And because the United States supplies 70 percent of world corn exports, importing countries -- such as Egypt, Japan and Mexico -- should be worried, too.

In agricultural terms, our appetite for automotive fuel is insatiable: The grain required to fill a 25-gallon SUV gas tank with ethanol would feed one person for a full year. If the United States converted its entire grain harvest into ethanol, it would satisfy less than 16 percent of its automotive fuel needs.

Yet, no one in the United States or internationally is monitoring the escalating diversion of grain to fuel distilleries to ensure that it will not disrupt food supplies. Instead, a market free-for-all dominates, with commodities going to the highest bidder.

All of this is unfolding as the world's farmers are trying to feed 76 million additional people each year. In six of the past seven years, world grain consumption has exceeded production. As a result, the reserve of public and private grain stocks that we rely on as a carryover from harvest to harvest has fallen to the lowest level in 34 years.

There are alternatives to this food-based fuels scenario. The equivalent of a 3 percent gain in U.S. automotive fuel supplies from ethanol could be achieved several times over -- and at a fraction of the cost -- simply by raising automobile fuel-efficiency standards by 20 percent. We can also shift to highly efficient gas-electric hybrid plug-in vehicles. And if we invest in wind farms, feeding cheap electricity into the grid, cars could run primarily on wind energy, and at the gasoline equivalent of less than $1 a gallon.

Like earlier civilizations, we face a choice. When the Sumerians got into trouble on the food front, they substituted barley for wheat, which delayed but did not prevent their ultimate decline. We are similarly substituting ethanol for oil, treating the symptoms rather than the cause. The question is whether we will move quickly enough to reduce our dependence on oil, or whether we will continue with business as usual. Will we choose to follow the Icelanders, or the Sumerians and Mayans?

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In Salinas, Guns Used In Crimes Get Around (MHCA)

By Julia Reynolds

Monterey (CA) Herald, September 10, 2006

No one knows how the Czech ended up in Salinas.

Worn and battle-weary, the Cold War veteran had slipped quietly into the U.S., and in only a year, detectives in Monterey County were working overtime to track the foreigner's deadly trail.

Early in 2001, detectives found tell-tale bullet casings after a shooting. In June, more spent casings at another shooting scene showed the outlaw's crimes had escalated to attempted murder.

In August, another shooting could have easily become a homicide but the victim survived. Within days, as if to silence any witnesses, gunshots rained upon residents in a Salinas home.

The Czech ended the year with a murder outside the city limits in Monterey County.

A year and a half later, sheriff's deputies finally nabbed one of Salinas' most-wanted killers.

The Czech, it turned out, was a CZ 85, a 1970s-era 9 mm semiautomatic pistol that had fallen into the hands of Salinas criminals.

The pistol's short but extremely active time in Monterey County is typical of many guns used in Salinas crimes -- guns that are quickly passed from hand to hand and from shooter to shooter.

With more than 300 firearms crimes committed every year, Salinas has struggled for more than a decade with a river of illegal weapons easily acquired and passed around among its youths.

The murder rate is declining, but the number of shootings and gun crimes has held steady for five years. And those statistics tell a grim tale: For the last three years, the number of serious assaults with firearms has stayed above 100 annually, with 61 drive-by shootings and 87 robberies involving a firearm in 2005 alone.

A major difficulty in trying to solve these crimes can be traced to what officers call the "communal" use of guns in Salinas, meaning illegal guns don't tend to stay in one person's hands for very long.

Since 2001, using a state-of-the-art bullet "fingerprinting" system, Salinas police have learned a lot about how weapons are passed among the city's youths, and investigators have discovered that several guns have been used in a dozen or more crimes.

"Our bullet casing (marks) are high-probability candidates for being in multiple crimes," Salinas police Cmdr. Kelly McMillin said. "It's because of the communal nature of guns in Salinas."

This unusual situation exists, he said, because young gang members pass their guns along to friends.

According to one Norteño gang member who asked not to be named, once a gun is used in a crime, "it's time to get rid of it. I used to go through a couple of guns in a month."

"Sometimes the guns even change sides," McMillin said. Using ballistic identification to trace shell casings left at crime scenes, officers may link a weapon to a series of shootings by Sureño gangs. Later, bullets from the same gun suddenly show up in crimes police believe were committed by Norteños.

Switching sides|

"It's like the guy dropped it in a shootout, and another guy picked it up," McMillin said.

It's this fluid, community ownership of guns that gives Salinas a higher-than-usual number of guns used in multiple crimes, according to Mark Babione, a criminologist at the Salinas Police Department who spoke with The Herald before he recently went on medical leave.

"It all started when we had 114 shootings in one year," he said.

In 2001, detectives began sending shell casings to Santa Clara County, which had the only bullet testing lab in the area. There, the casings were analyzed for preliminary matches -- called "hits" -- against casings found at other Salinas crime scenes.

"In six months, they got more hits from us than they ever had," Babione said. "We're a frequent flier."

"We have a high hit rate," McMillin agreed. "Before, we had to rely on Santa Clara County for casing IDs -- Salinas was 75 percent of their work. Salinas gave them more work than all of Santa Clara County combined."

Some of the early "hits" were astounding.

When 17-year-old Sureño gang member Miguel Rivera was arrested for a 2002 homicide, Salinas police ran ballistic fingerprinting tests on the casings.

By comparing their unique markings, investigators found that the same gun had been used in at least 11 other shootings. Two were linked to Rivera, police said, but someone else may have committed the other crimes.

As of late August, 164 Salinas guns have been linked to multiple crimes since 2001.

The same year Rivera was arrested, the Salinas Police Department wrote a federal grant for its own "data acquisition station" -- essentially a compact bullet fingerprinting lab -- and was able to hire one of the state's top ballistics experts, Stephen O'Clair, a retiring Justice Department criminalist from Fresno.

O'Clair works part time as a bullet identification expert, running the Integrated Ballistics Information System, also called IBIS.

What's distinctive about the system is that it can link bullets to the same gun, even if police never recover the weapon.

"This gun here is connected to four Santa Clara County cases," O'Clair says, pointing to a line of red type in his computer's list of bullets he's entered into the system. The red ones are the hits.

DOJ_NMG_0060804

With the data acquisition station, a computer and camera set up in a windowless room at the Police Department, he'll take photos of the end of the casing and study the images under a comparison microscope.

"Semiautomatic guns also might have an ejector mark," he says. "It's made when the bullet's cartridge is kicked out."

O'Clair has more than 160 matched guns listed in his computer.

"One is a Glock that was used in 13 different cases," he says. "The gun disappeared after a homicide in April 2002."

"Sometimes they disappear and come back again," he says.

Another was used nine times, until the gun and a shooter were picked up last July.

There are maybe a dozen people in California who do what O'Clair does, and most work in U.S. Department of Justice IBIS labs in Stockton, Sacramento and Fresno, along with a couple of labs used by the Los Angeles Police Department.

Studying bullet casings from crime scenes is only one side of O'Clair's job. The other is shooting guns.

It's dark in the basement shooting range at the Salinas Police Department. Years of stray bullets have strafed the cement walls, floors and ceiling.

On this particular day, O'Clair is hoping that any of 30 confiscated guns sent over by the Monterey County Sheriff's Office might match a crime scene casing on file.

A cardboard box sits on the floor filled with plastic bags, each holding a handgun and paperwork labeled "Outside agency assist."

Wearing ear protection and latex gloves, O'Clair and crime scene investigator Neil Harrier methodically clean, load and shoot. They'll fire three bullets from each weapon into a funny-looking metal box with a plastic funnel aiming inside before the guns are processed and eventually destroyed.

After several guns of different calibers are fired, the casings are picked up off the floor and the bullets are pulled out of a long metal canister from inside the box.

"When I worked in Fresno we had a water tank, but since we don't have room for a water tank, we use that can full of black rubber balls," O'Clair says.

Sometimes risky|

His gloves black from the rubber, O'Clair fishes out the bullets and puts them in a little envelope and a plastic Ziploc bag, along with the gun.

"Some just can't be fired," O'Clair said. He said he had a "slam fire" last week, when he pulled on the slide and the gun fired prematurely.

"You have to make sure the barrel is clear or it could blow up in your hand."

Out comes a black .44 Magnum.

"This is gonna be a big bang," he says. It is. "That's kind of fun, too. That's what Dirty Harry used to carry."

Despite the system's successful matches for Salinas guns, police officers still have trouble catching criminals. They may know which guns were used in which crimes, but they don't necessarily know who the shooter was. In many communities, the registered owner might be a suspect, but that's a rare case in Salinas.

But the ballistic matching system sometimes gives officers clues they would never have found otherwise.

After a recent homicide, police found out that a gun picked up in an unrelated arrest was also the murder weapon, giving their investigation an entirely new turn.

And with more than 4,000 serious firearms crimes reported in the last decade in the city, officers say that no matter what its shortcomings, they'll keep relying on IBIS to trace the wayward path followed by guns in Salinas.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush's Approval Ratings Slumping Further In Europe (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

President Bush's approval ratings in the United States are nothing to cheer about, but he can count himself lucky that the midterm elections will not be held in Europe. A comprehensive survey of public opinion in a dozen European nations and the United States found that things have gone from bad to worse when it comes to disdain for the administration and its national security policies.

The annual survey, taken by the highly regarded German Marshall Fund of the United States, shows that 77 percent of Europeans disapprove of the way Bush has handled international affairs, as compared with 56 percent who felt that way in GMF's "Transatlantic Trends" survey in 2002.

Asked how desirable it was for the United States to exert strong leadership on the world stage, 37 percent of Europeans said that should be a goal -- down from 64 percent five years ago. In this country, 82 percent of Americans think it is very desirable or somewhat desirable for the United States to exert leadership.

Anyone who has seen the large antiwar rallies in Europe on television won't be surprised that people living on the other side of the Atlantic are less than enthusiastic in their views toward Bush and America's role in the world.

But, the GMF poll, which tested approximately 1,000 people in each of the countries it surveyed, also found interesting nuances in attitudes of those residing across the pond.

Even though Europeans' views of Bush have collapsed over the past five years, their fears about the threat posed by international terrorism have grown closer to Bush's view. Sixty-six percent of Europeans called terrorism an "extremely important" threat, up eight percentage points since last year. In Britain, which has been the target of several terrorist operations in the past year, the number of those viewing terrorism as a main priority rose by 22 percentage points. But Europeans remained wary of military action as the answer to security threats, and they put greater emphasis on diplomacy.

GMF President Craig Kennedy said the survey revealed "broad agreement on threats across the Atlantic and a profound division on how to deal with them."

Some Democrats, however, have suggested that the majority opinion in the United States has grown closer to a European outlook. Democratic pollster Mark Mellman said he recently conducted a poll finding that 31 percent believed that it is better for the United States to "act on its own because we can act more decisively and effectively in our national interest." Twice as many said it is better to work through multilateral institutions such as the United Nations.

"The American public prefers multilateralism wherever possible because they understand that our strength in confronting terror rests in part on the cohesion of our alliances," Mellman said.Hispanics' Clout

Massive The huge rallies earlier this year of Hispanics alarmed by anti-immigration sentiments seemed to presage the potential of this group as a voting bloc this fall. "Today We March, Tomorrow We Vote" was one popular slogan.

But as Nov. 7 nears, some analysts are wondering whether reality will match anticipation. An analysis by the Associated Press of voter registration data in 12 U.S. cities with substantial Hispanic populations -- including Los Angeles, Houston and Atlanta -- did not find a major spike in voter registration.

The news agency found that there were fewer new registrants through July in every city, compared with 2004 figures. Presidential elections ordinarily excite more interest among nearly all voters, so that lag is not entirely a surprise. It also suggests that 2006 may not be the year Hispanics fully exercise the clout that could come with rising numbers.

Clarissa Martinez, director of state and local public policy at the National Council of La Raza, said this year's demonstrations and voter mobilization efforts will have a long-term impact, even if the immediate effect is not so dramatic. She said aggressive work is being done to naturalize immigrants, which will mean more voters and higher turnout. "A couple of things are in motion, some of which will be felt in '06, but the real effect will be in '08," she said.

Robert de Posada, a former president of the Latino Coalition, questioned whether the demonstrations, while initially energizing Hispanics, might ultimately have had negative consequences. "It turned off a lot of people who did not like the tone of the debate on both extremes," he said.

He said many Hispanics feel disaffected with the political process and don't expect anything constructive to happen, regardless of who wins this fall.

Hispanics are the fastest-growing segment of the population in the United States, but they are less likely than whites or blacks to vote. From 2000 through 2004, according to the Pew Hispanic Center, they accounted for half of U.S. population growth but only a 10th of the increase in votes cast.

Latino Activists Put Faith In Ballots (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

As immigration rights leaders assess gains and losses since rallies last spring, they turn their focus to the recruitment of 1 million new voters.

Has the immigrant rights movement fizzled?

At a national Latino conference that drew hundreds to downtown Los Angeles last week, movement leaders emphatically said no.

Although Congress has stalled action on broad immigration reform and Labor Day marches failed to mobilize wide support, activists said they were only now beginning to roll out the next stage of their battle: a massive effort to produce 1 million new Latino voters and U.S. citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0060806

"Now is not march time," Antonio Gonzalez, president of the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project in Los Angeles, said Saturday. "We're mobilizing voters. That's the big deal."

But immigration control advocates say the marches last spring doomed activists' efforts by alienating most Americans and strengthening support for stronger border control and opposition to legalization.

"The mass sea of illegal aliens bearing foreign flags and hostile placards really produced a pronounced backlash, from which they've never recovered," said John Keeley, spokesman for the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies.

The movement's fate is in question just months after hundreds of thousands of immigrants and their supporters startled the nation by pouring into the streets to protest a House bill that would criminalize undocumented immigrants and those who support them. Buoyed by their success, they helped push the U.S. Senate to pass a landmark bill increasing visas and offering legalization to many of the nation's estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants.

Since then, some activists acknowledge, their ranks have become demoralized as congressional action on the issue stalled over the summer and recent marches have fallen flat.

In Los Angeles, for instance, police estimated that only about 1,500 people turned out for a Labor Day weekend rally that organizers had predicted would draw as many as 50,000. And Cecilia Munoz, a vice president of the National Council of La Raza, said some immigrants were reluctant to risk their jobs to march because the likelihood of legalization and other reform does not appear imminent.

"A lot of people feel a loss," immigrant activist Oscar Garcon said Saturday at the National Latino Congreso, which was billed as the most comprehensive gathering of Latino leaders in nearly 30 years. "They say, 'We demonstrated, we came out by the millions, but what did we change?' "

But he and others said a movement cannot fairly be measured by the size of its marches or its early setbacks, and some experts agree.

Louis DeSipio, a UC Irvine associate professor of political science and Chicano/Latino studies, said it was premature to dismiss prospects for broad immigration reform.

He said such aims could take years to achieve. The 1986 amnesty for illegal immigrants, for instance, took a decade to pass and did so abruptly, just as most members of Congress thought the provision dead.

DeSipio said movements cannot be built from marches alone.

"It's good they've moved away from the marches," he said. "Marches can get people's attention, but it doesn't necessarily get a higher percentage of the community involved in civic participation. That's what things like get-out-the-vote and voter registration drives do."

DeSipio said the ferment over immigration could in time lead to a surge in Latino voters similar to the one after the 1994 passage of Proposition 187. The measure would have denied health benefits to undocumented immigrants had it not been overturned in the courts.

The number of legal residents who became U.S. citizens increased from 434,000 in 1994 to more than 1 million in 1996; and Latino registered voters in California increased from 1.6 million in 1996 to 1.9 million in 2000, according to the National Assn. of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials Educational Fund in Los Angeles.

Activists argue that some preliminary data offer evidence of another surge. According to U.S. immigration statistics, the number of citizenship applications increased by 41.5% in May over last year, a far larger increase than in previous periods.

"This is one of many issues, and it's going to take time, but it will come," said Cristina Basurto, 32, a member of Women of Earth, a social justice organization, who attended a small rally after the conference Saturday near downtown. "I think people still have it in their hearts and still want to fight for what they believe in."

The number of new Latino voters grew by 35,000 in Los Angeles County from March to August, helping to boost their share of the electorate from 20% to 24% over last year, according to an analysis of Los Angeles County registrar-recorder data by the Latino officials' organization.

Marcelo Gaete, the organization's senior program director, said his staff used a surname dictionary to determine how many of the county's new voters were Latino.

Keeley, however, said the political landscape proves his point: A get-tough stand on immigration is a winning political message.

In Pennsylvania, for instance, he said Republican Sen. Rick Santorum is rapidly closing what had been a double-digit deficit in the polls in his race against his Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Robert Casey Jr., by campaigning with a tough immigration message.

He also said congressional hearings on immigration and local town halls during the summer recess have convinced many legislators that constituents see border control as a top priority.

As a result, he said, "the chances are less than zero" of winning legalization this year.

DOJ_NMG_0060807

Some Latino activists, including UC Riverside ethnic studies department Chairman Armando Navarro, agree that the movement for immigrant rights has lost steam. He said internal squabbling, a lack of leadership and a failure to organize immigrants for long-term political change had squandered their gains of the spring.

DeSipio and others, however, said activists had already scored a significant victory by so far stopping the House bill, especially the provision that would criminalize undocumented immigrants and those who aid them, from becoming law. Elements of that bill, including border enforcement measures, however, may still pass.

Now, activists say, they are gearing up to launch what they envision will be a long-term effort to mobilize Latino voters for elections this November and, more important, in 2008.

Two organizations — the Service Employees International Union and the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project — have raised $7 million for national voter registration and get-out-the-vote efforts.

The National Assn. of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials plans to include 150,000 voter registration cards in La Opinion later this month and help sponsor another major workshop at the L.A. Convention Center to help immigrants apply for citizenship. A July workshop produced about 1,300 completed new citizenship applications, Gaete said.

Spanish-language radio DJs, who helped turn masses out for marches, have also begun to actively promote voter registration and citizenship efforts. Renan Almendarez "El Cucuy" Coello took his "Votos por America" campaign to 10 cities over two weeks last month.

DeSipio cautioned, however, that it was easier to register voters than to get them out to the polls.

"There's certainly the potential there," he said, "but it will require sustained investment and a lot of hard work."

Low Turnout At L.A. Immigration Rally (AP)

By Peter Prengaman, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Few people turned out Saturday for a rally demanding amnesty for 11 million illegal immigrants, the latest sign of pro-immigrant groups' struggles to regain momentum after hundreds of thousands marched for the cause in the spring.

Local bands played rock music, vendors offered chicken tacos and dozens of activists set up information booths in a downtown field. But only about 350 people showed up, and many were organizers and journalists.

Organizers, who had expected about 5,000 participants, downplayed the low turnout. They said their point was made even with sparse crowds.

"This community has shown it wants a solution, so we shouldn't have to show it with half a million people each time we do it," said Maria Elena Durazo, secretary treasurer of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, AFL-CIO.

The rally comes as pro-immigrant coalitions try to re-energize their campaign after summer vacation and internal divisions have weakened a movement that brought hundreds of thousands to the streets in the spring.

The rally culminated this week's National Latino Congreso, billed as one of the largest gatherings of Hispanic leaders in decades.

Sessions included speeches and workshops on registering Hispanic voters, running Hispanic political candidates, wage gaps between Hispanics and whites, environmental issues and a lack of access to health care in immigrant communities.

But the week's central issue was creating new strategies to urge lawmakers to offer a path to citizenship to illegal immigrants.

"We need to frame this as a national security issue," said Peter Schey, president of the Center for Human Rights and Constitutional Law in Los Angeles. "It's ridiculous to have immigrants at airports giving their fingerprints when there are 12 million people in the country illegally."

The House passed legislation in December that would add hundreds of miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border and criminalize anyone who lent a hand to illegal immigrants.

That bill created a groundswell of anger in immigrant communities, leading to a 500,000-strong rally in Los Angeles in March that was followed by hundreds of other demonstrations across the country.

The Senate scrapped the House bill when it took up immigration reform in April, instead passing legislation that would strengthen the border and create a limited legalization program.

Since then, however, Congress has all but shelved immigration reform. And efforts by pro-immigrant coalitions to registers thousands of new voters has yet to take shape.

An Associated Press review this week of voter registration figures from Chicago, Denver, Houston, Atlanta, Los Angeles and other major urban areas that saw large rallies showed no sign of a historic new voter boom that could sway elections.

An Ever-Changing Path To Legal Status (WP)

By S. Mitra Kalita

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Since Congress has tabled immigration reform, millions of immigrants living and working here illegally now find they have a tougher path toward legalization.

In the past, illegal immigrants have been helped by specific amnesty programs, such as a 1986 law that allowed nearly 3 million immigrants to gain legal status. In 1994, Congress passed a law that allowed people sponsored by employers or relatives to qualify for green cards, if they paid a $1,000 fine. The law was phased out in 1998 but then reinstated by Congress in December 2000. The deadline was April 30, 2001.

While employers and relatives can still sponsor immigrants for green cards, limited quotas have resulted in extremely long waits. The United States allows 5,000 low-skilled workers to be sponsored for green-card-based visas every year.

Those sponsoring an illegal worker, such as a nanny, often encounter a "cruel myth," said Crystal Williams, deputy director for programs at the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "Families go through the process and they discover that the kids will be grown before the nanny gets a green card."

Exceptions are made for some immigrants who come from crisis-ridden countries that can no longer absorb them. Immigrants from El Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras, Somalia and Sudan, for example, can qualify for temporary protected status if they were in the United States before a certain date. Temporary protected status is given to immigrants from certain countries who cannot return because of ongoing conflicts, environmental disasters or other conditions. The program does not lead to permanent residency.

One way to gain legal status, depicted in a movie aptly named "Green Card," is to marry a U.S. citizen. But, Williams warned, "the marriage has got to be real. If you do it on a bogus basis, it's a felony." (Twenty-two people in the Washington area were charged last week in relation to sham marriages related to immigration status.)

Congressman Backs Town's Bid To Curb Illegals (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

FREDERICKSBURG, Va. (AP) -- U.S. Rep. Eric Cantor is lending his support to an effort in Culpeper to crack down on illegal immigration.

Mr. Cantor, Virginia Republican, said he has been following the debate over the issue, which drew attention when Town Council member Steve Jenkins began an effort to target landlords and employers who house or hire illegal aliens.

Mr. Jenkins also is considering calling for an official designation of English as the town's primary language.

The Culpeper County Board of Supervisors voted Tuesday to send a letter to Mr. Cantor requesting help.

The Town Council will on Tuesday consider sending a joint letter with the county supervisors.

"Illegal immigration is a national crisis that must be addressed at all levels of government," Mr. Cantor wrote in a letter to town and county leaders. "If you identify a need for federal legislation to help you, I stand ready to consider any and all ideas to help you solve this growing crisis."

The Senate and the House are at a stalemate on how best to address illegal immigration.

In his letter, Mr. Cantor said he doubts the Senate will take action on the issue until after the November elections.

Mr. Jenkins said he was pleased Mr. Cantor, in his third term representing the 3rd Congressional District, had responded.

"I believe right will prevail and [that federal officials] will step up," he said.

A meeting recently called by Mr. Jenkins on the topic drew more than 200 people and became contentious when some exchanged angry words.

At the same time, about 100 people sympathetic to immigrants marched downtown. Such supporters also have sent a letter to the Town Council urging its members to reject measures that target illegal aliens.

Mr. Jenkins has cited Hazelton, Pa., as a city that is taking local action to curb illegal immigration.

Hazelton has legislation targeting landlords and employers who house or hire illegal aliens. However, a federal court order has stopped the city from enforcing the measures, which were to take effect tomorrow.

They plan to rework the legislation as the city contends with a lawsuit by the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund and the American Civil Liberties Union.

School Forms' Immigration-Related Questions Stir Concern (WP)

By Michelle Garci-a, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0060809

CARTERET, N.J. -- A few weeks back, Linda Singh picked up the registration packet from her local school district. There, at the bottom of the first page, was the question regarding birthplace, followed by: "If not USA, date entered USA."

It set off alarm bells for Singh, who is of Irish ancestry and married to an Indian immigrant, with five U.S.-born children. She feared that this was another school district trying to figure out the immigration status of its students.

She alerted the Sikh temple where her family goes, and they drew up fliers notifying parents that they did not have to answer immigration questions. She called civil liberties advocates. Then, armed with legal citations, she attended a recent school board meeting and would not back down.

"I feel like it concerns me because this is my town," Singh said. "If I don't make a stand in my back yard, then what's next?"

Scores of New Jersey school districts are stirring unease among immigrant parents by asking them to provide immigration-related information when they register their children for school. Fourteen years ago, the Supreme Court ruled that cities and towns must provide education for all students, regardless of immigration status.

The New Jersey chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union conducted a survey in the past few weeks and found that 57 schools and district offices request immigration-related information or a student's Social Security number for school registration.

The advocacy group, which surveyed 224 schools, said such questions violate federal and state privacy laws and can discourage immigrant families from registering their children.

"We live in a society that is increasingly encroaching on our privacy," said Annu Mangat, a spokesman for the New Jersey chapter. "This is a fairly straightforward thing to remedy. They need to train staff and revise their forms."

School officials, by and large, insist that they are not asking these questions out of any desire to ferret out students who are illegal immigrants. They note that New Jersey is a densely packed state and that all districts scrutinize their student body for interlopers. And they say that their districts can receive federal funds for immigrants who arrived recently.

"I can assure that it wasn't meant to check immigration status, to determine if someone has a green card or a red card," said Dennis W. Siddons, assistant superintendent of the Carteret School District. "I don't work for immigration."

After the school board clarified the intent behind its question, it saw an increase in the number of South Asian families registering their children, Siddons said.

But these immigration questions arise against a backdrop of escalating tensions over immigration. Singh thought nothing of it several years ago, when the school district requested the Social Security numbers of her children, but that was before towns in New Jersey and Pennsylvania embraced the current wave of ordinances aimed at restricting jobs and housing for undocumented immigrants.

Add to that the attacks against Sikhs after Sept. 11, 2001. Her husband, Harminder Singh, a charter bus driver, was once asked if he had a bomb on his bus.

Linda Singh, whose Gaelic features are framed by black hair, has felt the return of the fighting spirit of her twenties, when she took up the cause of Northern Irish independence. "My grandparents are from Belfast," she said. "I care a lot about civil rights being trampled on."

Michael Hethmon, an attorney for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group that seeks to limit immigration, says that the ACLU has interpreted the court ruling too broadly. He cited a federal regulation that allows schools to collect immigration information.

Hethmon said the classroom may become the next legal battlefield in the effort to deny services to people who are here illegally. He said that anti-immigration ordinances, such as one passed in Hazleton, Pa., which denies housing to some immigrants, will extend to education.

"Eventually, a Hazleton situation will be created in the school district, and we'll be there," he said.

The Immigration Equation (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

It's often said that immigrants do the jobs Americans don't want to do. They've just been assigned another task: Buy the homes of the baby boom generation. But this task is one that native-born Americans simply can't do. There won't be enough of them.

Many of the 78 million boomers, the first of whom turn 60 this year, will sell their property over the next two decades, says George Masnick, a research affiliate with the Joint Center for Housing Studies at Harvard University. Some will move to a smaller home or to their second home, others will move into a managed-care complex. And for some who never moved, it will be their estate making the sale. What many boomers should be asking right now is who will buy their 34 million homes. The buyers may well be immigrants, and not necessarily legal ones (about 12 million of the 35 million foreign-born people in America are illegal immigrants, according to estimates from the Center for Immigration Studies, in Washington).

Demographers say there aren't enough potential homeowners in the echo boom (the children of the baby boomers) or in the generation that comes after that (still without a catchy name) to soak up that supply, no matter how slowly it goes on the market. (It is presumed that the bulk of the Gen Xers will have done their home buying by then.)

Without sufficient demand, prices will fall. Masnick predicts that as many as 90 percent of the homes will be bought by native-born Americans. "But the last 10 percent is central," he says. "Without that 10 percent, it will be a buyers' market."

The good news is that there are enough young first- and second-generation immigrants to do the job. The popular telling of the American dream that has Smith selling to Schmidt who then sells to Shapiro will record the next chapter with Sung and Sanchez doing the buying. Dowell Myers, a professor at the University of Southern California who studies the impact of demography on urban planning, says, "The odds are that a white baby boomer won't be selling to another white."

He or she will be selling to what we today call a minority, though in many communities, whites may then be in the minority. "The immigrants will take up the slack," Myers says, "and it will be huge."

The even better news, Masnick says, is that "the second-generation immigrants will hit the housing market just when they are needed most."

Demographers are sure this will come to pass, because they have studied the baby boom population bulge, or as they call it, "cohort dynamics." And they see immigrants as another large cohort moving steadily upward. California, where more than 25 percent of the residents are immigrants, is their observation booth. "What happens in California is a precursor to what will happen in the rest of the United States," says John Pitkin, who runs a demographic forecasting firm in Cambridge, Mass. "There is no question that real estate in California will be shaped by immigrants and their children."

What forecasters have seen happen in California is encouraging. The per-household homeownership rate among native-born Americans is about 61 percent, 14 percentage points above the rate for immigrants. But immigrants who have lived in the United States for 30 years or more exceed the homeownership rate of native-born Americans by about 10 percentage points.

Myers now finds ownership rates of 60 percent among Hispanics in the Los Angeles area. "They are buying really cheap housing, but it creates a base of demand that pushes everyone up," he says.

Myers also found that home prices rose faster in areas that Hispanics are moving to, like the Los Angeles County cities El Monte and Montebello, than in surrounding neighborhoods. According to figures compiled by Dataquick, prices for single-family homes in these cities rose at least 25 percent between 2004 and 2005, compared with the 20 percent average gain for all of the county. Prices in parts of Compton, a predominantly black city that has turned increasingly Hispanic, were up almost 40 percent in that one year. "Immigrants have strong upward mobility in housing," Myers says.

If this all seems overly rosy, a 2006 Harvard housing study found that foreign-born residents already account for 37 percent of the new growth in households.

But it's no sure thing that immigrants will save the day. A lot can go wrong. "The danger is downward mobility," says Fred Siegel, a professor at the Cooper Union for Science and Art, who has studied immigration patterns. "If a significant portion of recent immigrants are downwardly mobile, then that is bad news for the boomers. Who will afford the McMansions?"

And while United States Census data now show that immigrants are spread all over the country — even well into suburban areas of the heartland — they certainly aren't evenly dispersed. In 2000, more than half of the foreign-born population lived in just three states — California, New York and Texas — and in 10 metropolitan areas. And even though they continue to fan out into other areas in increasing numbers, there may not be enough of them to help homeowners in places like West Virginia and Indiana.

Predictions also become murky for demographers because no one knows what will happen to immigration in the next decade. Will borders really be tightened? Will illegal immigrants be deported?

Will amnesty be granted?

The political picture will have as much impact on the housing market as the demographic one will.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney's Power No Longer Goes Unquestioned (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 9 — From those first moments five years ago when Secret Service agents burst into Vice President Dick Cheney's office on Sept. 11, lifted him off his feet and propelled him to the underground Presidential Emergency Operations Center, the man who had returned to Washington that year to remake the powers of the presidency seemed unstoppable.

DOJ_NMG_0060811

Within minutes, Mr. Cheney was directing the government's response to an attack that was still under way. Within weeks, he was overseeing the surveillance program that tracked suspected terrorist communications into and out of the United States without warrants. Within months, he and his staff, guided by a loyal aide, David S. Addington, were championing the reinterpretation of the rules of war so that they could detain "enemy combatants" and interrogate them at secret detention facilities run by the C.I.A. around the world.

It was Mr. Cheney and his staff who helped shape the rules under which members of the Taliban and Al Qaeda were denied some of the core rights of the Geneva Conventions and would be tried by "military commissions" at Guantánamo Bay — if they faced trial at all.

"I believe in a strong, robust executive authority, and I think that the world we live in demands it," Mr. Cheney said in December on a flight from Pakistan to Oman. "You know," he added, "it's not an accident that we haven't been hit in four years."

But as the nation observes the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Mr. Cheney finds the powers he has asserted under attack and his influence challenged. Congress and the Supreme Court have pushed back at his claim that the president alone, as commander in chief, can set the rules for detention, interrogation and domestic spying.

On Wednesday afternoon in the East Room of the White House, Mr. Cheney sat silently as President Bush urged Congress to restore to him the powers, stripped away by the Supreme Court in a 5-to-3 ruling in June, to create military commissions and define the precise meaning of the Geneva Conventions when it comes to interrogations.

There is little question that Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney still share the goal of expanding the power of the presidency: legislation they have sent to Congress would essentially allow them to set the rules of evidence, define interrogation techniques and intercept domestic communications as they have for the past five years.

But they have been stymied in their effort to simply assert those powers and carry them out with minimal oversight, as part of Mr. Cheney's declared goal to restore to the presidency an authority that he believed was dangerously eroded after Vietnam and Watergate.

On national security issues, Mr. Cheney, once the unchallenged adviser to a president who came to office with little experience in foreign affairs, remains a pivotal figure but now vies for influence with other officials like Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser. Over the past 18 months, Mr. Cheney appears to have reluctantly given ground on detention practices and, at least for now, on policy disputes involving Iran and North Korea.

On Friday, the Senate Intelligence Committee — controlled by Mr. Cheney's Republican allies — declared that there had been no basis for Mr. Cheney's repeated claims that Saddam Hussein had harbored a Qaeda leader and had ties to the group. But Mr. Cheney has never conceded that his statement was in error.

His prediction in 2002 that overthrowing Mr. Hussein would force radical extremists "to rethink their strategy of jihad" proved wrong, as Mr. Bush implicitly acknowledged last week when he described how the array of enemies facing America has multiplied. Mr. Cheney's friends and former aides said they were mystified about how the same man who as defense secretary in 1991 warned that "for us to get American military personnel involved in a civil war inside Iraq would literally be a quagmire" managed, 15 years later, to find himself facing that prospect.

A Waning Influence

Measuring the accumulation or the erosion of power is an imprecise art. But interviews with more than 45 people over the past five months — including current and former White House aides, foreign diplomats, members of Congress and confidants of Mr. Cheney — painted a picture of a vice president who, while still influential, has seen his power wane.

Most agreed to speak candidly only if their names were not used. Mr. Cheney himself declined repeated requests for an interview. Instead, his office encouraged Ms. Rice and Mr. Hadley to give interviews to dispute the view that Mr. Cheney's power is in decline.

Mr. Hadley said the vice president "is often the first to insist that the president hear a variety of views" and argued that reports of his powers in the first term were always exaggerated. "It's the president who creates the foreign policy around here," Mr. Hadley said, "not some hidden hand."

Ms. Rice disputed the view that she had supplanted Mr. Cheney, pointing out that he still had one-on-one lunches with Mr. Bush where he could make his views known "in his quiet way."

Mr. Cheney's defenders said that over the summer he was among the strongest voices arguing within the White House that the United States had to give Israel as much time as possible to strike a decisive blow against Hezbollah.

But those same insiders said that in retrospect Mr. Cheney's power was at its peak in 2003 and 2004, before Iraq's insurgency flared, before the abuses at Abu Ghraib were revealed, before the setbacks in Congress and at the Supreme Court.

Without the help of his closest adviser, I. Lewis Libby Jr., who resigned last fall after his indictment in the Central Intelligence Agency leak case, Mr. Cheney has lost the early warning radar that gave him and his staff such command over the federal bureaucracy. Administration insiders said Mr. Cheney and his aides were now having to fight to maintain positions that a few years ago he would have won handily.

"During the first term, Cheney was considered one of the smartest guys in the administration," said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois. "But his influence has been diminished because of the Scooter Libby thing and because the war in Iraq has not gone well."

In his second term, Mr. Bush has grown less dependent on Mr. Cheney for information, current and former officials said. When Joshua B. Bolten became the White House chief of staff earlier this year, he told associates that he wanted to make sure the president heard from more voices. "My impression is that there are a lot more data points or gathering points now," said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota.

For instance, Mr. Bush has turned to another Washington insider, James A. Baker III, who served Mr. Bush's father as secretary of state, for help as the co-chairman of an outside group developing options for dealing with Iraq. One group member said, "You get the sense that the president now realizes, perhaps a little late, that he needs Baker to find him an exit door."

Mr. Cheney told NBC News in May that his influence with Mr. Bush was unchanged. "I feel like he gives me the access that I need to be able to do my job," Mr. Cheney said, adding later: "I give him the best advice I can. He doesn't always agree. Sometimes he does, sometimes he doesn't."

Challenges in Congress

Perhaps nowhere has Mr. Cheney's shifting influence been more visible than on Capitol Hill, where the vice president's ability to win his way without challenge — a luxury he enjoyed through much of the first term — has evaporated.

In the first four years, Mr. Cheney often bypassed Congress on issues like detention policy.

He and Mr. Addington began to pave the way for the reassertion of executive power that they had long talked about. Mr. Cheney took control of crucial intelligence-gathering programs, including the one that involved eavesdropping on conversations between suspects in the United States and their overseas counterparts without getting a warrant from a special court set up by Congress for such cases.

"They have a view of executive authority that basically smothers the other two branches," said Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican who found himself at odds with Mr. Cheney on detention and interrogation policy.

But in the second term, whether the issue was the treatment and prosecution of terror suspects or Congressional oversight of domestic spying, Mr. Cheney has been forced into an unhappy retreat.

The Supreme Court's recent ruling struck at the heart of Mr. Cheney's goal to expand presidential powers. By mid-July, it prompted the White House to concede that terror suspects had a right under international law to basic human and legal protections under the Geneva Conventions.

Similarly, Mr. Bush's announcement on Wednesday amounted to an opening gambit in negotiations with Congress over the rules of tribunals, in what could amount to bargaining over the scope of Mr. Bush's powers.

Mr. Hadley said in an interview that in recent weeks Mr. Cheney had offered advice to Mr. Bush about how to deal with the court's decision. But Mr. Hadley, not Mr. Cheney, has been acting as negotiator with Congress, a decision that administration officials said reflected the rockiness of the vice president's relationship with Republicans on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Cheney discovered the depth of that opposition last summer, when Republicans began to rebel against the White House after he tried to block a bill by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, that would bar cruel and inhumane treatment of all prisoners in American custody.

In a tense, 30-minute meeting in July 2005, Mr. Cheney scolded three Republicans — Mr. McCain, Mr. Graham and Senator John W. Warner of Virginia — for proposing legislation that he said interfered with the president's authority to protect Americans against terrorist attacks.

But the senators did not budge despite the threat of a veto. "The three of us were firmly of one view, he of another," Mr. Warner said.

After the Senate and the House voted overwhelmingly against Mr. Cheney's position, the White House decided that the vice president had become so radioactive that his interventions were losing votes, rather than winning them, White House officials acknowledge. So Mr. Cheney stepped aside, and the less ideological, more lawyerly Mr. Hadley was sent to deal with Mr. McCain. The result was a deal that Mr. Cheney had previously rejected.

The White House also appeared to yield this summer when it agreed to allow a secret intelligence court to rule on the constitutionality of the National Security Agency's program of eavesdropping without warrants. Civil rights groups and lawmakers from both parties have since criticized the agreement and cast doubt on whether it will be approved by Congress.

Shifting Constellations

At the height of his influence in the Bush White House two years ago, Mr. Cheney stepped into the Oval Office early one evening and raised an alarm about an agreement that American negotiators were about to sign in Beijing.

DOJ_NMG_0060813

The negotiators, mostly from the State Department, were trying to entice North Korea to sign a document outlining the steps for resolving the standoff over the country's nuclear weapons. But it lacked the tough language on disarmament that North Korea had rejected and that Mr. Cheney knew Mr. Bush wanted.

With Colin L. Powell, then the secretary of state, and his deputy, Richard L. Armitage, at a black-tie dinner where they could not be easily reached on secure telephones, Mr. Cheney "declared this thing a loser," said a former senior official involved in the discussions that night.

Mr. Bush sent new instructions to the negotiators — through the National Security Council, rather than the State Department — that essentially killed the deal. "Powell and Armitage were not happy," one official said. "But it was too late."

It would be hard to imagine a similar course of events today. Soon after the start of the second term, Mr. Bush began signaling to foreign leaders visiting him in the Oval Office that he knew much had gone wrong in his first term, and that he empowered Ms. Rice to put a new emphasis on consultation and teamwork with allies. Ms. Rice, aides said, asserted her authority early, sending her own envoy to the North Korean nuclear talks last September, though the process has so far proved fruitless.

This spring, Ms. Rice determined that the only way to hold together the international coalition against Iran was to volunteer to join negotiations with Tehran, but only if it first agreed to suspend its production of uranium. (So far, the Iranians have refused.)

The proposal was notable because in the first term, Mr. Powell's top aides, led by Richard N. Haass, the director of policy planning, had tried and failed to promote direct engagement with the Iranians.

Ms. Rice said that when her proposal to engage Iran was presented to the president this spring, Mr. Cheney agreed that it was worth a try and that changed circumstances required a changed strategy.

"The constellations have shifted somewhat," said Dov S. Zakheim, who served as an undersecretary of defense in Mr. Bush's first term, giving an image used by others to suggest that Mr. Cheney has been partially eclipsed.

In particular, Mr. Cheney has fewer allies in crucial posts than he once did. Those who have left the administration include Paul D. Wolfowitz and Douglas J. Feith, who quit as deputy defense secretary and undersecretary of defense last year.

Mr. Cheney's associates said the departure of Mr. Libby was particularly severe. As Mr. Cheney's chief of staff, Mr. Libby served as the vice president's eyes and ears around Washington, working the bureaucratic machinery deftly and choking off ideas Mr. Cheney opposed before they rose to the Oval Office. "Scooter was a big loss," Mr. Feith said.

For his part, Mr. Cheney brushes off poll approval ratings now hovering around 20 percent.

"I suppose, sometimes, people look at my demeanor and say, well, he's the Darth Vader of the administration," Mr. Cheney told CNN in June. "I'm not running for anything. My career will end, politically, with this administration. I have the freedom and the luxury, as does the president, of doing what we think is right for the country."

Mr. Cheney still appears regularly in public, mainly in front of military crowds or campaigning for Republicans. His stump speech denounces Democrats who have called for withdrawal from Iraq and news organizations that have revealed secret counterterrorism programs.

Mr. Cheney maintains that what matters now is convincing the country that it is really at war and that defeat is not an option. And at 65, he seems willing to wait for his vindication. As Mr. Cheney recently told NBC, "History will decide how I did."

First Lady Leads Commissioning Navy Sub (AP)

By Kristen Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

The USS Texas, the Navy's newest attack submarine, was commissioned at the Port of Galveston Saturday as first lady Laura Bush gave the traditional command: "Man your ship and bring it to life!"

The submarine's commanding officer, Capt. John Litherland, and crew of 134 officers and enlisted sailors obliged, running through an applauding crowd of thousands to stand atop the vessel and salute.

"Today, at long last, she and you are ready," she told the crew. She said she and the nation were "trusting you to remind the world 'Don't Mess with Texas.'"

It is the fourth Navy ship to carry the name Texas.

"After a 13-year absence from the fleet, the proud name of Texas returns to the Navy," said Dionel Aviles, undersecretary of the Navy.

The nuclear-powered USS Texas began construction in 1999 and was delivered to the Navy in June. Its reactor is designed to not require refueling throughout the boat's service.

The 377-foot-long submarine can attack targets with Tomahawk cruise missiles and conduct long-term surveillance. It can dive to 800 feet.

DOJ_NMG_0060814

"Texas is a very elegant ship, but it is very lethal," said Mike Petters, president of Northrop Grumman Newport News, the shipbuilder.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said such strength is necessary in the nation's war on terrorism. The new submarine, he said, should "provide our war fighters with the tools for the job they have so nobly volunteered to perform."

USS Texas Grandly Welcomed Aboard (HC)

Speakers say it's needed in the war on global terror

GALVESTON — With a command from first lady Laura Bush to "man our ship and bring her to life," the 134-man crew of the USS Texas yelled "Aye-aye, ma'am" and ran aboard the newly commissioned submarine Saturday.

Thousands of guests cheered at the Port of Galveston, two Navy FA-18s roared overhead and the submarine blasted its horn and raised its five communications masts from its conning tower.

A submarine doesn't care about the weather, but the humans were lucky. Overcast skies and a breeze kept them comfortable. As the morning ceremony finished, a slow rain started. Within the hour, the heavens erupted.

The $2.7 billion USS Texas is the second in the Virginia class of fast-attack submarines. If it were a 377-foot sausage, it would cost $193 per pound.

With a first lady, a gaggle of admirals and a nuclear submarine gathered in one spot, the Navy and Coast Guard set up a bristling security perimeter. Large men carried large guns. Small boats carried large guns. Camouflage netting shielded even more large guns.

Since the ceremony was not at a Navy base, the Navy created a temporary one between the 14th Street entrance to the port and the opposite shore of Pelican Island.

Organizers set up 9,500 chairs and most were filled. But guests who didn't heed pleas to arrive two hours early stood in metal-detector lines up to 30 minutes after the ceremony started.

Virginia class submarines aren't any bigger than their ancestors. But those ships didn't have their own five-member IT department. (Perhaps they should call it the help deck.)

Views don't come through a traditional periscope but are transmitted from special cameras .

The ship is fast, stealthy and flexible. It can spy, shoot cruise missiles and torpedoes, lay mines and deliver up to nine SEALs or other special-operations forces through a special hatch either by minisub or directly into the water.

It has a dry deck to deliver special forces equipment and the ability to patrol in shallow water. Its technology is designed to be removed easily to be replaced with upgrades.

Speakers, including Texas Republican Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, emphasized the post-Cold War calling of the vessel. The global war on terror earned mention in virtually every speech.

"It's a very elegant ship, but it's very lethal," said Mike Petters, president of Northrop Grumman Newport News, which built the vessel with General Dynamics Electric Boat.

The USS Texas is the fourth Navy vessel to carry that name. Laura Bush was named the sponsor of the submarine when she was first lady of Texas. As first lady of the United States, she christened it in July 2004 where it was built in Newport News, Va.

At Saturday commissioning ceremony, which came after the vessel's sea trials, Adm. Michael Mullen noted that Bush had christened the sub with a bottle of American sparkling wine — lest anyone think it was champagne.

The Galveston crowd was colorful and cheery. Women wore sun dresses, children wore Navy blue and white, and men with red-white-and-blue ties dotted the pier. A tent full of USS Texas hats, T-shirts and coffee mugs did so much business it might have paid for the submarine.

Among the crowd were many older gentlemen in blue vests, who belonged to various chapters of the U.S. Submarine Veterans.

Joe Kruppa of La Grange served on the Kamehameha and the Hawkbill from 1966 to 1972. He came with seven other members of the group's Austin chapter.

The new sub is the same size as the old ones, he said, only nicer.

After a stay at Naval Submarine Base Kings Bay, Ga., and more testing, the USS Texas will be based at Groton, Conn. It will pull out from Galveston in the next few days.

The veterans, crew, families and other guests enjoyed a light lunch after the ceremony under a giant pavilion. They were served sodas, chips and — of course — submarine sandwiches.

This Texas Lady Is A High-tech Killer (HC)

By Mike Tolson

Houston Chronicle, September 10, 2006

GALVESTON — The long, black cylinder sits baking at water's edge in the oppressive coastal heat, its upwardly protruding wedge making it instantly recognizable as a machine not to be trifled with.

A raft of images comes to mind: tense moments of confrontation with the enemy inspired by a score of old movies and television shows. The sonar operator makes contact. The captain orders the ship to periscope depth. Everyone in the crowded command center watches the depth gauge. Finally, he climbs a few steps up to the conning tower, pushes a button and a sleek metal pole rises toward the surface.

Wait a minute ... wrong sub. That's your father's submarine, the USS Cavalla, permanently berthed a few miles away at Galveston's Seawolf Park.

This dark tube is the latest and greatest the U.S. Navy has to offer: a $2.7 billion, state-of-the-art, fast-attack sub bearing a nuclear power plant, a formidable array of weapons and every electronic bell and whistle imaginable.

But no periscope. That has been replaced by a "photonic mast," essentially a fancy digital camera that displays what it sees on a large screen. An operator moves the camera with a joystick. Submarine movies will never be the same.

The 377-foot SSN 775, to be formally commissioned as the USS Texas in a dockside ceremony this morning, is to the diesel electric subs of yore as today's F-16 is to the P-51 Mustang that battled over the skies of Europe. Both have lethal potential, but ...

The Texas' command and control center, for example, is a dark, cool and quiet place. But for its cramped quarters, it could be the nerve center of any high-tech operation. Flat-panel displays cover the walls. Highly trained technicians sit at consoles, communicating via headset. Nobody barks orders.

Like any nuclear sub, it can remain submerged for weeks at a time. It has machines that create oxygen from seawater and other machines to clean the recirculating air. The only things that compel it to surface other than a medical emergency or mechanical breakdown are food and sanity.

The Texas is the second of 10 authorized Virginia class fast-attack subs. Its home port will be in Groton, Conn., where it will serve in the Atlantic fleet.

Virginia classThe Navy has three iterations of fast-attack vessels — the fourth sub class, the Ohio, carries ballistic missiles and is much larger — with each new version featuring improvements in design and hardware. The ultimate goal is to build an attack sub that can be reconfigured for different needs, can perform a variety of missions and can be built for $2 billion.

The last goal has proved the hardest to attain.

The Virginia class, the first without a traditional periscope, has improved sonar arrays and electronic surveillance equipment, significantly more integration among the various information systems and a more flexible platform that allows it to carry special operations forces for ground missions. Its large "lockout chamber" — an airlock that allows up to nine people to move into an attached mini-sub or into the water — is a first.

"The Texas has really impressed me," said Capt. John Litherland, who will relinquish command soon as the ship goes through the final year of preparations before deployment. "Everybody says it's a revolutionary sub, but this is an incredibly new and different ship. It gathers more information together in the control room than ever before. You had to do a lot of that manually in the past."

Like all attack subs, the Texas will carry torpedoes, mines and vertically launched Tomahawk cruise missiles. Its stated speed is a vague "in excess of 25 knots," though it is widely known that attack subs can travel underwater at twice that speed. It carries a crew of 134, with no women allowed because of privacy issues.

For all its improvements — from a better backup diesel engine to a new computer-controlled oxygen generator to easily upgradeable off-the-shelf commercial computer equipment to a roomier torpedo bay — the Texas shares many traits with Cavalla and subs everywhere.

The passageways are narrow, accommodations are tight, and you can bump your head just about anywhere. Anyone needing privacy had best serve on a carrier. Even the captain's quarters on the Texas would not make for a respectable closet in most homes.

"It takes a special person to serve on a sub," said Lt. Chris Lee, the boat's chief weapons officer whose fire control system also has been improved. "Not everyone is cut out for it."

Few creature comfortsThose who choose subs get longer deployments, up to six months, and fewer creature comforts. No workout rooms or theaters on board. Sunlight and fresh air become a distant memory. One's personal space is a bunk that measures roughly seven feet by three. It does have a curtain, though.

DOJ_NMG_0060816

The good news is that because of enhanced communications equipment, sailors on the Texas can now receive e-mail almost daily. Before, weeks could pass with no communication from home.

Washington's Once And Future Lobby (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

The Jack Abramoff scandal has incited predictable outrage among Washington's political class this year, and with the midterm elections approaching, candidates across the country are promising to clean up the city's lobbying culture. Ned Lamont, Connecticut's upstart Democratic candidate for Senate, went out of his way this summer to attack the capital's influence peddlers and their patrons. "We know who the lobbyists are taking care of," he said ominously on CBS's "Face the Nation." And as Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the state's leading Republican candidate for Senate, recently proclaimed in an advertisement, "We've got congressmen on the take and lobbyists eager to make a deal. The whole system's broken."

Such theatrics notwithstanding, don't imagine for a moment that anything will really change. Lobbying has grown massively in just the past few years, becoming a multibillion-dollar industry, and it will continue to expand long after Abramoff is imprisoned and released. Lobby-law firms, trade associations, interest groups and labor unions -- known collectively as K Street -- have experienced a quantum leap in clout and are now, more than ever, a permanent and pervasive force in Washington, essential to the daily workings of government and politics. Lobbyist bashing, no matter how shrill, will not diminish that power.

Every 10 years or so, reformers have sought to rein in these paid persuaders, but the influence of lobbyists has only expanded. Today, twice as many registered lobbyists -- about 30,000 -- ply their trade than did so just six years ago. And overall spending on federal lobbying has nearly doubled, to $200.2 million per month in 2005 from $116.3 million per month in 1999. By all accounts, business is booming.

One reason behind this growth is the lobbying industry's simple-yet-dazzling economics. For a relatively small investment in a lobbying campaign, corporations can receive a gargantuan return. The Carmen Group Inc., a mid-size firm, has calculated that for every $1 million its clients spend on its services, it delivers, on average, $100 million in government benefits. A yield that immense, common in federal lobbying, is unheard of anyplace else.

K Street wasn't always so lucrative. In the 1990s, lobbying was mostly a defensive effort, with corporate interests fending off unwanted restrictions. But in this decade, industries have increasingly gone on the offensive, treating Washington like a profit center rather than a place to minimize losses. Since President Bush took office in 2001, the White House and both legislative chambers have been controlled by pro-business politicians, and corporations have lined up for tax breaks and lighter regulations. In Bush's first term, Congress passed and the president signed five bills containing significant corporate and personal tax cuts.

At the same time, the size of government has ballooned, and lawmakers have become ever more willing to share the wealth. Federal spending grew by 49 percent from 2000 to 2006, to $2.66 trillion. And an increasing share of that amount was handed out in narrowly focused projects called earmarks, for which an entire sub-industry of lobbyists has emerged. According to the Congressional Research Service, the number of earmarks in appropriations bills alone more than tripled to 15,887 in 2005 from 4,155 in 1994 -- and most of them were shepherded by lobbyists.

Earmarking is not hard work. Lobbyist Jeffrey S. Shockey earned about $2 million from four dozen clients in 2004 and he needed only one associate, people familiar with his operation said. All a lobbyist must do is fill out some forms and write up a short proposal for the money; find a lawmaker (preferably on either the House or Senate appropriations committee) to sponsor the earmark; and make a few follow-up calls during the year to the lawmaker's staffers, nudging them to move the proposal along. In return, lobbyists try to keep their lawmakers happy. Shockey kept in particularly close touch; he is now a top aide to his frequent patron, Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Some companies previously shunned such back-scratching as distasteful -- and paid a heavy price. Microsoft Corp. didn't hire a full-fledged staff of lobbyists or donate heavily to political causes until after the Justice Department sued it for antitrust behavior in 1998. Dozens of corporations learned from Microsoft's mistake and opened their own D.C. offices. In just the past couple of years, Google, Valero Energy Corp., Herbalife International, Walgreens and GoDaddy.com have opened for business in the District. Wal-Mart has also beefed up its presence as Democrats have attacked its business practices. And the hedge fund industry, worried about attracting extra regulation, has tripled the amount it spends on federal lobbyists since 2003, so far to sterling effect.

Government has become so complex that only experts -- say, ex-congressional staff members turned lobbyists -- can decipher and navigate it. Anyone who wants to penetrate the system has little choice but to hire lobbying firms. And for good reason: Washington is no longer the insular and distant regulator it was before World War II. It insinuates itself into almost every facet of Americans' lives, from school assessments to corporate accounting to homeland security.

In turn, lawmakers have come to rely on lobbyists to provide much of their campaign cash, most of the information and voter support that propel their legislative initiatives, and many of the off-hour perks that keep them well-traveled and well-fed. These benefits are so valuable that Congress -- even faced with an ornery, anti-Washington electorate -- is poised to pass, as soon as this week, a sliver of an already weak lobby-reform bill, and discard anything that would limit its contact with lobbyists. Almost no one on Capital Hill wants to discourage the sugar daddies on K.

Lobby groups have become players in virtually everything government does; often, they are the key players. During the first six months of 2005, for example, the AARP (and its $20 million advertising and lobbying blitz) was instrumental in shooting down Bush's plan to add private accounts to Social Security. And this year, a Republican bill that would have combined a minimum-wage increase with a cut in the estate tax was stopped dead by a coalition of labor unions led by UNITE HERE, which publicized a provision in the bill that could have reduced wages for some workers who rely on tips. At least five senators cited the provision as a major reason they voted no.

One bill that did pass this summer updated the nation's pension and trade laws; like every other piece of legislation, it was shaped by lobbying. Representatives for Delta and Northwest airlines won special pension protections to ease their financial woes. And at least 73 imported products -- such as nail clippers and vicuÃ±a hair -- received targeted tariff relief, virtually all because of pressure from Washington lobbyists.

Despite the latest scandals, lobbying has become a respectable, appealing profession. A couple of decades ago, it was considered too unsavory to attract former Congress members. But now, lobbyists have become so influential -- and so rich -- that more and more lawmakers and their aides consider the profession a second career. A recent study by the liberal group Public Citizen reported that nearly half of all lawmakers who return to the private sector join the lobbying ranks. Former top congressional officials can easily earn $300,000 a year or more as lobbyists -- or about double their government salaries.

Many former lawmakers are proud to be lobbyists and consider themselves part of a vital establishment -- one sometimes known as the Fifth Estate, after the three branches of government and the media. This level of comfort has no doubt made contacts between lobbyists and lawmakers increasingly sympathetic. Why would congressional aides and lawmakers want to anger the lobbyists who approach them when they aspire to become lobbyists themselves?

Former congressman Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.) remembers fondly when he was looking for work as a lobbyist in 1998 and interviewed at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP. "It was such a pleasure," he said. He sat down with senior partner Robert S. Strauss, who told him, "Bill, we're not in this for the short term. We want to hire people who will offer quality advice to quality clients for a long period of time." And, Paxon said, "that's proven true." He has been a senior adviser at the firm since 1999. He is also part of a lobbying family; Paxon's wife, former congresswoman Susan Molinari (R-N.Y.), is chairman of a firm named the Washington Group.

As Paxon discovered, lobby companies and associations are built to last. Akin Gump and most other K Street organizations are carefully populated with Republicans and Democrats so that they can stay in business no matter which party runs the show. They also donate big bucks to politicians of both parties. In fact, most of the money raised by House members is collected either "by or through groups that lobby," said Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. Senators also receive a lot of their dough from the K Street set. (Members of the House and Senate spent a total of $623.4 million for their 2004 reelection campaigns.) All of which makes the anti-lobbyist rhetoric ring rather hollow. Even lobbying antagonists have their ties. Connecticut's Lamont accepts contributions from so-called leadership political action committees, which routinely receive money from labor and corporate organizations. And Lt. Gov. Steele's coffers have swelled thanks to fundraising by a group of Republican lobbyists in Washington that unabashedly calls itself Team Steele.

"Lobbyist-bashing may provide some convenient sound bites this fall, but it doesn't have much of a connection to the way Washington normally operates," said Alex Vogel of the bipartisan lobbying shop Mehlman Vogel Castagnetti. He should know. Vogel is a former chief counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). As the company's Web site notes, "Alex's engagement with Majority Leader Frist continues. He currently provides counsel to Volunteer PAC, the Majority Leader's political action committee, and World of Hope, his charitable organization."

Such connections are hard, if not impossible, to break. "For the more than 30 years I've been around here, people have always complained about lobbyists," said Wright H. Andrews Jr. of the lobbying firm Butera & Andrews. "But they don't understand. My own mother didn't understand. She cried when I told her what I was going to do." But he explained, "After people have been here a while, they find out that the lobbying community is an essential part of the legislative process."

Joel Jankowsky knows this firsthand. He left the staff of House Speaker Carl B. Albert in 1977 and became the first official lobbyist at Akin Gump. Now, nearly 30 years later, Jankowsky oversees 45 full-time lobbyists and a dozen other professionals who plead before government regularly. He and his colleagues serve 161 clients and generate nearly $30 million in annual revenue. His once-rare transition from top congressional aide to private lobbyist has become common, and his firm's practice continues to bloom.

DOJ_NMG_0060818

After the midterm elections, Jankowsky predicts, the lobbying industry will get even busier and grow larger -- no matter which party prevails. History says he's right.

Shuttle Lifts Off Without Incident After Delay (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., Sept. 9 — The space shuttle Atlantis made a thunderous ascent into cloud-studded skies on Saturday morning, carrying its crew of six to a rendezvous with the International Space Station.

After two weeks of postponements caused by bad weather and nagging mechanical problems, the Atlantis lifted off on time, at 11:14:55 a.m.

About 10 minutes later — after a blazing rise into the sky, the yellow flames of its booster rockets visible through holes in billowing cloud banks — the shuttle slipped into orbit.

“Your long wait is over,” Michael D. Leinbach, the NASA launch director, told the crew just before liftoff.

After achieving orbit, the shuttle opened its payload bay doors while its crew of five men and one woman began preparations for a Monday rendezvous with the space station. During an intense 11-day mission, the astronauts will resume construction of the station after a more than three-year hiatus that followed the loss of the shuttle Columbia.

A preliminary look at images from launching and ascent showed several incidents in which debris came off the external tank and may have struck the orbiter, said N. Wayne Hale, the shuttle program manager. However, Mr. Hale said, the earliest “dribbly streams” of debris occurred more than four minutes after liftoff, at a time when the air was so thin that the pieces posed little risk to the craft or crew. No damage has been detected so far, he said.

“The bottom line is,” he said, “we are looking at nits, nothing of any remote consequence.”

NASA has closely monitored liftoff debris since the Columbia and its crew were lost in February 2003 in a disaster caused by foam falling from the fuel tank and punching a hole in the craft’s heat shield. The space agency spent more than two years redesigning the tank to prevent most such debris shedding.

The fuel tank sensor that forced postponement of Atlantis’ launching attempt on Friday appeared to work normally during early morning fueling of the 500,000-gallon tank holding propellant for the shuttle’s three main engines. Since Aug. 27, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration had been trying to launch Atlantis on its mission to resume construction of the space station since. A lightning strike on the launching pad, a looming tropical storm and equipment problems with a shuttle power generator and the fuel sensor forced repeated delays.

“What you saw today was a flawless count, a majestic launch, and it was tough to get here,” the NASA administrator, Michael D. Griffin, said at a news conference about an hour after liftoff. “Not everything in the count leading up to this day was easy. And in between we had to dodge tropical storms, lightning strikes and things like that. But we got here and it was just a flawless day.”

The shuttle had to be launched this weekend to avoid interfering with a planned Russian launch of a Soyuz spacecraft carrying a new crew to the space station on Sept. 18, and the return of the laboratory’s crew to earth on Sept. 29. A delay would have forced NASA to wait until at least the end of September to try again.

Construction of the half-built space station stopped when shuttles were grounded after the Columbia accident. NASA is eager to resume building the orbiting outpost by having Atlantis taking up a 35,000-pound girder section that includes a new set of solar power arrays.

Delayed Atlantis Makes 'Majestic' Launch (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. -- The shuttle Atlantis, America's long-haul space truck, returned to duty Saturday, blasting into orbit with a 17-ton load of construction material for the International Space Station.

Atlantis roared off pad 39B on the last possible day of the launch window, following two weeks of delays caused by bad weather and minor mechanical glitches.

"What we saw today was a flawless countdown and a majestic launch," said NASA Administrator Michael Griffin.

NASA cameras captured images of five incidents of ice and insulating foam flaking off the shuttle's external fuel tank. At least one piece of foam appeared to hit the underside of the craft.

DOJ_NMG_0060819

Analysts at Johnson Space Center in Houston were studying the pictures late Saturday. But space agency officials said it was unlikely the debris could have damaged the spacecraft because the pieces were small.

The first piece of debris appeared to come off about four minutes after launch. By that time, the shuttle is 325,000 feet above Earth, where the air is too thin to accelerate debris to the speeds necessary to cause damage.

"Anything that comes off that late is of no consequence," said N. Wayne Hale Jr., the shuttle program manager.

Hale and others stressed that the analysis of images taken by more than 100 cameras on the shuttle and at the launch site in central Florida has just begun. It will take several days to determine fully if the craft is undamaged.

The shuttle's six-person crew is scheduled to use a boom with attached sensors Sunday to inspect the critical leading edges of the wings, which are covered by delicate heat-resistant reinforced carbon.

Another round of inspections will be performed Monday, when Atlantis docks with the space station. Shuttle mission commander Brent Jett will put the craft into a maneuver resembling a diver's back flip as it approaches the station. That will expose the underside of Atlantis to the station's three crew members so they can take pictures.

Those precautions were instituted after the Columbia tragedy in 2003. The shuttle was damaged during launch by a piece of foam and broke up during re-entry when aerodynamic forces tore open the left wing.

This is the third mission since NASA returned to spaceflight last year, but it will be the first mission in four years to resume work on the half-built space station.

In its payload bay, Atlantis carries a massive truss and a set of solar arrays that will double the amount of power the station produces.

When unfurled, the solar arrays will be 240 feet long. Each of the 82 array "blankets" contains 16,400 photovoltaic cells. The truss will serve as a new piece of the station's spine, where future laboratories and crew containers will be attached.

NASA is hurrying to finish building the station before the shuttle is retired in 2010. This mission will be one of the most complicated in the history of the shuttle program, officials said.

The crew is scheduled to take three spacewalks, beginning Tuesday with the installation of the truss on the port side of the station. The solar array also will be released from its housing. The work will be finished on the spacewalks Thursday and Friday.

Atlantis' mission was delayed several times, first by bad weather and then by mechanical problems, including an old problem with sensors that shut down the engines when they get low on fuel.

The glitches were exacerbated by the fact that Atlantis had not flown in four years. The orbiter underwent extensive modifications since its last launch.

In the end, none of the mechanical problems affected the launch.

Atlantis Takes Off For Space Station (WP)

By William Harwood, Special to The Washington Post

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Shuttle to Dock Monday, Begin Week's Work

CAPE CANAVERAL, Sept. 9 -- The shuttle Atlantis rocketed into orbit Saturday on a long-awaited mission to resume assembly of the space station 3 1/2 years after the 2003 Columbia disaster.

Running two weeks late because of bad weather and technical glitches, Atlantis roared to life and climbed away from its ocean-side pad at 11:15 a.m. Atlantis, which at liftoff weighed 4.5 million pounds, hit 100 mph in just seven seconds, climbing away atop a brilliant plume of 5,000-degree flame and churning clouds of exhaust.

A camera mounted on the shuttle's external tank provided spectacular views as Atlantis wheeled about and lined up on a trajectory up the East Coast, homing in on the space station.

More important, the camera showed no obvious signs of damage from several pieces of foam insulation seen breaking away from the shuttle's external fuel tank four minutes after liftoff, past the time of aerodynamic danger.

Although it will take several days to carry out a detailed analysis, the mission appeared to get off to a good start, and 8 1/2 minutes after launch, traveling at five miles per second, Atlantis slipped into its initial orbit.

"What you saw today was a flawless count, a majestic launch -- and it was tough to get here," said NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin. "Not everything in the count leading up to this day was easy. And in between we had to dodge tropical storms, lightning strikes and things like that. But we got here, and it was just a flawless day."

Atlantis's commander, Brent W. Jett Jr., is joined by pilot Christopher J. Ferguson, flight engineer Daniel C. Burbank, veteran spacewalker Joseph R. Tanner, mission specialist Heidemarie M. Stefanyshyn-Piper and Canadian astronaut Steve MacLean.

DOJ_NMG_0060820

If all goes well, Jett will guide Atlantis to a linkup with the space station early Monday, kicking off a busy week of work to install and connect a huge set of solar arrays and a massive rotary joint that will slowly spin the panels like a waterwheel to keep them aimed at the sun as the lab circles the globe.

NASA originally planned to install the 35,000-pound, $372 million truss in 2003, but assembly flights were put on hold after the Columbia disaster.

Atlantis's flight is the third mission since flights resumed last year, intended to be the first in a series of complex flights to build out the lab's main solar array truss and clear the way for attachment of European and Japanese research modules.

"In my opinion, every one of these flights we're flying in the next 12 to 18 months ranks right up there as the most complicated flights we've ever flown, including Hubble Space Telescope repair missions," said Paul Hill, mission operations manager at the Johnson Space Center.

The space station currently consists of six pressurized modules, three provided by NASA and three by the Russian space agency. The four largest modules are in a row, lined up with the station's direction of travel.

An unfinished truss, which eventually will be as long as a football field and will sport two sets of solar panels at each end, is attached to the top of the U.S. Destiny laboratory module at right angles to the axis formed by the pressurized modules.

The arrays in Atlantis's cargo bay will be attached to the truss's side.

Burbank will use the shuttle's robotic arm to pull the 45-foot-long payload from Atlantis's cargo bay a few hours after docking and hand it off to MacLean, operating the station's larger Canadarm 2.

They will leave the truss on the end of the station's arm until the next day, when MacLean will position it so four motorized bolts can lock it in place on the left end of the main truss. Tanner and Piper will begin the first of two back-to-back spacewalks to make critical electrical connections and unlatch various launch restraints.

The second spacewalk will be carried out by MacLean and Burbank, followed the next day by extension of the new arrays, which will stretch 240 feet from tip to tip. A third spacewalk, by Tanner and Piper, is planned the following day to complete truss setup and to upgrade the station's antennas.

If all goes well, Atlantis could return to Earth on Sept. 20. But the flight is likely to be extended one day if onboard supplies allow the crew time to inspect the shuttle's heat shield or handle unexpected problems.

NIH Audit Criticizes Scientist's Dealings (LAT)

By David Willman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

A researcher received more than $100,000 from drug firms. The agency calls it 'serious misconduct' but has issued no penalty.

WASHINGTON — A senior researcher at the National Institutes of Health engaged in "serious misconduct" by entering into dozens of unauthorized private arrangements with drug companies and failing to report annually the outside income, totaling more than $100,000, a confidential internal review by the agency has found.

Officials at the NIH concluded late last year that the actions of Dr. Thomas J. Walsh, who has helped lead major clinical trials involving cancer patients, might result in dismissal from federal government service. No disciplinary action has been taken.

The internal review, conducted by lawyers and other ethics specialists within the office of the NIH director, found that from 1999 to 2004, Walsh received fees totaling $100,970 from pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies. He accepted fees from 25 companies and has led government-sponsored research involving some of those companies' drugs.

"Dr. Walsh has engaged in serious misconduct, in violation of the Department's Standards of Conduct Regulations … and federal law and regulation," the review concluded.

The previously unreported findings shed light on the depth of conflict-of-interest problems that have persisted at the NIH — the government's preeminent agency for medical research on humans. The NIH's handling of disciplinary decisions related to Walsh and other senior scientists is expected to be a focus of a congressional hearing scheduled for Thursday.

In written comments to NIH ethics officials, private attorneys for Walsh said that the agency's rules were complicated and that his motives were beyond reproach. NIH officials said the rules were well known and should have been followed.

"Dr. Walsh fails to acknowledge that the reason for the 'complex set of rules' governing NIH staff in regards to real or potential conflicts of interest is to prevent the integrity of the agency and its science from being called into question," the summary said. "His assertions that his reputation is sufficient to dismiss any questions about his impartiality cannot be the standard that he or the agency use in deciding to adhere to well-publicized rules."

The summary, dated in December, also said that Walsh's "conduct continued over time and involved at least 38 separate instances where he chose not to follow agency procedures. He actively chose not to adhere to policies because it was inconvenient or time-consuming; he knew it was likely his participation [with the drug companies] would have been disapproved. His actions reflected negatively upon the agency."

The Los Angeles Times obtained copies of the internal findings and conclusions last week. Based on interviews and documents gathered earlier, the newspaper reported in July that Walsh had appeared alongside company representatives at public and private meetings held by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and that he received fees from Merck & Co. and Pfizer Inc., with whom he has collaborated in his government work. Clinical trials he helped lead influenced FDA approvals of three antifungal drugs.

Walsh's appearances at the FDA meetings — with representatives of Merck, Pfizer Inc., and Fujisawa USA Inc. — are the subject of a newly opened inquiry by the NIH director's Office of Management Assessment, according to people familiar with the matter.

U.S. conflict-of-interest law generally prohibits a federal employee from representing an outside party before a government agency, regardless of whether the employee accepts payment for the appearance.

Another NIH review, which ended three months ago, "did not identify issues of concern with the design or methodology" used in two clinical trials overseen by Walsh. When results of those trials were published, in 1999 and 2004, other research physicians had questioned in letters to the New England Journal of Medicine whether cancer patients with suspected fungal infections were given "control" drugs at dosages that were strong enough to be effective.

Reached briefly by phone on Friday, Walsh referred questions to NIH press aides. He earlier declined to answer questions from The Times regarding details of his arrangements with several companies, but also said that he had never served as a representative or advocate for any pharmaceutical company.

Members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee's investigative subcommittee are expected to question officials at the hearing this week about their handling of ethics matters, including the cases of Walsh and another senior NIH researcher, Dr. P. Trey Sunderland III.

Sunderland, who has specialized in researching Alzheimer's disease, accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in drug-company fees — including about $612,000 from Pfizer — without obtaining required advance approval. In June, Sunderland asserted his 5th Amendment right against self-incrimination while declining to answer questions before the congressional subcommittee.

Neither Sunderland nor Walsh has been publicly disciplined, and each maintains his senior government position. Directly or through their lawyers, Sunderland and Walsh have said that they aimed to advance research that benefits patients. Both have worked for more than 20 years at the NIH as members of the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, a uniformed branch of the service that is led by the surgeon general.

Officials at the NIH have said recently that they lack authority to discipline members of the corps — several of whose members have drawn scrutiny related to conflict of interest. The summary of the NIH internal report on Walsh noted, implicitly, his status within the corps: "It has been determined by the Office of Human Resources [at NIH] that if he were a civilian employee, his actions would lead to a recommendation for his proposed removal."

The Bush administration official that oversees the surgeon general and the corps, Assistant Secretary for Health John O. Agwunobi, said through an aide that he could not discuss details of the pending cases because of privacy concerns.

"The commissioned corps is very concerned about these allegations and will take appropriate action should wrongdoing be found," said Christina Pearson, a Health and Human Services Department spokeswoman. "However, our review must be coordinated with other reviews already in process."

Walsh was referred to a corps administrator nine months ago "for action" by a deputy NIH director, Dr. Raynard S. Kington, and by Dr. John Niederhuber, the then-acting director of the National Cancer Institute.

Walsh, 54, a medical graduate of Johns Hopkins University, arrived at the National Cancer Institute in 1986 and now heads a pediatric research and treatment unit. Walsh is well recognized in his field and has won government honors. Along the way, he collaborated with drug companies in his official role and, privately, as a paid advisor or speaker.

The industry compensation received by Walsh and Sunderland came to light because of a series of events over the past three years: After The Times reported in December 2003 that ranking NIH officials had received hundreds of company consulting payments or grants of stock or stock options, the House committee asked the agency to disclose all such transactions over a five-year period. When the NIH was slow to respond to the committee's broad request, lawmakers elicited information from 21 drug companies.

The companies' responses identified scores of NIH researchers who were not previously known to have received payments. One company, Merck, listed fees to Walsh that had not been reported to the NIH. Meanwhile, NIH Director Elias A. Zerhouni also was urging employees to report any previously undisclosed outside arrangements.

DOJ_NMG_0060822

For Walsh, the first questions from NIH ethics officials centered on his arrangements with Merck. The NIH's internal review found that, at the same time Walsh accepted $3,000 in fees for attending separate Merck-sponsored events in 2000 and 2001, he was leading a formal "cooperative research and development agreement" between Merck and the National Cancer Institute.

Months before his case was referred for possible disciplinary action, the NIH ethics review panel concluded privately that Walsh should not have engaged in the simultaneous government and paid arrangements with Merck.

"The review panel finds that the scientific subject matter of the activities overlap directly with Dr. Walsh's research at NIH," the agency's chief ethics lawyer, Holli Beckerman Jaffe, wrote in June 2005.

"In addition, while Dr. Walsh was a paid speaker for Merck on two occasions, he was collaborating with Merck, and one of its competitors, in his official capacity," Jaffe said. "Accordingly, the panel finds his unapproved outside activities with Merck to be highly problematic."

A subsequent summary of the NIH's internal review added, "this situation is one in which a reasonable person could question Dr. Walsh's impartiality."

The new documents show that when Merck paid Walsh a $2,000 fee in September 2000, it was to discuss the company's new antifungal drug, Cancidas, at a company-sponsored meeting with medical-opinion leaders in Montreal.

Four months later, Merck identified Walsh as a consultant at an FDA advisory committee meeting at which the company made its case for the drug's approval.

Walsh told the FDA committee on Jan. 10, 2001, that, based on his and his government staff's review of data from a Merck study, Cancidas effectively combats a fungal infection called aspergillus. The committee unanimously recommended approval.

Later that month, FDA staff approved Merck's application to market Cancidas. Through 2005, the drug had generated $859 million in U.S. sales.

And, in the months leading up to an October 2001 FDA advisory committee meeting on Pfizer's antifungal drug, Walsh received $12,000 in fees for conferring three times with company representatives, the internal NIH documents show. Walsh has said he did not accept company payment for appearing at any FDA meeting.

Walsh's lawyers have said in letters to NIH officials that his government decisions were not swayed by the compensation from Merck or any other company. They also have stressed Walsh's diligence throughout his career.

Jaffe, the NIH ethics lawyer, told officials in a memo that if Walsh had sought permission to accept compensation from Merck, "it is highly unlikely that Dr. Walsh would have been granted approval."

CDC Brain Drain? (AJC)

By Alison Young, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 10, 2006

By the end of this year, most of the people who lead CDC's key scientific centers — in some cases for a decade — will be gone. The wave of departures began in 2004, about a year after Dr. Julie Gerberding launched her strategic "Futures Initiative" to transform the agency, and not quite two years after she was named CDC director.

Most of the former directors of CDC's scientific centers declined to talk publicly for this article, citing the close-knit world of public health that requires them to still work with CDC. The reorganization and questions about the agency's leadership and direction were factors for some of those who left, they said privately.

While CDC employment data do not indicate significant jumps in overall employee departures, many current and former employees said they are concerned that the agency's morale problems will spur more to leave.

Last year, for instance, 46 CDC staffers who are also members of the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps retired from the agency — the largest group of retirees in a decade; in those other years just 26 have retired on average, employment data show. The 850 CDC employees who are Corps members are eligible to retire after 20 years of service, but often work much longer. They historically have been the source of much of the agency's senior scientific leadership.

Recent efforts by Washington to make the corps more regimented, with a greater emphasis on such things as wearing uniforms and meeting physical fitness tests, may be contributing to commissioned officers retiring sooner than they might have, some CDC officials said. But among CDC's 4,298 science staff overall, 63 retired and 131 resigned last year, numbers that show no clear trend in recent years.

Losing highly qualified people — whether it's caused by turmoil or simply the natural progression of aging workers — is a problem, government service experts said.

"What's special about CDC is it has a lot of expertise in highly specialized fields," said Max Stier, president of the Partnership for Public Service, a Washington-based nonprofit that is concerned about a federal retirement wave that's expected to crest between 2008 and 2010. "We have a massive problem that very few people are focusing on," he said. "It's like rust, not engine failure."

Among those who have left CDC or have recently announced they are leaving:

Dr. Jose Cordero

Director, National Center on Birth Defects and Developmental Disabilities, since 2001. Left the directorship last month to become dean of the University of Puerto Rico, his alma mater. Joined CDC in 1979. "For me, it was the stars aligned for me to return," Cordero said. "I was not looking for a job."

Dr. James Marks

Director, National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, since 1995. Left CDC in November 2004. Became senior vice president and director of the health group at the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation. Joined CDC first from 1976-1978, then continuously there since 1980. Marks declined to comment.

Dr. Richard Jackson

Director, National Center for Environmental Health, 1994 through July 2003. Left CDC's headquarters in 2004, after being an adviser to the CDC director. He took a CDC assignment to the state of California, then continued with CDC at the University of California. "All of these moves have been voluntary on my part," he said.

Dr. James Hughes

Director, National Center for Infectious Diseases, since 1992. Left CDC in 2005 to become director, Program in Global Infectious Diseases and Center for Global Safe Water, at Emory University. Hughes declined to comment. He was at CDC from 1973-1975, then continuously since 1978.

Dr. Stephen Ostroff

Deputy Director, National Center for Infectious Diseases, since 2002. Left CDC in March 2005 to become representative to the Pacific Islands for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "My plan had always been when I got to 20 years I would retire" in Hawaii, Ostroff said. Joined CDC in 1986.

Dr. Sue Binder

Director, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, since 2000. Left in August 2004 to become a private consultant on public health and management issues. Binder declined to comment. She joined CDC in 1984.

Dr. Harold Jaffe

Director, National Center for HIV, STD and TB Prevention, since 2001. Left in June 2004 to become a professor of public health at the University of Oxford in England. Jaffe declined to comment. Was at CDC first from 1974-1977, then continuously since 1980.

Dr. Ronald Valdiserri

Deputy Director, National Center for HIV, STD and TB Prevention, since 1996. Leaving this month to become chief consultant for the Public Health Strategic Health Care Group at the Veterans Health Administration. Valdiserri declined to comment. He joined CDC in 1989.

Dr. Walter Orenstein

Director, National Immunization Program (and its predecessor), since 1988. Left CDC in April 2004 to become associate director of the Emory Vaccine Center. "I left CDC because of a great opportunity," he said. He was at CDC from 1974-1977, then continuously since 1980.

Dr. Roger Glass

Chief, CDC Viral Gastroenteritis Section, since 1986. Left CDC in May 2006 to go to the National Institutes of Health to be director of the Fogarty International Center. He commutes between Bethesda, Md., and Atlanta, where his wife is chair of pediatrics at Emory University. Glass was unavailable for comment, an assistant said.

Dr. Rick Steketee

Chief, CDC Malaria Branch, since 2000. Left CDC in January 2005 to become deputy director of the Malaria Control and Evaluation Partnership in Africa, a program of an international public health nonprofit called PATH. He joined CDC in 1983.

Dr. Harold Margolis

Chief, Division of Viral Hepatitis, since 1987. Left CDC in June 2004 to become director of the Pediatric Dengue Vaccine Initiative of the International Vaccine Institute in Seoul, Korea. "To be honest, I wasn't having fun anymore," said Margolis, who said changes at CDC caused him to leave. He had been with the agency since 1975.

James LeDuc

Pandemic coordinator and former director, Division of Viral and Rickettsial Diseases, now disassembled. Leaving CDC in November to direct global health at the University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston. "I wasn't looking for a job," said LeDuc, with CDC since 1992. "I have tremendous respect for Dr. Gerberding."

U.S. Stocks Fall This Week; Housing Slump Stokes Growth Concern (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, September 10, 2006

Sept. 9 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks declined this week on concern a deepening housing-market slump will slow the economic expansion and limit increases in corporate profits.

Exxon Mobil Corp., the biggest oil company, and other energy stocks led the drop as crude oil sank to a five-month low. Data showing labor costs climbed last quarter also weighed on the market by reviving speculation the Federal Reserve will resume raising interest rates to curb inflation.

``Earnings growth is going to slow," said Joseph Keating, who manages about $3 billion as chief investment officer at Birmingham, Alabama-based First American Asset. ``You have to lower your expectations" for stock-market returns.

Viacom Inc. plunged after the media company ousted Chief Executive Officer Tom Freston. Intel Corp., the world's largest semiconductor maker, slipped after proposing fewer job cuts than some analysts had forecast.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index lost 0.9 percent to 1298.92. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 0.6 percent to 11,392.11, and the Nasdaq Composite Index slumped 1.3 percent to 2165.79.

Economic-growth concern was stoked by signs the housing market slowdown is steeper than had been anticipated.

Two homebuilders, KB Home and Beazer Homes USA Inc., this week cut their profit forecasts and Lennar Corp., the third-largest U.S. builder by stock-market value, missed its own earnings projection. The National Association of Realtors said home prices may drop for the first time since 1993.

Oil fell on signs U.S. fuel inventories will be sufficient as economic growth in the world's biggest energy consumer slows.

Productivity, Labor Costs

Expectations that the Fed might resume boosting rates, after pausing its two-year policy of higher borrowing costs last month, were fueled by government data on employment.

The productivity of U.S. workers slowed last quarter while labor costs jumped at a revised 4.9 percent annual rate, exceeding economists' estimates, according to a Labor Department report.

Crude fell 4.2 percent this week to $66.25 in New York, the lowest close since April 4. Energy companies in the S&P 500 lost 3.7 percent for the top loss among 10 industry groups in the index.

Exxon fell 1.9 percent to $66.81 for the Dow average's No. 3 drop. Valero Energy Corp., North America's largest refiner, lost 10 percent to $51.75, the second-steepest drop in the S&P 500.

Intel

Viacom slipped 6.5 percent this week to $34.55. The company, controlled by billionaire Sumner Redstone, said board member Philippe Dauman will take over for Freston. Merrill Lynch & Co. cut the shares to ``neutral," citing ``significant uncertainty" about the management change.

Intel lost 2.2 percent to $19.45 for the second-steepest drop in the Dow average. The company plans to eliminate 10,500 jobs. Analysts, including David Wu at Global Crown Capital and Doug Freedman at American Technology Research, said they had expected Chief Executive Officer Paul Otellini to cut more jobs in the largest overhaul of Intel's operations since the 1980s.

Homebuilders in S&P indexes lost 3.1 percent. KB Home slipped 4.9 percent to $40.35. Beazer declined 7.6 percent to $37.24, and Lennar fell 4.6 percent to $42.71.

S&P 500 members that produce raw-materials such as gold, silver and paper lost 1.6 percent, the No. 2 slide in the index.

Newmont, Temple-Inland

Newmont Mining Corp. slid 5.9 percent to $48.19. The world's second-biggest gold producer was downgraded to ``sector perform" from ``outperform" by analyst Stephen Walker at RBC Capital Markets, who cited challenges in managing costs and lower production.

Temple-Inland Inc. fell 7.4 percent to $41.94. The real- estate developer and forest-products maker said third-quarter corrugated shipments will fall after the company sold a plant and shut another temporarily.

Apollo Group Inc. lost 5.8 percent to $47.87. The operator of for-profit colleges faces trial on charges that it obtained at least $3 billion in federal funds even as it paid recruiters according to the number of students enrolled, the Chronicle of Higher Education reported. U.S. Education Department rules forbid such payments, the Chronicle said.

DOJ_NMG_0060825

Procter & Gamble Co. lost 1.2 percent to $61.14. The largest U.S. consumer-products maker forecast first-quarter profit of 76 cents to 78 cents a share. The average estimate from analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial is 78 cents. Thomson doesn't disclose the parameters of its figures to Bloomberg News.

Hershey Co. fell 5.4 percent to $51.34. The biggest U.S. chocolate maker was cut to ``neutral'' from ``overweight'' by J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. analyst Pablo Zuanic. He said the company may not meet its annual sales forecast and may have lost market share.

What If The Economy Doesn't Land? (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

INVESTORS have been placing their bets on whether the economy will experience a hard or soft landing. One Wall Street veteran suggests a third possible outcome — no landing at all — and he will be looking at data this week to help weigh the odds of its occurrence.

Edward E. Yardeni, chief investment strategist at Oak Associates, expects reports on consumer prices and retail sales to be tame enough to persuade the Federal Reserve to hold interest rates steady when its policy makers meet on Sept. 20. That may just give the economy the breathing room it needs, he said, to avoid an appreciable slowdown, let alone the recession that some commentators have said is a serious possibility.

Mr. Yardeni foresees a 0.2 percent increase in the Consumer Price Index, excluding food and energy items, for August and an increase of 0.4 percent or so in August retail sales. A Bloomberg News poll of economists predicts increases of 0.2 percent for the C.P.I., to be announced on Friday, and 0.3 percent for retail sales, to be reported the previous day.

If the price index comes in "somewhere between a disturbing 0.3 and a happier 0.1," he said, "the Fed will look at it in the context of an economy that is still growing, although with significant weakness in housing, and that is behaving itself in a way that the Fed anticipated when it paused at the last meeting."

It may not happen often in Washington, but the central bank appears to be two for two in achieving its policy aims.

"One of the Fed's objectives a year ago was to take the froth out of housing, and it has significantly done that," Mr. Yardeni said. "It also set out to keep energy from affecting core inflation. There is evidence that that's the case."

The benign numbers that he expects are consistent with 3.5 percent annual growth in economic output and 2 percent core inflation, which he described as "the kind of growth you get when the economy is expanding at trend pace." It is a set of conditions that should be good for the stock market, he said.

In fact, the talk among traders may soon turn to the next Fed rate cut, Mr. Yardeni said, and he pointed out how soothing that topic of conversation would be, compared with others in recent months that have produced "one anxiety attack after another."

"We've spent the whole year going through a litany of fears, from bird flu to monetary overkill to bursting the housing bubble," he recalled. "I'm exhausted listing all the things to worry about, but none of these things has affected the economy or corporate earnings."

DATA WATCH The first key report of the week, on Tuesday, will examine the nation's trade account. In the Bloomberg poll, imports are expected to have exceeded exports by $65.5 billion in July, compared with $64.8 billion in June.

Behind That Sense Of Job Insecurity (NYT)

By Daniel Gross

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

JOBS today seem as long-lasting as the petals of a flower. Virtually every week brings news of large-scale corporate layoffs. On Tuesday, the day after Labor Day, Intel said it would reduce its work force by 10,500, or about 10 percent.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the United States economy — a giant job-churning machine — each quarter destroys nearly 7 percent of existing jobs and creates a roughly equivalent percentage. Even for those at the top rungs of the labor ladder, job stability isn't what it used to be. Burson-Marsteller, the public relations firm, reported earlier this year that 470 of the Fortune 1000 companies have changed C.E.O.'s since 2000.

Yet labor economists, who prefer sifting through reams of yesterday's data to parsing today's headlines, detect a seemingly counterintuitive trend. During the last few decades, job stability and job tenure for the typical worker don't seem to have changed much, if at all.

DOJ_NMG_0060826

Ann Stevens, an associate professor of economics at the University of California, Davis, has looked through a time series — interviews with men between the ages of 58 and 62 conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics and other research groups at intervals from 1969 to 2002.

She found that in 1969, the average tenure of the longest job a man had held in his career was 21.9 years. In 2002, the figure was only marginally smaller: 21.4 years. In both 1969 and 2002, about half of those interviewed had spent more than two decades with a single employer.

"I'm not convinced there has been a dramatic change," said Professor Stevens, who presented her findings in a National Bureau of Economic Research working paper.

That conclusion may seem surprising, given the heightened media and political attention to outsourcing, corporate overhauls and layoffs — and given the peculiar dynamics of the late 1990's, when low unemployment, significant job growth and technological advances led many people to switch jobs voluntarily.

"In those years, companies couldn't hold on to workers," said David Neumark, a professor of economics at the University of California, Irvine.

Recent evidence indicates that jobs aren't any more or less disposable than they were in the past. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the median job tenure for all workers at their current jobs rose to 4 years in January 2004 from 3.5 years in 1983. In the same period, the percentage of workers older than 25 with job tenure of more than 10 years fell only modestly, to 30.6 percent from 31.9 percent.

But there are subtle shifts underneath the headline numbers, says Steven J. Davis, the William H. Abbott professor of international business and economics at the University of Chicago. As they have become more entrenched in the work force, women have seen their average job tenure rise, to 3.8 years in 2004 from 3.1 years in 1983. In the same period, the figure declined for men — particularly for those ages 45 to 54, whose average tenure in 2004 was 9.67 years, down from 12.8 years in 1983.

Job tenure has declined "among both blue-collar and white-collar male workers," Professor Davis said. "White-collar jobs, which were historically dominated by college-educated men, are no longer quite as secure as they were a generation ago."

So what accounts for the public concern over job instability? Professor Davis notes that job stability at publicly held companies — large, brand-name businesses like Intel that make news when they restructure — has decreased markedly. "But such companies only account for about one-third of all business employment," he said. Among privately held companies — a much larger sector — job stability has actually been on the rise in recent years.

What's more, workers have plenty of reason to feel anxious about their prospects. "Job stability isn't the same as job security," said Jacob S. Hacker, a professor of political science at Yale and author of "The Great Risk Shift" (Oxford University Press). The consequences of losing a job are far more severe today than they were in previous generations, as laid-off employees tend to see their compensation and benefits fall sharply when they find new employment. As a result, "people are more likely today to worry about what will happen if they lose their job," Professor Hacker said.

CLEARLY, in today's economy, workers have to prepare for the possibility that their jobs won't last as long as they once expected. "It was and still is the case that roughly a quarter of jobs end within a year," said Professor Neumark of U.C. Irvine. Americans today should expect to have many different jobs over the course of their working lifetime, especially when they are starting out.

"But that doesn't mean you won't eventually find an employer with whom you'll have a long-term attachment," said Professor Stevens, who has been at U.C. Davis for three years, her third job since receiving her Ph.D. in 1995.

A Different Strategy On Pensions (NYT)

By Mary Williams Walsh

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

The winter of 2002 was a scary time for pension funds and the millions of Americans whose retirement they have promised to secure.

Investment losses had wiped away billions of dollars. Required contributions were ballooning. Some companies even started talking about going into bankruptcy, in part because they could no longer afford their pension obligations. Congress and the Bush administration began planning to tighten the law.

Most corporate pension funds sat tight, warning that if the government got too tough, they would be forced to freeze their plans. But one large company, International Paper, decided to strike out in an entirely different direction.

Today, International Paper's $7 billion pension fund, which covers 175,000 people, is three years into a broad revamping, one that the company believes will protect it from the forces that wreaked havoc in the last few years.

When the changes to its investment strategy are complete, said Robert Hunkeler, the company's vice president for investments, "we will have protected the company and the plan — and therefore the plan participants — from the worst effects of interest rate moves."

The ability to shelter the plan from financial storms has allowed International Paper to keep it going, even as a number of other large companies, like I.B.M., Tenneco and DuPont, have frozen theirs.

Freezing a plan halts the growth of benefits, and even though most companies sweeten the pill by expanding their 401(k) programs, the move often dashes the hopes of older workers. That is because in traditional pensions, which provide a predictable monthly income in retirement, workers typically build the biggest part of their benefit in their last few years of service.

Danny Morris, president of the United Steel Workers local that represents 400 employees in International Paper's mill in Courtland, Ala., said that he was pleased with the steps the company had taken to make its pension fund more secure.

Pensions, he said, are always "the No. 1 topic" when he asks his members what matters to them most. The average worker at the mill is 54 years old, he said, with 25 to 35 years of service. A pension freeze would devastate them.

"It's really the only thing they've known all through the years," he said of the plan, which pays a flat pension of $45 a month for every year of service a person has completed. "Any time you start talking about a change to the pension plan it sort of scares people."

Yet even as traditional pension plans — which still cover about 21 million of the nation's 115 million private-sector employees — have come under siege, International Paper's efforts suggest there may be ways of preserving them, at least for those already promised a pension when they retire.

International Paper began putting newly hired employees into a 401(k) plan after an acquisition in 2004, but the previous employees still participate in the pension plan, with no freeze. And others are beginning to look at International Paper's approach as a possible way out of the pension minefield.

"There's a very healthy discourse that's taking place in the industry," said Joseph Nankof, a partner with Rocaton Investment Advisors, a firm in Norwalk, Conn., that advises pension funds, including the one at International Paper.

It can take a strong stomach to make the necessary changes, however, because they involve breaking away from the herd approach to managing pension assets. Federal law requires pension officials to operate "prudently," and years of court decisions have taught them that they will be bulletproof in a lawsuit if they stick to the same investment techniques everybody else uses.

Nearly all pension funds invest in a broad mix of stocks and bonds, counting on expected gains over the long run to make up for any short-run losses. But that approach has exposed companies — and their shareholders — to big risks.

The risks were hidden by the longstanding actuarial practice of "smoothing" pension numbers, or spreading short-term market swings over many years. Smoothing was supposed to reduce pension volatility, but it is now widely understood to have merely concealed volatility that was there all along.

The pension law that Congress just approved, along with coming accounting changes, will greatly reduce the ability of companies to smooth their pension numbers. So if a company decides to use an aggressive, high-volatility pension strategy in the future, investors will be able to see it and may well shun the company's shares.

One of the biggest sources of pension fund volatility is interest rates.

Pension funds are acutely sensitive to interest rate changes because of the role rates play in setting the value of pension benefits that will be paid in the future. When interest rates fall, the value of the benefits rises because it will take more of today's dollars, compounding at the lower rates, to be able to pay benefits falling due in the future.

The interest rate effect is very powerful. The decline of interest rates, combined with depressed stock prices, brought many pension funds to their knees in the early years of the decade. At G.M., for example, a mere quarter-point rate decline increased pension obligations by $2.3 billion.

The interest rate International Paper uses for its pension calculations fell by a full percentage point from 2001 to 2003, and smoothing, rather than eliminating the pain, was making it last longer.

Those harsh conditions made Mr. Hunkeler start to think, in 2002, about hedging International Paper's pension fund against future rate swings. He knew it would be possible to do this with fixed-income assets, like bonds.

Bonds react to interest rate changes in the same way pension obligations do. When rates fall, bond prices go up. So if International Paper had bonds in its pension fund that matched the characteristics of its pension obligations, it would not matter how far rates fell — the prices of the bonds would rise in step to keep pace with the increased pension obligations.

Mr. Hunkeler was not the first person to think of this. A number of pension funds in the 1980's bought bonds with payment schedules timed to coincide with the benefit payments they owed. High interest rates at that time made such bonds inexpensive.

American Airlines adopted such a strategy in 1987. Its investment manager, William F. Quinn, held onto the bonds even in the 1990's, when the soaring stock market made bond-matching strategies go out of style and lured many pension funds into putting most of their money into stocks.

Keeping the hedge intact proved a good move. Of all the major airlines, American's bond-laden pension fund weathered the financial storms of the last few years the best. The pension funds at most other airlines — United, US Airways, Aloha, and now Delta — have failed, leading them to be taken over by the federal government.

American's pension fund, meanwhile, is "below where it needs to be, but it is in much better shape than most of the others," Robert L. Crandall, the former chief executive of American, told a Congressional committee two years ago. "Anybody who wants to offer a fixed-benefit pension plan should be required to put those assets into long-term fixed-income instruments which match the liability stream over time," Mr. Crandall said in his testimony.

"If that happens, Senator," he added under questioning from Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi, "you won't ever have underfunded benefit plans."

International Paper already had about 20 percent of its total portfolio in bonds at the end of 2002. But the bonds were not serving as a hedge against interest rate swings, because their durations then did not match those of the company's pension obligations.

The bonds in International Paper's pension fund had a duration of four or five years in 2002, Mr. Hunkeler said, but its pension obligations had a duration of about 12 years. The difference meant the bonds and the pension obligations would not respond the same way to interest rate changes.

To make a better match, Mr. Hunkeler needed bonds with longer durations. One way to get them would be to do what American Airlines did: sell the existing bonds and buy new, longer ones. But buying enough long bonds to carry out that strategy was a lot more expensive in 2002 than in the 1980's.

So Mr. Hunkeler chose a second method, which used a financial instrument, interest rate swaps, to extend the duration of the bonds the pension fund already owned.

Interest rate swaps are a relatively recent innovation, but they are in widespread use. The global market is valued at almost $5 trillion, according to the Bank for International Settlements.

International Paper is setting up its hedge in phases. Starting in December 2002, it extended the duration of its bonds to 10 years, then kept the portfolio at that point for three years, while the company evaluated how the strategy was working.

Phase 2 began this year. It involves expanding the hedge until 50 percent of International Paper's pension obligations are hedged against interest rate swings, a process Mr. Hunkeler says will take two to three more years. He said a company like International Paper would probably get the greatest benefit from the strategy when 75 percent of its pension obligations were hedged, but it was not rushing to get there.

Indeed, International Paper is confident that even if it takes several years to fully build its hedge, it will still be better positioned than most companies that have not even started to secure their pensions.

"It's like the old joke, 'How fast do you have to run to outrun a hungry bear?' " Mr. Hunkeler said. "You have to run faster than your friend."

Investing In Human Futures (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

Imagine a classroom of first graders. Now imagine we could get every kid in that classroom to graduate from college, and that we could get every kid in every classroom to graduate from college. Don't you think that's the most important thing we could do to make America a richer and fairer place?

Some people, actually, don't think that. Some people don't think wage stagnation is mainly about education and skills. They think the economy is so broken, the Republican Party so malevolent and all-controlling, that almost all the gains would go to the top 5 percent or 1 percent anyway.

I may be a sucker, but I think they're wrong.

I may be a sucker, but I doubt we can achieve broad-based social mobility unless workers possess the skills that a global economy now rewards. I may be a sucker, but I suspect the most important thing we can do to increase social mobility is to come up with second-generation human capital policies.

The first-generation policies gave people access to schools, colleges and training facilities. The second-generation policies will help them develop the habits, knowledge and mental traits they need to succeed once they are there.

That means, first, strengthening the family, the nuclear core of human capital formation. Ramesh Ponnuru of National Review points out that investments in human capital are overtaxed. He suggests raising the child tax credit to $5,000. That would be part of a plan to lighten the tax burden on families while they are raising kids and shift it to when they are done. It would enable more parents to stay home if they wanted and invest more in those crucial early years.

DOJ_NMG_0060829

Second, it means strengthening marriage. Only half of American kids can expect to live with both biological parents at age 15 (compared with two-thirds of kids in Western Europe). That has calamitous effects on education and development. There are many cultural ways to strengthen marriage, but financially, the government could extend the earned income tax credit to single males. That would not only induce more young men to enter the labor force, it would also make them more marriageable.

Third, it means encouraging people to think about the future. Senator Jeff Sessions has a proposal (similar to a program earlier supported by Senators Santorum and Schumer, and others) that would give every child $1,000 at birth for a savings account, which could then be built up over a lifetime. Among other things, that sort of asset building awakens a sense of future possibilities.

Fourth, children from disorganized homes need quality preschool. As a mountain of research has shown, children who have not developed mental traits like self-control by age 3 are much less likely to exercise them later on. Their prospects are permanently diminished.

Fifth, schools need to be tailored to the way children actually are. Different human beings have radically different learning styles. So long as diverse individuals are forced to sit in the same classroom and endure uniform teaching techniques, they'll underperform. It doesn't matter whether the school is public, charter or administered by Martians.

I'm hinting at an agenda that is socially conservative and economically progressive, because when it comes to building human capital, the two go hand in hand. To pay for this stuff, I'd trail along behind Sebastian Mallaby of The Washington Post: Cut the mortgage interest deduction so it doesn't subsidize people who want million-dollar homes, and reform the savings and health insurance tax incentives that subsidize rich people to do things they'd do anyway. I'd also keep the inheritance tax (I don't want a bunch of spoiled heirs starting lefty foundations).

When you ask free-market purists about wage stagnation, they either deny it's a problem or brag about how Republicans have increased disposable income by reducing the tax burden. When you ask orthodox liberals about wage stagnation, they never tell you exactly what they would do to counteract the epic forces of globalization and technological change, but they seem to imply they can restructure the economy with the right trade, minimum-wage and union rules to create middle-class wealth.

But this debate is not going to be won either by the free-market fatalists or by the angry but amorphous populists. It'll be won by the human capital reformers, the alliance of progressive conservatives and conservative progressives (like the Clintonites) who believe that the market fundamentally works and that social mobility requires what it has always required, skill and effort.

All Eyes On The States (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 10, 2006

Governor's races may swing vote for president

When Wisconsinites pick a governor Nov. 7, they'll also be setting the stage for the state's next huge election drama: the 2008 race for president.

Many of this year's hottest gubernatorial races are taking place in the nation's most competitive presidential battlegrounds: Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, Colorado and Nevada, to name a few.

The outcome of those races will have a bearing on presidential politics. Governors are not only a prime source of political ideas and talent for their parties. They also can play an active role in the sort of ultra-tight races the nation saw in 2000 and 2004, providing help to their party's nominees in key swing states.

"It's not the be-all and end-all, but it can make an important difference," said Mark Mellman, the pollster for John Kerry's presidential bid in 2004 and for Gov. Jim Doyle's 2006 re-election campaign.

Mellman contends that "if Jim Doyle were not governor of Wisconsin, John Kerry would not have won Wisconsin."

There is no way to test that proposition, and some strategists - such as Matthew Dowd of the Bush re-election team - are skeptical about the impact of home-state governors on the ticket.

But as the closest state in the nation in 2004 (Kerry won by 0.38 percentage points), Wisconsin is the kind of place where even marginal factors can matter. Possible party shift

It is also one of at least seven or eight presidential battlegrounds where control of the governor's office could shift this fall from one party to the other.

Such a shift is already likely in Ohio, the No. 1 electoral target in the '04 race for president, where Democrats are now favored to end the GOP's hold on the governor's office.

Other swing states where Democrats have at least a plausible chance to gain a governor this fall include Nevada, Colorado and Minnesota.

But Republicans have their own pick-up opportunities, including Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan and Oregon.

DOJ_NMG_0060830

Governors will be elected this year in each of the 11 states decided by fewer than 5 percentage points in 2004. At least six of those races are rated as tossups.

"When you look at a red-and-blue map, and you're doing the Electoral College math, you would certainly rather have more governors than not," said Jennifer Duffy, who analyzes contests for governor for the non-partisan Cook Political Report.

In a column this year for The Hill newspaper, Democratic pollster Mellman called Wisconsin the presidential battleground state that Democrats are in the "greatest danger of losing" in 2008 (they won by 11,384 votes in 2004). And he noted that if that happens, even picking up Ohio won't be enough for Democrats to win back the White House.

"Targeting these states now will likely pay dividends later," wrote Mellman of the importance of the Doyle-Green race. Role in policy is key

How much difference can a governor make to his party's presidential nominee?

Aside from whatever intangibles they may provide as high-profile cheerleaders, they can matter in very concrete ways. For one, governors help shape voting rules and procedures, which have become a battleground unto themselves in presidential politics.

Democrats believe George Bush attained the presidency in 2000 because his brother Jeb was governor amid Florida's post-election dispute.

In Wisconsin, Republicans believe that Doyle's pre-election veto in 2003 of a GOP-backed election bill requiring voters to present a photo ID resulted in more Democratic votes in '04. Post-election investigations did find fraudulent votes were cast, but didn't find nearly enough to change the outcome.

"I do think it made a difference (in '04) that we had a governor who vetoed election reform. . . . That in and of itself was probably the most helpful thing Jim Doyle did for John Kerry," said Mark Graul, who ran Bush's Wisconsin campaign and now runs the campaign of Doyle's opponent, Republican Mark Green. Green supports the photo ID plan.

Democrats contend that the bill is designed to lower Democratic turnout, and would discourage voting by tens of thousands of poor and elderly Wisconsinites who don't have driver's licenses. Doyle issued a veto on the issue in 2005 as well.

"This was an attempt by Republicans in the Legislature to disenfranchise voters," said Doyle spokesman Matt Canter, who said Doyle remains open to compromise legislation on voter identification.

What neither side disputes is that the fate of the photo ID plan backed by Republicans hinges on this year's governor's race. And that in turn could have an impact on the 2008 presidential race in Wisconsin if that contest is as close as it was in 2004 or 2000, when the margin was a mere 5,708 votes. Both sides believe enough votes are at stake in the matter to affect very tight races. Local 'echo chamber'

The governor's role in the election process doesn't end there. Wisconsin's governor gets what can be a tie-breaking appointment on the state Elections Board, which handles election disputes. And Democrats who worked on the '04 election say it was an asset to the Kerry effort to have as governor a former attorney general who was experienced in election law and could help in the pre-election partisan wrangling over ballot access and voting procedures.

A governor also can help his or her party's nominee on the campaign trail, with local organization and expertise. He or she can serve as a high-profile, in-state "echo chamber" for the nominee's message. Presidential campaigns put enormous effort into the use of "surrogate" speakers during the campaign. And unless they're unpopular, governors are seen as better surrogates than members of Congress because they command more attention and have no ties to Washington. Mellman says the absence of any prominent statewide Democratic politicians in Ohio complicated Kerry's effort there.

"If a Democrat had been governor in Ohio, would that have made a difference? We'll never know, but it was close enough that it could have made a difference," Mellman said.

In Wisconsin, Kerry made extensive use of Doyle as a surrogate, while the Bush campaign "had to be little bit more sporadic in who we used to speak on our behalf," said Graul, tapping GOP congressmen such as Green and Paul Ryan in their own districts. Skeptics doubt impact

Some strategists are skeptical that in the end governors have much impact on presidential outcomes, either as surrogates or by deploying their political networks.

"Presidential races are just so much bigger than that," said Dowd, Bush's top strategist in the 2004 campaign. Referring to the first Bush campaign four years earlier, Dowd said, "I remember losing Michigan and losing Pennsylvania and losing Wisconsin, all of which had popular Republican governors in 2000."

In his years as governor, Tommy Thompson never delivered Wisconsin in a presidential race. Of course, that doesn't mean he had no effect on the ticket's performance.

Dowd said governors have a bigger potential role in their party's nominating process than in a general election, especially in states with early primaries and caucuses. The hotly contested open-seat race for governor in Iowa has drawn the lavish attention of '08 hopefuls in both parties, who are providing money and manpower in the race.

Dowd also contends that the bigger legacy of these governor's races for their national parties is a more long-term one because governors are a key source of new ideas and policies, and supply the parties with many of their presidential prospects.

"They become the sort of momentum for the vision of the party," Dowd said. "If you lose some of them, and (in) some of the big states, that's a problem." From the Sept. 10, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

'06 Campaign Cry: Public First, Party Second (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

As campaign 2006 heats up, the first important new theme of the 2008 presidential election may be emerging.

From Washington state to Maryland, candidates in both parties are running against the relentless partisan conflict that now defines life in the nation's capital. In an era when party-line voting in Congress has reached the highest level, by some measures, since the 1890s, a growing number of office-seekers are pledging to operate as an independent voice and a bridge between the parties if voters give them a ticket to Capitol Hill. In the process, they are honing arguments likely to be common in the race to succeed President Bush.

In Missouri, Republican Sen. Jim Talent has run television advertisements in his reelection campaign highlighting the legislation he co-sponsored with Democrats. "Most people don't care if you're red or blue. Republican or Democrat," an announcer says. "They care about getting things done."

In Minnesota, Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy, who's seeking a Senate seat, has aired an advertisement promoting his willingness to break with the GOP on education, the environment and pension protection. "I'm not afraid to work with the other side," he says in the spot.

In an ad in Maryland, Republican Senate hopeful Michael Steele looks earnestly into the camera and promises: "I'll talk straight about what's wrong in both parties."

Because so many GOP candidates have struck these notes, political analysts primarily have viewed them as attempts to separate from Bush as his approval ratings remain weak. And candidates such as Talent (who voted on Bush's side 91% of the time in 2005, according to Congressional Quarterly) and Kennedy (87% support for the Bush position) clearly are displaying more enthusiasm for independence on the campaign trail than they have most days in Congress.

But there's more to the dynamic than Republicans ditching Bush. For one thing, Democrats such as Senate challengers Jim Pederson in Arizona and Bob Casey Jr. in Pennsylvania are emphasizing their willingness to work across party lines. Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, trying to hold his seat as an independent after losing the Democratic primary last month, is centering his campaign on a promise to transcend partisan differences.

More important, the candidates in both parties using these arguments are raising issues much broader than the proper level of loyalty to a president; they are indicting the entire system of lock step partisan allegiance — and reflexive partisan confrontation — that now drives so much of the Washington debate.

Mike McGavick, the Republican challenging Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell in Washington state, is among the candidates questioning that system most fundamentally. McGavick, the former chairman and chief executive for the insurance giant Safeco Corp., has had a rough few weeks. Recently, he preemptively released information on a number of embarrassing episodes in his past, including a 1993 drunk driving arrest in Maryland — only to face persistent questions about the accuracy of his recollection that forced him last week to issue a second statement clarifying his description of the arrest.

But McGavick has developed a sophisticated critique of the way Washington works — or doesn't. The intensifying pressure for party unity, he argues, makes it impossible for Congress to resolve difficult problems. Republican unwillingness to compromise, he maintains, is preventing action on immigration, just as the Democratic refusal to negotiate doomed any possibility of restructuring the Social Security system.

Just as important, he argues, the growing tendency toward party-line voting compromises legislators' ability to represent their states. By definition, he says, members of Congress who vote with their own party almost all of the time are elevating partisan over local interests. "I vowed to my state that I want to be thrown out if I am voting with my party 90% of the time," McGavick says. "Because [if I do that], I cannot possibly be representing my state well."

It's no coincidence that these arguments are being raised most forcefully by candidates caught behind enemy lines: Republicans, including McGavick and Steele, running in Democratic-leaning blue states, or Democrats such as Pederson in Republican-leaning red states. Cooperation with the other party is unquestionably most attractive for politicians who need votes from the other side to win.

But that's nothing new. Historically, the best bridge builders in Congress have been politicians facing electorates that lean toward the other party — former senators such as Republican Jacob K. Javits of New York or Democrat John B. Breaux of Louisiana. Compromise in Washington would almost certainly come easier if voters elected more cross-pressured legislators — red state Democrats and blue state Republicans — compelled to balance partisan demands against local opinion.

It's not clear how many of the candidates promising more independence will get a chance to demonstrate it. Apart from Talent — and perhaps Lieberman — the Senate candidates emphasizing that theme are clear underdogs. And the danger of too often actually breaking from the party mainstream in office was evident in Lieberman's primary defeat — and the possibility that Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) could lose a GOP primary Tuesday on similar charges of disloyalty.

But the candidates pledging more cooperation are tapping into what polls show is public exhaustion with the bruising collisions between the parties that dominated most of President Clinton's term and have consumed almost every day of Bush's presidency.

Whatever happens to McGavick and the others, they are blazing trails presidential contenders from both parties are likely to follow. These '06 campaigns are an early signal that in '08, many Americans may want a president who, as someone once put it, will govern as a "uniter, not a divider."

Vilsack's Labors For Unity (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

The anniversary of Sept. 11, 2001, and President Bush's speeches on his anti-terrorism strategy have placed the issue of personal security in the public eye. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, offered a different perspective on the question during a visit to Washington last week.

Vilsack said that the people he met on his just-completed annual walk across Iowa voiced concerns about security that were directly linked "to a feeling that they are in this alone," trying to cope by themselves with forces larger than they can manage.

It is not that Americans have lost their self-reliance, he said, or their willingness to help their neighbors. But the bigger institutions on which they once thought they could rely -- the government, their employers, their unions -- are now either unreliable or entirely absent. When federal, state and local officials left the victims of Hurricane Katrina stranded in their flooded homes for days, it symbolized a fundamental breach of trust. When giants such as General Motors and Ford laid off thousands of workers while other companies walked away from the pensions they had promised retirees, it removed another prop to confidence. And when unions increasingly lost their ability to organize and represent workers, the sense of isolation became even stronger.

All that leads Vilsack to the conclusion that the key to rebuilding national confidence and a sense of security lies as much within the nation and its economy as it does in stabilizing Iraq or in devising new safeguards against international terrorism.

That conviction underlies the rather surprising press event Vilsack orchestrated one day last week in his role as chairman of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. He brought together traditional antagonists in intraparty battles: the leaders of the DLC, the longtime home of the Clintons and other Democratic moderates, and the leaders of organized labor. On stage with Vilsack were Al From, the combative DLC chief executive, and Jerry McEntee, the equally tempestuous president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, plus John Sweeney, the president of the AFL-CIO, and Anna Burger, the head of Change to Win, the coalition of unions that broke away from the AFL-CIO last year.

It was remarkable enough to see the feuding labor people together, but adding From was really tempting fate. He is an outspoken advocate of open-trade policies that are anathema to much of labor and has argued fervently for years that Democrats should not be beholden to their union allies. In turn, union leaders have viewed the DLC as a front for crypto-Republican, pro-business policies.

When Vilsack became chairman of the DLC last year, it raised eyebrows because unions have been a backbone of his support in Iowa. But he said he wanted to try to heal the breach, and he quickly began a series of private conversations with labor leaders, followed by joint sessions of DLC staffers and union operatives.

The upshot was the news conference, where the DLC formally endorsed a bill called the Employee Free Choice Act that is high on labor's wish list.

The legislation, which enjoys broad support from congressional Democrats, would require employers to recognize and bargain immediately with any union once a majority of employees have signed certifiable cards requesting union representation. Now, after the cards are presented, employers can demand a formal secret-ballot election before granting such recognition, and union spokesmen claim that intimidation and threats often cost them certification. Last year, Sweeney said, only 70,000 workers were able to form unions.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce dismissed the intimidation charges when I called but readily acknowledged it is fighting the legislation -- ostensibly because secret-ballot elections are necessary to protect workers' choices.

The DLC endorsement is just symbolic; most DLC adherents in Congress already are listed as co-sponsors. But all the news conference participants credited Vilsack for bringing the two sides together, and they said the dialogue will continue in coming months.

It has a double significance. For Vilsack, a long-shot candidate for the 2008 presidential nomination, it is the strongest proof of his ability to be a successful power broker.

And for the Democrats, it holds important potential. For most of the past decade, the DLC and its adherents have supplied the best policy thinking for the party while the labor movement has supplied most of the grass-roots organization and effort.

For the first time, you can see mind and muscle working together, a healthy development for the Democrats.

Bush Confident GOP Will Hold Congress (AP)

AP, September 10, 2006

President Bush says he believes Republicans will retain control of the Congress after the November elections, even as members of his own party predict a loss of some seats.

Dismissing the possibility the top House Democrat, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, could rise to House speaker if the GOP lost its majority, the president said, "That's not going to happen."

Democrats need to gain six seats in the Senate and 15 in the House to gain control.

In an interview with The Wall Street Journal's editorial page editor, Bush was commenting on how he planned to resurrect his push to change Social Security next year when he was reminded that some polls show Democrats were likely to win control of at least the House.

"I just don't believe it," the president told Paul Gigot, according to an account published Saturday.

"I believe the Republicans will end up being — running the House and the Senate," the president was quoted as saying in the interview Thursday aboard Air Force One.

Bush said his confidence is based on his belief that voters will be convinced that Republicans were right to cut taxes to stimulate the economy, and that the GOP has a better understanding about the need to nurture Iraq's fragile government and spread democracy.

On Iraq, Bush said dividing Iraq three separate regions — Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni — with a central government in Baghdad would be a mistake. Bush said Iraqis did not vote for partition when they approved a new constitution and government.

On Iran, Bush said he personally signed off on the recent U.S. visit by former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami, saying he wants to learn more how the Tehran government works. The visit drew protests from some conservatives who say Khatami oversaw development of the nuclear weapons development Bush is now working to halt.

"My hope is that diplomacy will work in convincing the Iranians to give up their nuclear weapons ambitions, and in order for diplomacy to work, it's important to hear voices other than (Mahmoud) Ahmadinejad's," Bush said referring to Iran's current president.

As for his goal of spreading democracy in the Middle East, Bush said he had not given up on seeking reforms in Egypt. He said he was disappointed that Egyptian opposition leader Ayman Nour had been convicted on forgery charges. Nour alleges that the government, run by President Hosni Mubarak, trumped up the charges to eliminate him from politics.

"There's an impressive group of younger Egyptians — the trade minister and some of the economic people — that understand the promise and the difficulties of democracy," he said.

Robert D. Novak: Dem Outrage At ABC Could Help Republicans (UL)

By ROBERT D. NOVAK

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, September 10, 2006

The unusual Democratic outrage over ABC-TV's "The Path to 9/11" film to be shown Sunday and Monday reflects private concern in the party that the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attack can reverse the political tide running against Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0060834

The highly partisan Rep. Louise Slaughter of New York composed a tough letter to Robert A. Iger, CEO of Walt Disney (ABC's parent company). The letter cites two scenes from the program casting doubt on the Clinton administration's legacy in fighting terrorism.

Slaughter added as co-signers of the letter three senior Democrats who would join her as committee chairmen if Democrats win control of the House. They were Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, senior member of the House; Rep. Jane Harman of California, a top party spokesman on national security; and Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, a left-wing leader.

DEMOCRATIC INFIGHTING

In expectation of a Democratic takeover of the House in this year's elections, advocates of Minority Whip Steny Hoyer and Rep. John Murtha are engaged in a fierce backstage battle for their candidate to become majority leader.

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who would be unopposed to become speaker of a Democratic-controlled House, is considered certain to vote for Murtha against Hoyer. Murtha managed Pelosi's successful campaign for party whip against Hoyer in 2001, which provided the stepping stone toward her current dominance in the House. Hoyer associates say Pelosi is working behind the scenes for Murtha, but Hoyer told this column he sees no such activity by her.

Although both Hoyer and Murtha once were considered part of the Democratic Party's relatively moderate wing, Murtha's aggressive opposition to U.S. intervention in Iraq has made him a favorite of the left.

A REPUBLICAN BREAK

Republican strategists figure they benefited from a little political break Aug. 28 when U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle in Washington agreed to a joint motion by defense and prosecution lawyers to postpone the sentencing of disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff, who in January pleaded guilty to corruption charges, had been scheduled to appear at a sentencing hearing before Huvelle last Wednesday. The reason stated by the Justice Department in agreeing to Abramoff's request for a delay was his cooperation with prosecutors, resulting in the conviction of former Bush administration officials.

The only Republican congressman who so far has become directly involved in the Abramoff investigation is Bob Ney of Ohio, who has not been charged with any offense but decided not to seek re-election. Nevertheless, GOP campaign managers did not relish the publicity of the Abramoff sentencing as midterm election campaigns began.

FUND-RAISING DOUBLE

Sen. Mike DeWine, who has been aggressively soaking up Washington lobbyist money for his uphill re-election campaign in Ohio, has added an unprecedented campaign finance twist: bringing in another endangered Republican senator for his fund-raiser.

During the August recess of Congress, lobbyists received an invitation for a $1,000-a-ticket "sunrise breakfast" (8 a.m.) in Washington Sept. 14 to "honor" DeWine. Listed as a "special guest" is Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana. DeWine and Burns are considered two of the Republican senators most likely to be defeated in November.

The breakfast will be held at Charlie Palmer's on Pennsylvania Ave. in Washington, a favorite restaurant among lobbyists. The listed hosts are the political action committees of EarthLink, an Internet service provider, and the National Mining Association.

ANTI-HORSE SLAUGHTER

With scarcely two weeks of work left before Congress breaks for the midterm election, House leaders scheduled time to consider the American Horse Slaughter Prevention Act.

The measure, which would ban killing horses for human consumption, passed the House Thursday and was sent to the Senate. Many American horse owners pick up money on the side by exporting horses or horsemeat to Europe.

The anti-slaughter bill is sponsored by two Republicans: Ed Whitfield of Kentucky and John Sweeney of New York.

In A Pivotal Year, GOP Plans To Get Personal (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Millions to Go to Digging Up Dirt on Democrats

Republicans are planning to spend the vast majority of their sizable financial war chest over the final 60 days of the campaign attacking Democratic House and Senate candidates over personal issues and local controversies, GOP officials said.

The National Republican Congressional Committee, which this year dispatched a half-dozen operatives to comb through tax, court and other records looking for damaging information on Democratic candidates, plans to spend more than 90 percent of its $50 million-plus advertising budget on what officials described as negative ads.

DOJ_NMG_0060835

The hope is that a vigorous effort to "define" opponents, in the parlance of GOP operatives, can help Republicans shift the midterm debate away from Iraq and limit losses this fall. The first round of attacks includes an ad that labeled a Democratic candidate in Wisconsin "Dr. Millionaire" and noted that he has sued 80 patients.

"Opposition research is power," said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), the NRCC chairman. "Opposition research is the key to defining untested opponents."

The Republican National Committee, meanwhile, has enlisted veteran party strategist Terry Nelson to run a campaign that will coordinate with Senate Republicans on ads that similarly will rely on the best of the worst that researchers have dug up on Democrats. The first ad run by the new RNC effort criticizes Ohio Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) for voting against proposals designed to toughen border protection and deport illegal immigrants.

Because challengers tend to be little-known compared with incumbents, they are more vulnerable to having their public image framed by the opposition through attacks and unflattering personal revelations.

And with polls showing the Republicans' House and Senate majorities in jeopardy, party strategists said they have concluded that their best chance to prevent big Democratic gains is a television and direct-mail blitz over the next eight weeks aimed at raising enough questions about Democratic candidates that voters decide they are unacceptable choices.

"When you run in an adverse political environment, you try to localize and personalize the race as much as you can," Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) said.

In a memo released last week, Cole, who is running to succeed Reynolds at the NRCC, expanded on that strategy. The memo recommended that vulnerable incumbents spend $20,000 on a research "package" to find damaging material about challengers and urged that they "define your opponent immediately and unrelentingly."

GOP officials said internal polling shows Republicans could limit losses to six to 10 House seats and two or three Senate seats if the strategy -- combined with the party's significant financial advantage and battled-tested turnout operation -- proves successful. Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to win control of the House and six to regain power in the Senate.

Against some less experienced and little-known opponents, said Matt Keelen, a Republican lobbyist heavily involved in House campaigns, "It will take one or two punches to fold them up like a cheap suit."

Republicans plan to attack Democratic candidates over their voting records, business dealings, and legal tussles, the GOP officials said.

John Geer, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University and the author of a book on negative advertising, said Republicans and Democrats alike lack positive issues on which to run because of divisions over the war and economic policy. This will be a "very negative campaign and probably a more negative campaign than any in recent memory," Geer said.

As Republicans try to localize races, Democrats' hopes for the most part hinge on being able to nationalize the election and turn it into a referendum on the Iraq war, President Bush, and the performance of the Republican Congress -- all faring poorly in polls this year.

Bush will try to make terrorism the issue nationally, casting the election as a choice between two distinct approaches for protecting the nation from attack. Beyond that, however, most Republicans want to distance their elections from the national context.

That strategy is born of necessity. Republicans are alarmed by the large number of House and Senate incumbents who are trailing or tied in their internal polling. Many are attracting the support of less than 45 percent of likely voters -- a danger zone for any incumbent 60 days before an election. The political rule of thumb is that incumbents rarely draw a majority of voters who make up their minds in the days shortly before Election Day.

History shows how the combination of opposition research and negative advertising can work. In 2000, Republicans unleashed a furious attack on the spending practices of Democratic House candidate Linda Chapin, including her purchase of an $18,500 bronze frog as a legislator in Florida. Chapin, then the favorite to win an open Florida House seat, lost to Republican Ric Keller. That same election cycle, Republicans dug up a tape of state Rep. Eleanor Jordan (D-Ky.) asking to speed up a vote so she could attend a fundraiser, an image that destroyed her chances of knocking off Rep. Anne M. Northup (R).

This year, the challenge is tougher, as national polling shows voters dissatisfied with the party in power and ready for a change.

"When all [Republicans] do is launch potshots, they look like they're trying to cover up the fact that they have no solutions" said Phil Singer, communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

As in past elections, the bulk of negative advertising this year probably will be delivered by party committees -- a strategy that allows the candidates to distance themselves from the trash-talking messages that turn off some voters.

Wisconsin's 8th District offers an example. Earlier this summer, the NRCC sent a young staff member to the district for one week to look through court records, government and medical documents, and local newspapers to find embarrassing information about physician Steve Kagen, one of the leading Democratic candidates in an important swing district, an NRCC aide said. The researcher discovered that Kagen's allergy clinic has sued more than 80 patients, mostly for failing to pay their bills.

A new NRCC ad airing in the Green Bay area, the district's main media market, warns: "What Dr. Millionaire doesn't want you to know is his clinic left more than 80 patients behind -- suing them. That's right, suing more than 80 patients."

In recent elections, Democratic officials have complained that Republicans are much better at opposition research. But Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who chair the Democrats' House and Senate campaign committees, have invested more heavily in research. Notably, the researchers dig not only into Republicans, but also their own candidates. This allows Democrats to anticipate what is coming and be ready to respond quickly.

One Democratic research success this year came when Emanuel's staff combed though the archives of several universities to find a copy of an article Colorado Republican candidate Rick O'Donnell wrote for an obscure publication in the mid-1990s. A researcher eventually found the article at George Washington University. In it, O'Donnell argued that Social Security should be abolished -- a revelation that was highlighted in three sharply worded DSCC mailings in the district.

Direct-mail appeals often carry the most negative and potentially damaging messages. Dan Hazelwood, a leading GOP direct mail consultant, said that if a hypothetical Democratic candidate favors the establishment of a garbage dump in a section of the district, for instance, it makes more sense to "narrow-cast" this message by mail to the people most affected rather than buying an expensive, districtwide television ad.

The RNC's expanded role in part reflects concerns that Senate Republicans may not have enough money to take the fight to Democrats. The National Republican Senatorial Committee, under Chair Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), had $15 million less to spend than the DSCC at the end of July. But, the RNC is planning to make up the difference. The committee ended July with nearly $44 million in the bank, four times what the Democratic National Committee had on hand.

In setting up a separate arm to spend money on Senate races, the RNC is altering its past practice. In the past, the RNC simply transferred a large sum of money to the House and Senate campaign committees and let the chairmen decide how to spend it. This year, Nelson -- a former top official in the Bush reelection effort and political strategist for House Republicans -- will work with consultants Tony Feather and Curt Anderson to oversee the TV and direct-mail campaign, which by law must remain independent of coordination directly with candidates.

Dems Seek To Tap Voter Discontent, Economic Jitters (HC)

By Bennett Roth

Houston Chronicle, September 10, 2006

GOP highlights national security theme as a bleak year is predicted for House majority

WASHINGTON — The fall congressional campaign season promises a wild ride as Democrats seek to tap into voter discontent and end the Republicans' 12-year reign as the majority in the House.

In the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 elections, Democrats will hammer at what they argue is the incompetence of the Bush administration in prosecuting the war in Iraq.

They also are appealing to economic jitters of voters by criticizing high, albeit falling, gas prices and lack of wage growth.

Republicans are fighting back by highlighting the national security theme that worked so well for the party in the past two elections, when President Bush convinced many Americans that he and his party were tougher than Democrats in the war against terrorism.

Republicans hold a 232-203 majority in the House.

Stuart Rothenberg, of the Rothenberg Political Report, predicts that the Democrats will pick up between 15 and 20 seats.

Amy Walter, who analyzes House races for the Cook Political Report, also predicts a bleak year for Republicans, noting that all but nine of the 44 House races considered competitive are held by Republicans.

Analysts say the problem for Republicans is that public opinion already may have hardened, particularly in the Northeast and Midwest, where Bush is particularly unpopular and voters may have tuned out the White House message.

Polls also show that most voters do not see Iraq as a part of the war on terrorism, making it difficult for Bush to justify the urgency of winning in Iraq.

Further, voters' opinion of the GOP-controlled Congress, where major issues such as immigration reform remained stalled, is lower than that of the president.

In a Zogby poll taken Sept. 1-5, 17 percent of respondents rated Congress' performance excellent or good. The same poll found 37 percent rated Bush's performance excellent or good.

Tough races ahead

Seniority may not guarantee re-election, as several top House Republicans find themselves in peril this year, including Ohio Rep. Deborah Pryce, who ranks fourth in the House GOP leadership and is in charge of fashioning the party message.

DOJ_NMG_0060837

The seven-term congresswoman has been comfortably re-elected in the past but faces a strong headwind this year in a state where the manufacturing sector is in the dumps and top state Republicans, including the current governor, have been ensnared in corruption scandals.

Pryce's Columbus-area district has become more Democratic.

Bush narrowly defeated Democrat John Kerry there in 2004. Her Democratic opponent, Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy, has accused Pryce of pushing the unsuccessful GOP proposal to create private Social Security accounts.

In Connecticut, GOP Rep. Nancy Johnson, who was first elected in 1982 and has risen to become an expert on heath care issues, is facing a tough race against state Sen. Chris Murphy in a Democrat-leaning state where the Iraq conflict is particularly unpopular.

Senate challengesWhile no one is yet predicting the Democrats will seize control of the Senate, experts say they could come close to winning the six seats needed to oust the Republicans from power.

Republican Senate incumbents Mike DeWine of Ohio, Conrad Burns of Montana and Jim Talent of Missouri face spirited challenges.

Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, an outspoken social conservative who has unabashedly backed Bush on Iraq, is considered the most endangered GOP incumbent in his race against Democrat Bob Casey Jr., son of a late popular governor.

Democrats, however, face a competitive race in New Jersey, where polls show moderate Republican Tom Kean Jr., son of the former governor, running even with Democrat Sen. Robert Menendez.

2 Georgia Races May Threaten Democrats' Struggle For Power (LAT)

By Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Two congressmen face well-known opponents whose bids are aided by GOP redistricting.

ATLANTA — Riding a wave of discontent over the economy, Iraq and gas prices, Democrats are hoping to win enough seats to retake the House of Representatives this November. But their success could also hinge on their ability to keep the seats they already have — and doing so could prove difficult in two key races in Georgia.

Democratic U.S. Reps. Jim Marshall of Macon and John Barrow of Savannah are facing hearty challenges from a pair of former Republican congressmen with name recognition and the ability to raise big money. Bolstering their chances are new district boundaries drawn up by the first GOP-dominated Georgia Legislature since Reconstruction.

The outcome of the races could have broad national implications. The Democratic Party needs a net gain of 15 seats to obtain a majority in the House. Its candidates are posing serious threats to Republican incumbents in states such as Indiana, Connecticut and Pennsylvania.

But Republicans have also identified a handful of vulnerable Democratic incumbents, and are hoping to pick off a few of them to thwart a Democratic return to power.

"Everyone's focused right now on where Democrats can gain seats, and properly so — it's a Democratic year," said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics. "But if Republicans can steal even a few seats from Democrats, it will probably eliminate the chances of a Democratic takeover.

"Georgia has two of these races — I really don't think there is another state where there are two Democratic seats that are at least somewhat vulnerable."

Carl Forti, communications director of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Marshall and Barrow were among 10 House Democratic incumbents his party considered beatable this year.

Others include veteran Iowa Rep. Leonard L. Boswell, a septuagenarian who has had health problems and who is facing a well-funded Republican challenger; Rep. Melissa Bean, an Illinois freshman whose victory was aided by the lackluster campaign of her 2004 rival; and Rep. Chet Edwards of Texas, whose district includes President Bush's Crawford ranch.

In Georgia, as in much of the South, the Democratic Party has been dramatically losing ground in recent years. Since 2004, Republicans have controlled both chambers of the state Legislature and the governor's office.

Democrats grumbled when the ascendant Republicans redrew congressional maps, which were introduced last year. Republicans said they were correcting years of Democratic gerrymandering.

This year, Barrow, a former county commissioner from Athens, and Marshall, a former mayor of Macon, were left with districts that had fewer registered Democrats. Barrow even had to leave Athens, his longtime hometown and, as the home of the University of Georgia, a Democratic redoubt, because it was left out of the boundaries of his redrawn 12th District. He moved to Savannah in January.

DOJ_NMG_0060838

In November, Barrow will again face off against Max Burns, a conservative farmer who served in the House for one term before being defeated by Barrow in 2004. In the 8th District, Marshall is facing Mac Collins, a trucking entrepreneur who was a congressman from 1993 to 2003 and lost a bid for U.S. Senate in 2004.

Barrow and Marshall call themselves conservative Democrats — and point to their routine flouting of the party line. Both voted for the strict House bill addressing illegal immigration, both oppose gay marriage and both oppose set timelines for a withdrawal from Iraq.

Perhaps as a result, their Republican rivals have emphasized the bigger picture in their campaigns — namely, what would happen if the Democrats took control of the house. In a recent Collins TV ad, his opponent isn't mentioned at all. Instead, the ad targets House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who would presumably become House Speaker with a Democratic majority.

The ad says Pelosi would give "amnesty" to illegal aliens, doling out "welfare, food stamps and free education."

"How do we stop her?" the ad says. "Elect Mac Collins."

In a recent news release, Burns' camp also points to the alleged perils of a Pelosi-led Congress, noting her opposition to the National Security Administration's wiretapping program.

"At a time when our country needs to clearly remain on the offense against terrorists, John Barrow supports leaders who want to retreat and take away the programs necessary to win the global War on Terror," Burns said in the release.

In a phone interview, Barrow said voters in his district respected him for voting not according to dogma, but according to the district's best interests. "Ms. Pelosi only controls her vote," he said. "She doesn't control mine."

On Thursday, Bush traveled to Pooler, Ga., a Savannah suburb, and spoke at a fundraiser for Burns (who, unlike Collins, has lagged behind his Democratic opponent in the money race, despite raising more than $1.1 million through July 1).

Bush focused on national security, telling the GOP donors that Burns "understands the stakes" in the war on terrorism.

Democrats may disagree with that assessment. But everyone seems to agree the stakes in these two races could be greater than who represents a handful of Georgia counties.

To Hold Senate, G.O.P. Bolsters Its Most Liberal (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

WARWICK, R.I., Sept. 9 — With a barrage of television advertisements and the mobilization of its get-out-the-vote machine, the national Republican Party has lined up in Rhode Island to beat back a conservative primary challenge to the most liberal Republican in the Senate, Lincoln Chafee. The outcome on Tuesday could help determine whether Democrats have a shot at taking back the Senate.

In an extraordinary pre-emptive announcement, the National Republican Senatorial Committee has said it will concede Rhode Island to the Democrats should Stephen Laffey, the mayor of Cranston, defeat Mr. Chafee in the primary. Citing poll data, Republican leaders said they saw no way someone as conservative as Mr. Laffey could win in a state as Democratic as this; as it is, they are increasingly worried about Mr. Chafee's hopes in a general election.

The result has been the striking sight of the national Republican Party, dominated by conservatives, using resources to save the seat of a Republican who said he voted against Mr. Bush in 2004. He chose instead to write in the name of the first President Bush.

Mr. Chafee has opposed many centerpiece Republican policies, from the war in Iraq to tax cuts to most restrictions on abortion. This week, he helped force a delay on the confirmation of John R. Bolton as the United States ambassador to the United Nations.

For all that, Republicans said they expected to spend more than $1.2 million on advertisements attacking Mr. Laffey, saturating the television stations of this state, the nation's smallest. One advertisement lifts a line Republicans have used in countless attacks against Democrats, mocking the mayor as "tax-and-spend Steve Laffey."

Mr. Laffey's supporters, led by the Club for Growth, an organization advocating tax and spending cuts, have countered energetically with advertisements that have hammered the senator as a Washington insider and a Republican reprobate.

The Republican National Committee has rolled out its 72-hour get-out-the-vote program — used to great effect in 2002 and 2004 — against one of its own this year. More than a dozen trained party turnout specialists are encamped at a local motel.

"If Laffey won, on Day 1 of the general election, it would be over for us," said Brian Nick, the communications director for the Republican Senate campaign committee. Asked if his committee, run by Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, would then concede Rhode Island to the Democrats, Mr. Nick responded:

"No question about it. Would you play somewhere where you were down by 30 and you couldn't move the numbers?"

The fight has laid bare the ideological divisions in the Republican Party as well as the difficult road it faces in the fall . The Senate seat, which Mr. Chafee took over from his father, John H. Chafee, after he died in 1999, has been held by Republicans since 1976.

Mr. Laffey, standing on his front lawn before a Saturday morning of door-to-door campaigning, said Washington Republicans were coming after him because they viewed him as a threat to their power.

"It is really incredible to watch," he said. "Senator Elizabeth Dole and Karl Rove, and all those people down in Washington, they are just about power. The last thing anybody wants down in Washington — whether it is the Democratic National Party or the Republican National Party — is somebody there asking questions."

The contest in Rhode Island, where fewer than 15 percent of registered voters are Republicans, is one of several primaries on Tuesday that will begin to set the final cast for the fall elections. It comes as President Bush has sought to shape the midterm campaigns with a new emphasis on national security.

To win the Senate, Democrats need to capture six seats, and Rhode Island is high on their target list. Both sides see Democrats as having a better shot at winning the 15 seats they need to seize the House.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said he was confident that the Democratic challenger in Rhode Island — it is likely to be Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general — could defeat whoever wins the Republican primary.

"We have the inverse of what is usually true," Mr. Schumer said. "The Republicans are beating each other up in the primary, and our Democratic candidate has had two months to get to know the voters."

Mr. Chafee said in an interview that he appreciated the reinforcements from Washington, but that it could hurt the complicated juggling act confronting him in the primary and in the general election: appealing to both independent and Democratic voters. Independents, who outnumber Democrats but lean Democratic in their voting habits, are allowed to vote in the primary here.

"It's a double-edged sword because I need Democratic-leaning unaffiliated voters," he said. "This is a very Democratic state."

Still, Mr. Chafee appeared heartened, if slightly bemused, at the image of Washington Republicans riding to his rescue. He said he thought that was because he had taken care in how he positioned himself as a red senator from a blue state.

"I've taken an extra step in my rhetoric not to go over the line, so to speak," he said. "I have walked a fine line in how I vote and not taking it too far to alienate some people who could be helpful."

Mr. Chafee spent his Saturday morning at a barbeque with supporters here, where he warned that a Laffey victory on Tuesday would lead to a Republican defeat in November.

"Everybody knows who has the best chance to win in this very, very Democratic state — Rhode Island might be the most Democratic state in the country," he said. "My chances of winning are much, much greater than Mr. Laffey."

In many ways, what is happening in Rhode Island is a mirror of what happened in neighboring Connecticut last month: an ideological challenge from the wings to an established senator who is seen as out of step with his party. In that case, a Democrat, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, lost a primary to Ned Lamont, who attacked Mr. Lieberman for his support of the war in Iraq and his dalliances with the White House.

The difference is that there was no serious Republican challenger in the Connecticut race, so the Democratic Party invested relatively minimal resources in Mr. Lieberman.

And the sheer intensity of the attacks in Rhode Island — both in tone and the amount likely to be spent per voter — was described by party leaders and others as unlike anything they could remember.

"I'm searching for the right word — vicious," said Victor L. Profughi, a retired political science professor at Rhode Island College and a pollster who has studied the state's politics for 40 years. "I've never seen a race that was anything like this in Rhode Island."

In one advertisement, which critics have called racist, an announcer says that as mayor, Mr. Laffey agreed to accept "Mexican ID cards" as proof of citizenship, while an ominous blur of dark-skinned faces flashes across the screen. "Mayor Steve Laffey accepts Mexican ID cards that can threaten our security," the announcer said. "Will he put our security at risk in the Senate?'

The Republican attacks on Mr. Laffey have been met by attacks on Mr. Chafee by the Club for Growth and other groups. One advertisement belittled Mr. Chafee as "a Washington politician so out of touch he votes to waste $200 million on that Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska."

DOJ_NMG_0060840

Mr. Profughi conducted a poll for Rhode Island College at the end of August that found that Mr. Laffey would easily beat Mr. Chafee. But this is proving to be a particularly tough primary to poll because independent voters are allowed to participate, and aides to both candidates say they expected the race to be much closer.

With both sides saying the outcome would be determined by turnout, the Republican National Committee's vaunted turnout operation could prove crucial in countering the anti-Chafee sentiment that has energized Mr. Laffey's supporters.

"There's no doubt that if the primary was held only among Republicans, Chafee would lose," said Nelson Warfield, the Republican consultant who produced the advertisements for the Club for Growth. "He would be repudiated by the Republicans who he has constantly repudiated."

Mr. Laffey's supporters said they were hopeful that should he win, Republicans would reconsider, the way Democrats have rallied around Mr. Lamont.

"Hopefully, it's just campaign bluster," said Pat Toomey, the president of the Club for Growth. The National Republican Senatorial Campaign, Mr. Toomey said, "would not be that irresponsible."

Mr. Laffey said he did not care what Washington Republicans did if he won. "Let them stay out," he said Saturday, huffing and puffing as he ran up a hill toward a voter's house. "We'll do it without them."

GOP Forced To Fight For Rebel Chafee (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

His Challenger in the Primary May Be Too Conservative to Win R.I.

WARWICK, R.I. -- Republican Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee disagrees with his party on the Iraq war, tax cuts and a host of other issues. But national GOP leaders are flooding this tiny state with manpower and money to save the rebel senator, fearing that his loss in a primary could cost Republicans control of the Senate in November.

Party leaders believe that if Chafee loses to Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey in Tuesday's election, they will have little chance of keeping the seat because many see Laffey as too conservative in Democratic Rhode Island to prevail against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse.

If Chafee falls, he will be the second sitting senator to lose a primary this year. But unlike Democrat Joseph I. Lieberman in Connecticut, whose defeat is attributed to his outspoken support for the war, Chafee's problems have little to do with where he stands on issues. Rather, they are rooted in his contemplative, consensus-building style, an aberration in the current bitterly partisan climate.

By contrast, Laffey has an assertive, tough personality. He contends that Chafee's independence has made him irrelevant, and that his unpredictable voting patterns suggest a political identity crisis, as if the senator can't make up his mind. Most political observers in Rhode Island gave Laffey the edge as of late last week, but polling has been erratic, and both sides say the outcome is impossible to predict.

GOP leaders are so pessimistic about Laffey's prospects in November that they intend to pull out of the state if Chafee loses.

"It would be a disservice to our other candidates if we didn't," said Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which is leading the Chafee rescue effort with help from other GOP groups.

Ronayne noted that Rhode Island has elected two Republican senators since the Depression -- Chafee and his father, the late John H. Chafee. "That's why we're so plain-spoken about losing the seat," he said.

Chafee's struggles serve as a warning to other incumbents that voters are dangerously open-minded this year. Chafee may be a Republican in a Democratic state, but he is well in sync with Rhode Island voters. He opposes the war, backs abortion rights and other liberal social causes, and is an ardent environmentalist. But it's Laffey who has struck a chord with voters such as Roger Dupont.

"I don't care about any particular issue. Steve wants to upset the apple cart, which is good," said Dupont, a retiree who lives in a middle-class neighborhood in West Warwick where Laffey was knocking on doors. As the candidate trudged up the street with his wife, Kelly, four of his five children and six campaign workers, Dupont shrugged, saying, "The guy wants to work for it. He comes up and rings my doorbell, it gets my attention."

Only about 11 percent of voters here are registered Republicans, and while the primary is open to a much larger pool of independent voters, turnout is unlikely to be more than 50,000. Still, the two campaigns and their allies are expected to spend $5 million by primary day, saturating the state with television and radio ads, yard signs, fliers, Chafee wristbands, Laffey caps and other paraphernalia.

Laffey's advantage is that his voter base is easier to identify and highly motivated, consisting of Republicans who think Chafee is too liberal and independents who like the 44-year-old mayor's blustery, in-your-face style. His antics at Cranston City

Hall have provided fodder for critics and fans alike, but Laffey is widely respected for having saved his home town from fiscal disaster. The GOP's rejection of his candidacy has only bolstered his populist image. It's also kept the spotlight off his conservative views on hot-button issues, including his support for the war and opposition to abortion and embryonic stem cell research.

Chafee, on the other hand, worries that he is trapped between two constituencies. He is too middle-of-the-road to compete against Laffey for conservative support, and now -- given the GOP's blitz on his behalf -- too tethered to the Republican establishment to connect with moderates.

North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole, the NRSC chair, warned in a recent letter to GOP donors that if Chafee loses and Democrats take the seat, conservative judicial nominees may not advance and tax cuts could be in jeopardy. But Chafee is already a roadblock on both fronts. He opposed Samuel A. Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court and voted against the Bush tax cuts.

Chafee worries that the letter, which was widely reported in Rhode Island, casts him as a party pawn and could diminish his chances not only on Tuesday but also in a general election, when he will need a huge independent turnout to fend off Whitehouse.

"It's a high-wire act," Chafee said. "In either direction, you can't go too far."

Nor is Chafee convinced that the Republican outpouring has helped him much with conservatives. Many voters complain about the negative ads. First lady Laura Bush, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other luminaries have campaigned for Chafee, but the senator said he has seen little evidence that voters care. "I'm surprised the Republican support hasn't resonated more deeply," he said.

The senator's family is a pillar of Rhode Island's patrician ruling class, and his father was a popular governor and senator who died in office in 1999. His son had served as mayor of Warwick and had worked as a blacksmith on the Canadian harness-racing circuit before succeeding him.

After being appointed to complete his father's term, Chafee won a full Senate term in 2000, but it remains unclear whether he has formed the deep connection with voters that helps politicians survive volatile times.

Some Rhode Islanders do seem to have grown impatient with Chafee, unsure that he has the grit to tackle the many complicated problems that the country faces. Mary Beth Tsiokas, a Cranston housewife, stopped the senator on the sidewalk last week to ask about terrorism and the Iraq war.

"What would be your plan long term?" Tsiokas quizzed him. Chafee thought for a moment and began talking about the Cold War and the merits of diplomacy. Tsiokas studied the senator skeptically. "I can't get anyone to say why we should be so involved," she said, adding that she was still undecided on how to vote Tuesday.

Laffey relishes pointed questions and will expound on any subject voters raise. Shahnaz Siddigi, a Pakistani immigrant who lives in West Warwick, greeted Laffey at her door one evening and asked him how the United States should deal with Iran. The response was a long-winded lecture about standing up to dictators, weaning the country off foreign oil and completing the Iraq war. Siddigi listened intently, then announced she disagreed with him on every point.

"But I'm voting for you anyway," she reassured Laffey. "I'm impressed with what you're doing. I like your approach."

Rhode Island Race May Be Key To Senate (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Sen. Lincoln Chafee is in a tough fight for the GOP nomination. But his more conservative opponent could lose the seat for the party.

CRANSTON, R.I. — He opposed Bush administration tax cuts, voted against Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. and was the only Republican senator to vote no on the war in Iraq. On his presidential ballot in 2004, Lincoln Chafee even voted against George W. Bush, writing in the name of the president's father instead.

Chafee's liberal-to-moderate inclinations have served him well in his home state, where fewer than 70,000 voters are registered Republicans. His famous name also has been an asset: Chafee's late father, John, was beloved as a progressive Republican who served Rhode Island as governor and U.S. senator. Lincoln Chaffee was appointed to his father's seat in 1999.

But in a surprisingly heated primary contest Tuesday, Chafee will face off against Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey. The 44-year-old former investment banker, who has drawn support from national conservative organizations, has tried to paint Chafee as hopelessly out of touch with his own party.

In turn, national Republican groups worried about the party losing its hold on the Senate have sponsored anti-Laffey ads, such as the one that warns: "Mayor Steve Laffey accepts Mexican ID cards that can threaten our security. Will he put our security at risk in the Senate?"

DOJ_NMG_0060842

Perhaps the better question is whether Rhode Island voters will deal a clear blow to the GOP Senate majority. The outcome of the Chafee-Laffey race, considered too close to call, could alter the larger struggle for dominance in the Senate, because Laffey probably could not defeat the expected Democratic nominee.

Democrats must win a net six seats in November's general election to gain a majority. The spot held by the 53-year-old Chafee — one of the Republicans' most prominent Senate renegades — is among the most vulnerable, making his battle with Laffey the marquee matchup on a day when eight other states and the District of Columbia will conduct primaries.

"This primary determines whether Republicans can stay competitive in the Senate race" in Rhode Island, said Jennifer Duffy, a native of the state who is editor of the Cook Political Report in Washington. "If Chafee does not win this primary, Republicans may be done in Rhode Island. They may take the resources they have allocated for this state and put them somewhere else because they don't believe Laffey can win."

A Laffey victory would represent a major triumph for the Club for Growth, an anti-tax and advocacy group that seeks to return the Republican Party to the economically conservative ideals of President Reagan. The Club for Growth, which has poured more than $700,000 into Laffey's campaign, also takes credit for toppling Republican Rep. Joe Schwarz of Michigan in that state's August primary.

David Keating, the group's executive director, said he was unconcerned about how a potential Chafee defeat might shift Senate power. "Looking at the whole picture, we thought this was a good idea," Keating said. "Look, if the Republicans are going to lose control, they are going to lose this seat anyway."

Chafee could become the latest in a spate of incumbents defeated in recent primaries. Republican Gov. Frank H. Murkowski of Alaska lost his party's primary in late August, as did Rep. Cynthia A. McKinney of Georgia and Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, both Democrats, earlier in the month.

In Rhode Island, comparisons are being drawn between Chafee and Lieberman, despite the fact that they represent different parties. The parallel, Rhode Islanders say, lies in grass-roots dissatisfaction with someone in power.

"Everyone wants to know if Chafee is going to be the next Lieberman," said Darrell West, a Brown University professor of political science. "His problem is that he is a moderate facing a rebellion from within his own party. It is much the same as Lieberman. The difference is, Chafee voted against the war, and Lieberman in favor. Chafee has upset the Republican rank-and-file voters. If only the grass roots show up on Tuesday, he will lose."

West said he did not conduct a poll in this Senate primary because the sample of voters was so unreliable. As registered independents, about 50% of Rhode Islanders can take a GOP ballot on Tuesday. Democrats are barred from crossing over.

Chuck Newton, spokesman for the Rhode Island Republican Party, said state and national GOP groups have backed Chafee because "no poll has come out from day one showing that Steve Laffey can beat Sheldon Whitehouse," the former state attorney general who is heavily favored in the Democratic primary.

"Chafee can win against Whitehouse, and Laffey can't. That's exactly it," he said.

Veteran pollster Victor Profughi, director of the Bureau of Government Research and Services at Rhode Island College, agreed that conventional wisdom said Laffey couldn't win. "But I would never put much stock in conventional wisdom," Profughi said. "Laffey is a very effective grass-roots campaigner. He really excites people. He is very strong among people who ought to be dyed-in-the-wool Democrats. If you think of a Huey Long, he's that kind of person. It's oratory — all style."

Laffey's director of communications, Nachama Soloveichik, said: "Listen, the polls have said a lot of things. Stay tuned. Steve has never entered anything that he didn't think he could do all the way."

Soloveichik all but dismissed the role the Club for Growth has played in Laffey's campaign. "A lot of candidates get a lot of money from out of state," she said. "It is a small state, not a particularly wealthy state. This is not some nefarious issue."

But Ian Lang, Chafee's campaign manager, accused Laffey of putting personal ambition "above the good of the party — jeopardizing this seat. If Steve Laffey wins, this seat goes Democratic. It's as simple as that."

Lang said the Rhode Island results could ripple across the Senate. "I think the Club for Growth is trying to send a message to other moderates — that 'we're going to come after you,' " he said. "And they're not thinking about what's in the best interest of the Republican Party."

Cardin, Mfume Eye Prize (WT)

By S.a. Miller And Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

The leading Democrat in Maryland's U.S. Senate race yesterday turned to his political machine -- built over his 40 years of state politics -- to launch an imposing voter-turnout effort in the final days before the primary election Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0060843

"We've got to get the vote out, so we need your help today," Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore, said to about 100 volunteers at a rally in Towson.

Mr. Cardin, 62, then went to two other rallies with volunteers, in East Baltimore and Upper Marlboro.

High overall turnout will benefit him because it will offset the black vote, which accounts for about 40 percent of votes in Maryland Democratic primaries. Most of those votes likely will go to primary rival Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman and past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Cardin campaign leaders said yesterday that staff members already had made about 300,000 phone calls to voters and planned to make 250,000 more between yesterday and Tuesday. They also planned to knock on 75,000 "targeted doors in communities across the state." More than 1,200 volunteers would make phone calls, work at polls, drive voters to polls, and knock on doors on primary day, the Cardin campaign said.

The Mfume campaign indeed faces a much larger challenge, with one staffer saying yesterday that he and other staffers were "running around like crazy."

Mr. Mfume, 57, has 300 to 400 volunteers, an adviser said. They had made about 100,000 phone calls by yesterday, but did not have a targeted goal for the next few days. They hoped to knock on 40,000 doors.

The Mfume campaign also sent a caravan of 12 dump trucks and several other vehicles, bearing large Mfume signs, throughout Baltimore.

"It's a sprint to the finish line, and we're sprinting, and we've got 17 vehicles sprinting with us," said Mfume spokesman Steve Marinoff.

Mfume campaign manager Mark Clack said the goal of the final push is to make sure their candidate's base and those who would turn out to vote for Mr. Mfume indeed go to the polls on primary day.

"That is what it is all boiling down to," he said.

The Democratic nominee will face the likely Republican nominee -- Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, 47, and the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

The candidates are competing for the seat opened by retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat.

Mfume campaign callers are touting their candidate as an "independent voice" who will press for a quick military withdrawal from Iraq, universal health care and more college-tuition grants for the poor.

Mr. Cardin's campaign says its candidate helped expand Medicare benefits and "stood up to the president" by voting against the Iraq invasion in 2003.

High turnout also can help Mr. Cardin by reducing the percentage of votes siphoned off by the 16 lesser-known candidates in the Democratic primary, including Bethesda millionaire Josh Rales, who has raised his visibility in the race by spending about $4 million of his own money on TV ads.

Turnout for Maryland's Democratic primaries has averaged about 34 percent in the past four election cycles, according to the state Board of Elections.

At those levels, Mr. Mfume needs about three-quarters of the black vote and about 20 percent of the remaining votes to win, said Patrick Gonzales, president of the nonpartisan polling firm, Gonzales Research & Marketing Strategies. A recent Gonzales poll showed Mr. Mfume trailing Mr. Cardin, 43 percent to 30 percent, and Mr. Mfume winning about 15 percent of the black vote.

Other polls have showed a much closer primary race, including a SurveyUSA poll for WUSA-TV (Channel 9) last week, in which Mr. Mfume led Mr. Cardin, 42 percent to 38 percent. Mr. Mfume has had a marked advantage in all of the polls among black voters who have declared their support for a candidate.

"It could be Mr. Mfume still needs to get a higher percentage of the white vote than I've seen so far," Mr. Gonzales said.

The black vote also will be a key issue in the general election in November, when Mr. Steele, who is black and a Republican, will try to win votes from black Democrats.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume are aiming their drives to get out the vote in the state's most populated and most heavily Democratic jurisdictions: the city of Baltimore and Anne Arundel, Baltimore, Howard, Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

The Cardin campaign has concentrated its efforts further on his support base in the 3rd Congressional District, which Mr. Cardin has represented for 20 years. The district comprises parts of Baltimore city and Anne Arundel, Baltimore and Howard counties.

Neither campaign would say how it differentiates between Democratic voters within jurisdictions. A Cardin campaign official said the staff had cast a wide net and was telephoning Democrats who might have voted as infrequently as once in the past four primary elections.

Crucial Md. Vote To Mold New Political Landscape (WP)

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

A Younger Generation Finds a Rare Opening

Maryland is a state where politicians get elected and tend to settle in. But Tuesday's party primaries are the first step in a dramatic reordering of the political hierarchy, one that will mean a new U.S. senator for the first time in decades and could result in new faces in every statewide office.

The changes will range from the state's delegation on Capitol Hill to the county administrative buildings, where several of the state's most enduring county executives are moving on. And there could be a generational shift, as even the state's most iconic politician -- 84-year-old Comptroller William Donald Schaefer -- is in what appears to be his tightest election battle.

"It's a benchmark year," said House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel). "We're talking about replacing the longest-serving senator in Maryland history; we'll have new executives in three of the state's largest counties; and at least one new congressman."

Busch was referring to retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, who was first elected to public office 40 years ago and will have served in the Senate for 30. The low-key contest to replace him is the marquee race on the Democratic ballot. And in November, there will be new executives in Montgomery, Howard and Anne Arundel counties, as well as a host of new legislators and council members across the state.

Those in the new generation of Maryland leaders elected this fall "are the ones who will be faced with our toughest problems: how to solve the health-care crisis, how to restructure our budget, how to make college affordable," Busch said. It will be November before Marylanders know whether their overwhelmingly Democratic state has changed enough to reelect a Republican governor for the first time since the 1950s or to elect a GOP senator for the first time in a quarter-century.

But the party's leaders are thinking big. Chip DiPaula, who ran Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s groundbreaking campaign in 2002 and now serves as his chief of staff, said he believes the elections will swing the door open for Republicans, who have been out of power for most of the past century.

"We're looking at real [shared] government," he said.

Ehrlich is unopposed in the primary, as is his Democratic competitor, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who leads in the polls. For all the change in the air, it is the first time in years that neither party's nomination for governor is contested. Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) pulled out of the race in June.

The replacement for Democratic Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., who is retiring, will be of a younger generation. And Republicans in November will be looking to increase the gains they have made in recent years in the General Assembly, especially in the outer suburbs.

But some things about Maryland haven't changed much. With less than a third of the state's voters registered as Republicans and with few competitive battles, the party's contests Tuesday have drawn little notice.

And the Democratic tradition remains overwhelming in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, where the primary is almost always the final say. Of 46 General Assembly, County Council and other seats chosen on a partisan vote in Montgomery, only two are held by Republicans. In Prince George's, none is.

Below are summaries of the principal races.U.S. Senate and House

Sarbanes's decision to not seek a sixth term has brought an outpouring of candidates to replace him. But the two who jumped into the race first -- former congressman Kweisi Mfume and Baltimore Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin -- are the front-runners at the end.

Five of the 18 candidates on the Democratic ballot have conducted the most visible campaigns, and for the most part, they have given little indication that they would vary greatly from the reliably liberal record Sarbanes built.

Potomac businessman and philanthropist Josh Rales has spent more than $5 million of his own money on the campaign, and his television commercials became ubiquitous in the Baltimore and Washington media markets. But Rales's lack of Democratic connections -- he has contributed money to President Bush and Ehrlich -- meant he had no network of supporters to build on his media campaign.

American University professor Allan Lichtman has offered voters a strict opposition to the Iraq war and his long career as an educator, but his campaign never became the grass-roots force he had hoped for. Former Baltimore county executive Dennis Rasmussen presented himself as the moderate alternative but drew little attention in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, where 40 percent of the state's Democrats reside.

Cardin and Mfume agree so much on the issues that in recent forums Cardin began using Mfume's lines. In the end, Mfume said that though the two might vote the same, he would be the more passionate voice for the poor and for Democratic causes. Cardin promoted his success at forging bipartisan consensus during his nearly 20 years in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0060845

Political experts believe that the others in the crowded field could draw their support from voters who might otherwise back Cardin. Polls show that black Democrats overwhelmingly support Mfume, and he is hoping that the chance for an African American on the statewide Democratic ticket will increase the turnout. But Cardin, with far more money and a statewide television campaign, is thought to have the most organized operation for getting supporters to the polls.

On the Republican side, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the chosen candidate of the national and state GOP, faces only nominal opposition.

Maryland will have at least one new member of Congress next year as voters in Cardin's squiggly district pick a replacement. The district rambles from Baltimore's Inner Harbor through parts of Baltimore, Howard and Anne Arundel counties. Democrats will choose from a group that includes a state senator, a former television reporter, a Baltimore health commissioner and a lawyer, John Sarbanes, who is the senator's son. Republicans will choose among a doctor who lost to Cardin last time and two others.

House Democratic Whip Steny H. Hoyer is unopposed, and Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D) is not seriously threatened. The most spirited challenge to an incumbent is in the 4th District, where Rep. Albert R. Wynn is in a surprising battle with community activist Donna Edwards. Wynn stresses what he has brought home to the district, but Edwards labels him "Maryland's Joe Lieberman" for his vote in favor of authorizing the Iraq war and of other issues in which he strayed from his Democratic colleagues. The district stretches from the Frederick County line through Montgomery and down to Fort Washington in Prince George's.Statewide Offices

Schaefer, who began his public life in 1955 on the Baltimore City Council, wants one more term. But his close ties to Ehrlich, controversial remarks on immigrants and outlandish comments about women have not endeared him to the state's mostly liberal Democrats.

The comptroller stresses a career free of scandal and a "name you can trust," but his opponents are trying to make the case that his time has come.

Del. Peter Franchot, a liberal from Takoma Park, was the first to take on the legend, saying that antics that once seemed eccentric now are embarrassing. He promotes himself as the only real Democrat running and says he would be a more formidable watchdog on the Board of Public Works, the panel that approves much of state government's business.

But Franchot's mission became far more complicated when Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens jumped into the race. Owens, the only woman mounting a serious statewide campaign, presents herself as a moderate alternative. A series of bizarre spats between Owens and Schaefer has drawn the most attention: She said running against him was like telling grandpa it's time to turn over the car keys, and he responded by saying she dressed like Old Mother Hubbard and is "getting fat."

Four Republicans have waged a quiet race to take on the winner.

To replace Curran, Democrats will choose between Montgomery State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, who has coveted the job his entire career, and former Baltimore state's attorney Stuart O. Simms, who has wanted it for a few weeks. (Montgomery County Council member Tom Perez will appear on the ballot, although the state's high court has ruled him ineligible.)

Simms hasn't run for elected office in a decade, but he signed on to be Duncan's lieutenant governor candidate. When Duncan exited the race, he and others, including those who thought the Baltimore region should not be without a candidate for attorney general, encouraged Simms to run. He has drawn a number of high-profile supporters, but his campaign has been hindered by a lack of money and a late start.

Gansler, by contrast, has been planning his campaign for years. He has a Web site filled with proposals on combating gangs and pursuing polluters, and he has raised almost $2 million.

Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle is unopposed on the Republican side.Montgomery County

The state's largest jurisdiction will see a new leader after 12 years of Duncan's stewardship, and the two leading candidates to replace him are County Council member Steven Silverman (D-At Large) and former council member Isiah "Ike" Leggett, former chairman of the state Democratic Party.

The two share goals of creating affordable housing and maintaining the quality of Montgomery's schools. Leggett has said he would do a better job of controlling growth, standing up to developers who have been generous to Silverman's campaign.

Silverman, in turn, has cast himself as the more decisive leader and said he would be more aggressive in funding road projects and the proposed Purple Line.

All nine council seats are up for election, and two are open. Among General Assembly contests, the incumbent facing the most trouble is Democratic Sen. Ida G. Ruben, who has represented the Takoma Park-Silver Spring district for 20 years. She is in an increasingly bitter primary with American University law professor Jamie Raskin.

Voters not affiliated with a party can vote in the school board races.Prince George's County

DOJ_NMG_0060846

More than 100 candidates in 21 races will be on the Democratic primary ballot, where winning the nomination usually means election.

County Executive Jack B. Johnson is running hard for a second term, emphasizing an economic boom and rising property tax revenue, which have brought added services and school construction.

Rushern L. Baker III, who lost in a multi-candidate race four years ago, charges that Johnson has been unwilling to acknowledge the county's rising crime problem and says Johnson's awarding of county contracts to friends and campaign supporters is a form of corruption.

All nine seats of the County Council are on the ballot, although there will be far less turnover than four years ago, when eight members were elected. There are a number of spirited General Assembly battles, including crowded races to replace three retiring Democrats: Del. Pauline H. Menes and Sens. Leo E. Green and Gloria G. Lawlah.

All registered voters are allowed to vote for the school board, which becomes an elected body for the first time since 2002. Voters on Tuesday will winnow a field of 46 candidates to 18, and in the Nov. 7 election will choose the board of nine.

Minorities In GOP Rally For Allen In N.Va. (WP)

By Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen joined several hundred Asian, Hispanic and black supporters in Fairfax County yesterday at a rally designed to show diversity within the Republican Party while recognizing immigrants' growing clout in state elections.

The event came as Allen, a candidate for reelection who has been dogged for weeks by charges of insensitivity to minorities, juggles a rural image that has served him well in past races with the political reality that vote-rich Northern Virginia includes swelling ethnic populations.

"It is invigorating to be here with all sorts of different, diverse backgrounds," Allen told the audience after saying "good morning" and "thank you" in several languages.

Allen was joined by Reps. Frank R. Wolf and Thomas M. Davis III, two Northern Virginia Republicans facing aggressive Democratic challengers in an area where political allegiances could be shifting.

"This is a tough year," Davis told the crowd, which included at least a dozen ethnic Republican groups. "You can read the polls. You can read the press. You can see we are all under fire. We need your help."

A Mason-Dixon poll commissioned by several newspapers across the state and scheduled for release today shows Allen leading Democratic challenger James Webb 46 to 42 percent, according to people familiar with the survey. But Webb leads Allen by 13 points in Northern Virginia, even though the Democrat is relatively unknown and won't air his first television ad until tomorrow. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points.

Northern Virginia has changed since Allen, a former U.S. representative and governor, last ran for office in 2000.

In Fairfax County, the state's largest jurisdiction, 27 percent of the population is foreign-born. In Loudoun County, whites made up nearly 83 percent of the population in 2000, compared with 74 percent today. The number of Hispanics in Prince William County more than doubled in the past six years, census figures show.

Virginia's ethnic population remains a relatively small portion of the electorate, pollsters say. And unlike African Americans, who tend to vote Democratic, immigrants in Virginia are not closely aligned with either political party, making them critical swing voters in close elections.

Allen is trying to recover from his remark last month to a young man of Indian descent. Allen called the Webb campaign aide "macaca." After nationwide criticism, Allen apologized, saying he didn't realize the word, a genus of monkey, is a slur in some cultures.

Democrats say the remark hurt Allen among non-white voters, including Korean and Indian Americans who often vote Republican in federal races.

"I think it creates a big opening," said Peter Brodnitz, Webb's pollster. "In addition to the real impact, there is a symbolic problem, which is George Allen coming across as closed-minded."

Robert E. Lang, director of Virginia Tech's Metropolitan Institute, said many first- and second-generation Americans in Northern Virginia are well-educated with high incomes, a combination increasingly receptive to Democrats.

"The way to look at Virginia now is it's like South Carolina, with the suburbs in New Jersey and Connecticut laid on top of it," Lang said. "I think it signals a new politics."

For years, Northern Virginia communities outside the Capital Beltway were Republican strongholds, offsetting liberal-leaning neighborhoods closer to the District. But Democrats have been making steady gains. In 2004, Sen. John F. Kerry

(Mass.) became the first Democratic presidential candidate in four decades to win Fairfax County. In last year's governor's race, Timothy M. Kaine (D) trounced Republican Jerry W. Kilgore in parts of Northern Virginia.

After Kilgore's loss, the state Republican Party commissioned a study to examine how to prevent similar defeats. Among other findings, the report concluded that the area's changing demographics "are having a dramatic impact on the politics of the region."

Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R), who won his race last year by 323 votes, said: "We need to go into ethnic communities, look them in the eye and tell them why our solutions are better."

Yesterday, Allen spoke about his efforts to support minorities. He said he has secured more visas for high-tech workers, backed historically black colleges, promoted a nuclear deal between India and the United States, fought gangs and encouraged more students to study math and science. In Allen's past statewide races, aides said, he has won more black votes than Republicans traditionally receive.

"My friends, I look at each election as a way to unify and inspire," he said at the event, sponsored by the Fairfax County Republican Committee at Edison High School in the county's Alexandria section.

Do Thieu, a Vietnamese American from Annandale who attended the rally, said Allen has always been there for his community. "He has listened, so his actions speak louder than words," he said.

Despite Allen's outreach, some analysts are wondering whether the Republican fully comprehends how the state is changing.

Last week, as he has for years, Allen put on a cowboy hat and saddled up a horse -- this time named Bubba -- to ride in Buena Vista's annual Labor Day parade. Allen, who was born and raised in California, rode down the parade route greeting the Shenandoah Valley crowd by saying, "Howdy! How y'all doing? Good to see y'all."

When the image was broadcast, one longtime Allen supporter said he cringed. "Seeing him with a horse called Bubba wearing cowboy boots, that doesn't resonate with us," said Terone Green, a Republican activist from Richmond who is black.

Green added: "He needs to revamp his whole operation. . . . I have never seen it this bad. I have friends who are just so anti-[Allen] now."

In an interview yesterday, Allen said: "I always ride horses. I wear boots. I am who I am."

Davis said Allen, who ended his day with a speech to 100,000 NASCAR fans at Richmond International Raceway, can't afford to have a rural image in Northern Virginia. Some GOP leaders say Kilgore's southwest Virginia accent cost him votes from independents.

Even so, Virginia remains relatively conservative. In 2004, President Bush defeated Kerry by nine percentage points. Lang said Allen might want to consider losing the cowboy image if he wants to avoid a loss in Northern Virginia. "The sort of Los Angeles identity might serve him better" in the area, said Lang, referring to where Allen grew up.

Allen rebuffed that advice, saying he lost his first campaign for the House of Delegates in 1979 after an adviser made him stop wearing his belt buckle and cowboy boots.

"The best advice I ever received from anyone was 'Just be yourself,' " Allen said.

McCaskill Tries To Buck State's Rising 'red' Tide (KCS)

By Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, September 10, 2006

One big question for Democrat Claire McCaskill: Can she stem Missouri's Republican tide?

As McCaskill seeks to defeat U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, the distinct shift in the state's voting patterns toward the GOP presents a thorny challenge.

That is, she must capture a greater share of independent voters than Democrats had to win just a few years ago. In 1998, according to the polling firm Zogby International, a Democrat needed about a third of independents to top 50 percent overall. These days, McCaskill must hold her Democratic base and attract at least half of all independents, who now are more than a quarter of all voters.

That challenge is compounded by two factors: More independents are voting Republican in recent years. Also, Republicans remain more reliable voters than their Democratic counterparts.

"All things being equal, McCaskill has to do better with that middle voter," said Missouri State University political scientist George Connor.

Democrats downplay recent Republican victories and insist the two parties remain basically at par. Recent narrow Republican wins, said Roy Temple, a former chief of staff to U.S. Sen. Jean Carnahan, have made the state appear redder than it really is.

DOJ_NMG_0060848

"It's amazing how much the Republicans have capitalized powerwise on essentially a quite marginal electoral advantage," he said.

McCaskill says the shift has more to do with GOP organizers outhustling Democrats than any significant ideological swing.

"The Democratic Party had gotten fat and lazy in terms of taking its majorities for granted," she said.

But analysts say something more significant has occurred. After all, in the state House and Senate, Republicans now dominate chambers that in the 1980s were firmly in Democratic hands. Five of the state's nine U.S. House members are Republican, as are its two U.S. senators. Putting aside the 2000 election of Gov. Mel Carnahan, who died in a plane crash just before the vote, the state has not elected a Democratic senator since 1980.

The major change has been in the rural-urban population split. The portion of the state's population growth for the state's two largest metropolitan areas dropped nearly 20 percent from the decade of the 1980s to the '90s. (St. Louis has actually lost population since 2000, while Kansas City has grown, but only slightly.)

At the same time, the share of the population growth in rural Missouri, where the GOP has been deriving strength for decades, nearly doubled from the decade of the '80s to the decade of the '90s. From 1990 to 2000, rural Missouri had 36 percent of the state's growth, and that share continues to increase this decade.

The Kansas City and the St. Louis areas still had the biggest slice of the population pie — 55 percent in 2000, according to The Brookings Institution — but that percentage was down slightly from its share 10 years before.

"The growth in outstate Missouri is one of the most important political trends in the last couple of years," said Democratic pollster Fred Yang, who has polled in Missouri since the mid-1990s.

That growth, he said, has turned Missouri into an "even-steven" state. Who wins on Election Day, he said, depends on who turns out to vote.

Another key shift: the dramatic drop in union members, who remain part of the bedrock Democratic base. In 1983, nearly 21 percent of Missouri workers belonged to a union. Twenty years later, just 12 percent did.

Republicans have capitalized on the shifts by emphasizing social issues, such as abortion, gun rights and opposition to gay marriage. That has helped cement the GOP base, said Republican consultant John Hancock.

The shift in focus combined with the new demographics has altered the way Missouri votes.

George W. Bush carried Missouri in 2000 and 2004 by percentages that topped his national support.

In 1992, network exit polls showed 42 percent of Missouri voters were Democrats, compared with 29 percent who were Republican. Those numbers narrowed during the next decade. By 2004, Republicans had the edge over Democrats — 36 percent to 35 percent.

In U.S. Senate primaries, Democratic Missourians once routinely outvoted Republicans 2-to-1 and even 3-to-1. Since 2000, almost equal numbers of Democrats and Republicans show up on primary day.

Missouri's "tilting conservative," pollster John Zogby said.

Still, said Connor, the political scientist, McCaskill must attract moderate independent voters.

He pointed to McCaskill's handling of immigration as a classic example of a Democrat trying to find middle ground on a contentious issue. McCaskill's approach has been to focus on businesses that hire illegal immigrants. In doing so, she can sound tough in a way that relates to Republicans angry at the flow of illegal immigrants into the country, Connor said. And by targeting businesses instead of the immigrants, McCaskill probably won't anger Democrats sympathetic to immigrants.

U.S. Sen. Kit Bond, a Republican, said the shift to the GOP was primarily because of the leftward lean of the national Democratic Party:

"I can't tell you how many people come up to me from all over the state and say, 'I've always been a Democrat, but I can't vote for that left-wing group up there (in Washington).' "

McCaskill, though, agrees with Talent that Missourians are independent-minded enough to vote the person rather than the party. Rural Missouri may have swung Republican in recent years. But look at St. Louis County, the state's largest, which once was a tough place for Democrats to win, she said.

In the 2004 governor's race, McCaskill carried it by nearly 60,000 votes. That she still lost is one more indicator of the growing clout of rural Missouri.

McCaskill is convinced that Republicans don't have an electoral lock on outstate Missouri, and is actively campaigning in rural counties.

"I really believe … that our problems in rural Missouri have stemmed from inattention and our willingness to let the Republican message dominate. We should have been going out there and making the powerful case that we will do a better job of looking out for people who live in rural Missouri."

Hancock says the next two elections will determine how long the pro-GOP shift is destined to last. There again, demographics don't favor the Democrats.

In 2004, Bush won all 10 of the state's fastest-growing counties, many by big margins.

Neglected By Democrats, Blacks Jump The Party Line (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 10, 2006

Committeewoman Norma Leggette (4th Ward) isn't sure what the Democratic Party stands for anymore. She wonders how she's supposed to excite constituents in her ward about November's elections.

Leggette said there are two Democratic parties in St. Louis - one that benefits whites and another that ignores blacks. "At one time, Democrats were a solution for us. I don't know when that changed or why that changed, but it has," Leggette told me.

Her comments underscore a familiar complaint from blacks who claim the Democratic Party takes them for granted.

Leggette voiced her concerns Tuesday during a rah-rah session with several local elected Democrats, hosted by U.S. Senate candidate Claire McCaskill. After reading the exchange posted on a local Weblog, Pub Def Weekly, I called Leggette to confirm her comments.

The quotes were correct, the 40-year veteran of local politics told me. She has no intention of voting for McCaskill's Republican rival, U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, but, like me, she's grown bored with the dog and pony show put on when major elections roll around. Democrats show up, throw out the "evil Republican" mantra, ask for black votes, then disappear without ever addressing our socioeconomic concerns or needs.

Democrats raise millions for major campaigns that rarely trickle down to neighborhood committees, like Leggette's, charged with getting blacks to the polls, she said. It's a "frustrating" experience, complicated by "clueless" leadership and blacks seeking personal gain.

"My community has been affected by benign neglect. Black political leaders only interested in lining their pockets with crumbs ought to get the hell out of the way," Leggette said.

During the meeting Tuesday, Leggette said McCaskill dissed Talent's friendship with President George W. Bush and criticized the president for letting poor and black people die in New Orleans. That didn't cut it for Leggette.

"Being a Democrat doesn't just mean being in opposition to Bush or Talent. You have to bring some meat to the table."

Other black Democrats I spoke with Friday agreed with Leggette, but they are willing to take their disenchantment further. Some were among the 300 guests who attended the "African-Americans for Talent" soiree in July. Charles Kirkwood, owner of Midwestern Construction & Development in the city, plans to jump party lines in the upcoming election.

"I've never voted for a Republican in my life, but I'm supporting Talent," Kirkwood told me, ticking off several reasons the candidate has earned his respect. He particularly respects Talent's federal initiatives to empower disadvantaged minority and small businesses. The $1.2 billion digital and wireless technology bill Talent sponsored will streamline needed job-training funds to institutions like Harris-Stowe State University and Lincoln University in Jefferson City, Kirkwood said. Blacks, he said, are "carrying the water" for the Democratic party - it hasn't reciprocated.

"We have a majority black populated city. Billions have been spent on development in this region. Very little has gone to black developers," Kirkwood said. "I've been blindly supporting Democrats for years, but what has it gotten me? Nothing."

Caroline Douglas, a black Democrat living in Manchester and president of the Sickle Cell Disease Community Advocates, also supports Talent. He "stepped up" to address a health crisis in Missouri, Douglas said, not only passing legislation that increased federal spending on sickle-cell anemia, but also he personally helped raise almost $3 million toward building and operating 40 treatment centers throughout the state, she said.

Halbert Sullivan, CEO and founder of the Father's Support Center in St. Louis, said Talent helped his agency obtain federal money for programs to help African-American men and low-income families. McCaskill, Sullivan said, is relying on black politicians to carry her message because she has no record of accomplishments in the black community.

"Her commercials boast of her desire to combat terrorism and illegal immigration, but how does that make her different than her opponent?" Sullivan said.

I remember walking away impressed with Talent after we'd shared a table at a minority business luncheon. Although an impressive candidate, he wouldn't get my vote because I think his politics are in line with a downright scary administration.

Kirkwood, Sullivan and Douglas aren't exactly fans of Bush either. But their differences with the top-ranking Republican won't alter their vote, they told me.

"All politics are local," said Kirkwood. "I disagree with Bush on mostly everything, especially this war, but I'm still supporting Talent."

Casey Says He's More Than Just The 'Anti-Santorum' (PPG)

By James O'Toole, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 10, 2006

CAMPAIGN 2006

Rushing away from the Labor Day parade, Bob Casey had just crossed Stanwix Street when a woman grabbed his hand, looked him in the eye, and said vigorously, "Keep after him; you've got to beat that guy."

Moments later, a car's horn beeped, and its driver poked his head out of the window. "Good Luck, Bob. You've got to beat that Sanitation guy," the man said.

"I keep getting these directives," a bemused Mr. Casey observed as he walked on. " 'You HAVE to ...' "

To his challenge to incumbent Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, Mr. Casey brings a golden name in Pennsylvania politics and the hopes of a Democratic Party hungry for victory against a polarizing figure with a record of frustrating their partisan hopes.

The imperative of defeating Mr. Santorum was the chief reason party leaders turned to Mr. Casey in the days after he won his term as state treasurer with the largest vote total of any candidate for any office in Pennsylvania history. It was the reason that Gov. Ed Rendell, the brunt of tough Casey attacks in their primary for governor four years ago, helped clear the field of serious opposition for him in this year's primary. It was the reason that many liberal Democrats overcame their objections to conservative positions on social issues. In a state where no Democrat has won a full Senate term since 1962, Bob Casey offers the promise of victory -- or so they hope.

"Sometimes Democrats ... we've forgotten that the objective of every election is to win," Mr. Casey said as he recalled the deliberations that brought him to the race.

But as the admonitions that followed him on Labor Day and throughout the campaign attest, the strongest passions in this campaign are generated not by this champion vote-getter, but by his opponent. The incumbent has devoted followers. He also generates antipathy unusual even in this increasingly polarized climate.

So for Mr. Casey, is it enough to be the anti-Santorum?

"No, it's not," he insisted on a holiday weekend as he rode through Westmoreland County. His campaign, he says, offers a positive choice, not just a chance to vote against someone. Buttressing his argument, he points to his record as auditor general and treasurer, the state offices he has occupied for the last decade after a political apprenticeship at the feet of his father, the late governor.

As auditor general, the post that first made his father's name as well, Mr. Casey won generally positive headlines for spotlighting abuses in areas such as nursing home supervision, child care policies and the follow-through on Megan's law.

Discussing that record, he said, "I think nursing homes and child care were the most significant, because they led to real change."

The nursing home audit prodded the administration of former Gov. Tom Ridge to increase spending and change procedures for the monitoring of the state's institutions for the elderly. On child care, Mr. Casey's office successfully fought a proposal to increase co-payments for lower-income working mothers.

The issues he cites were substantive, but they also point to a tactical advantage he holds in this race, conferred by the nature of candidates' different political paths. Over 16 years in the House and Senate, Mr. Santorum has cast votes on hundreds of issues, many of them difficult. Savvy opposition researchers have each of them archived, ready to be retrieved to fuel efforts to place him on the defensive.

Mr. Casey has dealt with tough, substantive issues, but for the most part, they've been issues of his choosing. In contrast to a legislator or a governor, he has not had issues thrust upon him. So far in this campaign, Mr. Santorum has attempted to raise questions about Mr. Casey's work habits and attendance record in his state posts, but he's yet to challenge any policy choices.

For months, the Republican campaign has asserted that Mr. Casey is too content to be the anti-Santorum, that he has no positions and won't discuss issues. As an overall statement, that's not accurate. Mr. Casey has clear and well-known positions on a variety of issues, some of them controversial within his own party.

He supports the rights of gun owners and he opposes abortion. Those positions are seen by Democratic strategist as keys to muting issues that have allowed Republicans such as Mr. Santorum to harvest votes from more conservative Democrats. Mr. Casey and Mr. Santorum are both observant Roman Catholics, but they differ on the legal grounding of their opposition to abortion.

Mr. Santorum argues that a whole line of Supreme Court cases, starting with the Griswold v. Connecticut, a 1965 decision that struck down a Connecticut ban on contraceptives, were wrongly decided in that they found an implicit right to privacy within the Constitution. While Mr. Casey would like to see Roe v. Wade, the landmark abortion case, overturned, he said, "I don't think there's any question that there's a right to privacy. I disagree with a lot of Democrats that that right should be the foundation of a right to abortion."

Flouting the tax hike taboo that rose with the Republican revolution of 1994, Mr. Casey has called for a repeal of the Bush tax cuts for those earning more than $200,000 a year. Taking pages from the moderate playbook of the Democratic Leadership Council, he has endorsed legislative proposals to provide health insurance for children and help small businesses provide health insurance for their employees. He has also embraced a call issued by lawmakers including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., for a corporate welfare commission to root out tax breaks and budget pork.

But the charges of vagueness ring truer on some of the more important issues facing the Senate and the country. While sharply criticizing the incumbent's call for private accounts for younger workers to transform the current Social Security system, Mr. Casey has not offered any specific alternative to its looming solvency problems. He calls Social Security a problem, not a crisis.

He notes that other entitlement problems, notably Medicare, represent a much greater threat to the overall federal budget. Mr. Casey advocates a change in the Medicare Part D legislation to allow government to negotiate lower drug prices but acknowledges that is just one part of any overall solution to the financial burden promised with the retirement of the Baby Boom generation.

Budget arithmetic questions

The steps he has advocated on the budget deficit, including the tax increase, add up, by his calculation, to about $1.3 trillion over 10 years. But, as his exchanges with Tim Russert on last week's edition of NBC's "Meet the Press" underscored, that number is less than half way to the deficit remedy he has called for. Neither in answer to Mr. Russert nor elsewhere in the campaign has he recommended specific programs to be eliminated from the budget. And he has advocated a variety of significant spending increases, such as making Veterans Administration health care a virtual entitlement for veterans that, while arguably worthwhile in isolation, would add many billions to federal spending. The new direction he advocates on the budget, Mr. Casey said, "is not an easy path, it's not a smooth road; it's not the path of least resistance. It's going to be difficult to reduce the deficit but we have to do it."

When pressed on the budget arithmetic, Mr. Casey continues his call for tough measures, but still largely begs the question of specifics.

"It's more than saying we can cut here; we can move this money there. A lot of it has to do with fiscal discipline over time," he said. "When you have that fiscal discipline as a regular part of how you do your budgeting, it has a disciplining effect."

Mr. Casey argues further that demands he provide a complete blueprint for deficit elimination amount to a double standard when he is running against a candidate whose party has presided over a hemorrhage of federal red ink.

"I'm still waiting for Rick Santorum to come up with $1.3 trillion," he said. "He's been there for 12 years; where's his plan. ... You can't support the case for deficit reduction and support the tax cuts for the top 1 percent; [he] has a maniacal obsession with the top 1 percent."

'New strategy' on Iraq

On the Iraq war, he has offered specifics in one sense, calling for the firing of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. He said, "We need a new strategy and that means completely new leadership if we are going to avoid a civil war, and a lot of people think it's been moving in that direction."

He has resisted the calls of some fellow Democrats for a withdrawal or a timetable for disengagement. Asked what he would do if it became clear that a civil war had emerged, he employs a typical tactical segue, deflecting the answer into an attack on his opponent, "You've got to have a long and well-informed debate in Congress. ... In the weeks leading up to the war, there were no questions. ... It was breathtaking."

The Santorum campaign constantly refers to their challenger as "Bobby Casey Jr." Using the diminutive is meant to remind voters that Mr. Casey's political career is a function of the fact that he is the son of the late governor. While it may represent an attack for some, it's one that Mr. Casey is eager to embrace. He regularly reminds audiences of his father's legacy.

"If I can be half as good as my dad, I'll be one of the best," he told a well-wisher at a union picnic who praised the former governor.

Such references are always warmly received by Democratic audiences, a fact that yields some irony given the late governor's relations with his party in his later years. All the Caseys long remembered what they saw as a deliberate snub when the governor was denied a speaking spot at the 1992 Democratic National Convention. While an unreconstructed New Dealer on economic issues, the elder Casey considered his party's drift to the left on social issues a mistake, in the case of abortion, on both moral and tactical grounds.

Reflecting on the calls he received from national Democrats courting his candidacy for this race, Mr. Casey said he thought it showed that Democrats were ready to learn a lesson from his father.

"I think it showed that some national leaders were interested in broadening the perspective of the party," he said.

Smiling, he said of his father, "I wish he was around to hear about those calls."

Mr. Santorum charged in the "Meet the Press" debate that the elder Mr. Casey would be upset by his son's endorsement of a recent Federal Drug Administration decision to allow over-the-counter sales of the Plan B contraception pill.

DOJ_NMG_0060852

The day after their face-off, Mr. Casey, who characterizes the pill as contraception rather than abortion, expressed anger at his opponent's reference to his father.

"I had a feeling that, at some point in this campaign, he would use that," Mr. Casey said. "But I thought it would be at a point when he was getting particularly desperate; and I think, for whatever reason, he reached that point yesterday."

But Mr. Casey is not surprised that the race is turning tougher as the election gets closer.

A few week earlier, he stood beside the demolition derby pit at the Big Butler Fair. Minutes later a car emblazoned with his name would meet a brave but ignominious end, going down at the first blow, faster than Liston against Ali. Mr Casey, naturally, didn't dwell on the fate of his namesake. To the suggestion that he and Mr. Santorum could save a lot of time and money by getting behind the wheel themselves and settling their battle amid this cacophony of collisions, Mr. Casey gestured over his shoulder and said, "It'll be worse than this before it's over."

Primary Day A Warm-up For November Vote (AP)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, September 10, 2006

In Arizona, one House candidate called party officials idiots. In Rhode Island, ad-makers turned a Senate hopeful into a political pinata.

And that's just Republicans attacking Republicans ahead of Tuesday's nine-state primary night, the busiest of the year.

For some candidates on the ballot, Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York among them, the primaries are a warm-up of sorts in advance of the fall re-election campaign and then a possible 2008 race for the White House.

For other successful politicians, they are a winnowing process.

That is the situation in Maryland, where Rep. Ben Cardin and Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman and one-time head of the NAACP, are the best known among 18 contenders for the Democratic Senate nomination.

The primary winner will run against Michael Steele, the state's lieutenant governor who is seeking to be the Senate's only black Republican.

Republicans, facing the possibility of the loss of seats in several states, hope Steele can become their brightest star of the year, even though it has been more than a quarter-century since the GOP has won a Senate race in Maryland.

After Tuesday's primary, the Democratic nominee "will be broke and without momentum facing a strong candidate with a message of empowerment that is resonating across Maryland," said Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the Republican senatorial committee.

For the political parties, the week's primaries represent another in a dwindling number of chances to influence the lineup for the November ballot, when the GOP's continued control of the House and the Senate is at stake.

Hence, the controversy.

In a Tucson-area seat in Arizona, the National Republican Congressional Committee has run an ad supporting Steve Huffman, praising him as an advocate of lower taxes and a "common sense approach to immigration that puts security first." Huffman is "the conservative choice," said the commercial.

A recent poll showed Huffman trailing a former state lawmaker, Randy Graf.

Graf won 43 percent of the primary vote in an unsuccessful run against Rep. Jim Kolbe two years ago, but party officials have expressed concerns he may be too conservative to win the seat in November.

The decision by strategists in Washington to intervene did not impress Graf or the three other contenders for the nomination. They held a news conference to criticize the move.

"They're idiots," said one, former state party chairman Mike Hellon. He and the three other Republicans running said the GOP had split the party and they predicted Democrats would benefit.

Huffman's campaign did not seem bothered.

"It's made the choice more clear. The fact of the matter is Steve is the only Republican in the race who can win the general election," said David Steumpfle, Huffman's campaign manager.

Whether or not they benefit, Democrats appear to believe that Huffman would be the toughest Republican to beat in November. No sooner had the House Republican committee begin airing its ad supporting him than Democrats rolled out one of their own criticizing him.

It said Huffman's tough-on-immigration claims were not true, and that he had skipped votes in the Arizona Legislature on new border technology and enforcement of immigration laws.

"If we can't trust Huffman to show up for work, how can we trust him to protect us," it asks.

The most prominent Democratic contenders are Gabrielle Giffords and Patty Weiss, a former television journalist.

DOJ_NMG_0060853

Republicans intervened in Rhode Island, too, but went one step further than in Arizona.

With Sen. Lincoln Chafee struggling to fend off a primary challenge, the National Republican Senatorial Committee attacked his rival on television and in mass mailings. "Mayor Steve Laffey accepts Mexican ID cards that can threaten our security. Will he put our security at risk in the Senate?" asked one recent ad that has drawn criticism from Hispanic groups.

Ironically, Laffey's views on numerous issues are more in the mainstream of the Republican Party than are Chafee's. Laffey opposes abortion, favors making tax cuts permanent and supports the war in Iraq.

But as in Arizona, party strategists fear the loss of Chafee's seat to the Democrats.

"Obviously Linc Chafee is the only one who can win in Rhode Island," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, head of the GOP campaign committee. She said that if Laffey wins the primary, her organization will not spend any money to help him in the fall.

Delaware, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Vermont and Wisconsin also have primaries on Tuesday. The District of Columbia will select mayoral candidates.

Familiar Names In Primary Races (LAT)

By Don Frederick, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Contests around the country Tuesday include members of longtime political families.

WASHINGTON — A trio of famed political names — Goldwater, Clinton and Cuomo — dot the ballots in some of the 10 primaries being held across the nation on Tuesday.

In Arizona, contenders for the Republican gubernatorial nomination include the nephew of the late Sen. Barry Goldwater — for decades the state's preeminent politician and a father of the conservative movement that dominates the national GOP.

Buoyed by his last name, Don Goldwater, 50, is given a strong shot at winning the primary. But whoever the Republicans pick will be an underdog against Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano in November's vote.

Also attracting attention is the GOP primary for an open House seat in the Tucson area. With several candidates in the race, former state Rep. Randy Graf is banking that his tough stance against illegal immigration will propel him to victory.

A Graf win would strengthen the hand of Republicans opposing any revision to immigration law that includes a path to citizenship for those in the U.S. illegally. But a Graf win also could improve prospects for Democrats gaining one of the 15 GOP seats they need to control the House. The district is politically competitive and has been represented by a moderate — Jim Kolbe, the only openly gay GOP member of Congress.

In New York, Democrats are poised to renominate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, and to name state Atty. Gen. Eliot Spitzer as their gubernatorial choice — both by overwhelming margins. The Republicans who will emerge as their opponents are seen as little more than sacrificial lambs in November.

A more competitive race features Democrat Andrew Cuomo, son of former New York Gov. Mario M. Cuomo and Housing and Urban Development secretary under President Clinton. He is attempting to resuscitate his political career by claiming his party's nod for attorney general. Cuomo's chief primary rival is Mark Green, a longtime public figure in New York.

Elsewhere, Maryland Democrats would set up a Senate race between two black candidates if they chose Kweisi Mfume as their nominee against Michael S. Steele, the presumptive GOP nominee, who is the state's lieutenant governor.

Mfume is well-known — after five terms in the House, he headed the NAACP for several years. His liberal views are in sync with the state's Democrats, and he could benefit from a crowded field. But the primary's favorite remains Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who is white. He is spotlighting his vote against the congressional resolution that authorized the Iraq war.

3rd District Voters Face A Dizzying Field (WP)

By Miranda S. Spivack, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

16 Candidates Are Jostling for Attention in Packed Contest for Cardin's Seat

Bob and Betty Jackson patiently listened for more than two hours as the questions bounced down the banquet table from candidate to candidate at a forum for Howard County residents trying to figure out who should succeed Benjamin L. Cardin in the House of Representatives.

After absorbing answers about the war in Iraq, health care, voting machines and education from the 11 hopefuls who had attended the evening forum in Columbia, Bob Jackson pronounced himself satisfied.

DOJ_NMG_0060854

"I think I've narrowed it down to four," said the 62-year-old National Security Agency retiree and longtime Columbia resident, who plans to vote in Tuesday's Democratic primary.

He reeled off his list. Barth, Beilenson, Hollinger and Sarbanes.

Betty Jackson, 62, a part-time technical writer, said she was impressed by all seven Democrats and four Republicans who spoke. "They were very dignified," she said. "Much better than the race for governor."

In the days before the primary, voters such as the Jacksons in Maryland's 3rd Congressional District, a zigzagging urban and suburban swath that cuts across three counties and Baltimore, are about to narrow the field. It's not a simple task.

With the retirement of U.S. Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D) and Cardin's decision to seek his seat, the 3rd District voters find themselves confronting a rare political dilemma: The primary ballot will have the names of eight Republicans and eight Democrats, including many experienced politicians with polished rÃ©sumÃ©s who figured it was now or never for a seat that had not come open for a generation.

"I wasn't looking forward to this evening," Bob Jackson said. "It could have gone on and on forever." But he was pleasantly surprised by the candidates' ability to separate themselves -- more or less -- from the pack. "I really got a good sense of who they are," he said.

That's what the candidates have to hope for as primary day looms: that they can break out and convince voters that they are the best for the job.

Cardin (D) won the district in 2004 with 63 percent of the vote, but Republican Gary Applebaum, one of two physicians running, said he thought a Republican stood a reasonable chance this November. "This is a district that [Gov. Robert L.] Ehrlich won four years ago," Applebaum said. "He is a very popular governor who has bridged the political divide." Applebaum said he hoped to do the same in the district, where Democrats are firmly in the majority.

The district, which Cardin represented for nearly 20 years, runs east from Baltimore to Baltimore County, west to Howard County and east again to parts of Anne Arundel and is among the country's most affluent, with the median household income topping $62,000. There are small pockets of poverty in the district, which is within commuting distance of Washington.

As the candidates head toward the finish line, several are leading in the money race, which will help them get their names and views out through direct mail, television and radio.

Having a well-known name can help -- at candidate forums such as the one Aug. 29 in Columbia, the Democrats often said they agreed with one another. Same with the Republicans.

Among the Democrats, John Sarbanes, who as the retiring senator's son enjoys high name recognition, said at the forum that he wasn't running on his family name and cited his community service and experience as a lawyer in the private and public sectors. He has raised nearly $1 million. Peter L. Beilenson, a former Baltimore health commissioner who stresses his experience managing a multimillion-dollar budget and whose father, Anthony, was a well-known congressman from California, has raised about $845,000.

Paula C. Hollinger -- a state senator from Baltimore County who chairs a key committee with jurisdiction over health, education and the environment -- has attracted support from such state politicians as state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert). She has collected about $775,000.

Andy Barth, the longtime Baltimore television reporter whose father, Alan, was a well-known Washington Post editorial page writer, has raised about $160,000. Oz Bengur, a political operative and businessman, has raised close to $500,000. Bengur, whose son in serving with the Marines in Iraq, is among the most vocal of the Democrats about Iraq, although all say they support some version of a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. Kevin O'Keeffe, a former lobbyist for the Anne Arundel County and Baltimore City governments, who points to his rise from a family of modest means, has raised about $215,000. Mishonda Baldwin, a Persian Gulf War veteran and a lawyer, has raised about $30,000.

Among Republicans, Applebaum is the leading fundraiser, according to recent campaign reports, gathering about $270,000. John White, a marketing executive, reported raising about $200,000, much of it a loan. The other Republicans reported little or no fundraising. "It speaks to support," Applebaum said.

A few days after the forum, the Jacksons were still mulling their options among the Democrats. They planned to do more research and will attend a neighbor's gathering for Barth to learn more about him. Betty said she liked the fact that Beilenson had substantial experience running a large agency. She and her husband also liked Sarbanes -- "he's very smooth" -- but worried, as Beilenson had at the candidates' forum earlier in the week, that perhaps there are too many lawyers in Congress.

"I think we feel like we don't have to vote for John Sarbanes because a lot of others will vote for him," Betty Jackson said. As for Hollinger, she thought Annapolis might need her spunk more than Washington.

"I think we'd be happy with any of the four of them," she said.

Four DFLers Dash For Every Last Vote (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 10, 2006

The contenders reach out before Tuesday's vote, knowing that whoever advances from the primary is the favorite to win it all.

Congressional hopeful Paul Ostrow extended a hand to a rumpled patron Saturday in a south Minneapolis coffee shop, asking for his vote in the Fifth District DFL primary.

"It's too early to think about voting," said the man, who declined to give his name. "I just want to have a cup of coffee right now."

But Ostrow and his main opponents -- former state Sen. Ember Reichgott Junge, former state DFL chair Mike Erlandson and state Rep. Keith Ellison -- scrambled hard Saturday to get voters to focus. They face off Tuesday in what has been the most competitive race that the district's voters have seen in decades. The frenzy will continue until the polls close at 8 p.m.

Primaries tend to have low turnout, but this one counts big. The DFLers want to replace 28-year Rep. Martin Sabo, who is retiring. The district, including Minneapolis and inner- ring suburbs, is deeply DFL, so the primary winner is a solid favorite in November.

Ostrow, a Minneapolis City Council member, says he's got broad support, but many observing the contest say it has narrowed to a three-way match.

"The race is a tossup between Ellison, Erlandson and Ember, and it would take a major event or electoral crisis for Paul Ostrow to have a chance of winning this race," said Blois Olson, copublisher of the newsletter Politics in Minnesota.

The candidates will continue to criss-cross the district's cities from coffeehouses to the Metrodome Plaza. Reichgott Junge was at the Richfield Farmers Market wearing a shiny red track suit. "You want to stand out in the crowd," she said. Early Saturday she was on handshake 2,672 of her goal of 7,000 for the last week of the campaign.

"A familiar face from the television," said Joyce Anderson of Minneapolis as she met the former state senator. "That's a good ad. It's a go."

Reichgott Junge handed her a sticker and said, "It will help you to remember to vote on Tuesday."

Erlandson knocked on doors in Uptown with Sabo, who is supporting his 13-year chief of staff. The day was a historic final door-knocking for Sabo.

Erlandson picked up Sabo's techniques -- keep moving and keep the message short. "I've never believed you should give them a civics test at the door," Sabo said. "Say 'Hello, and I'd like your vote.' "

A few miles north, Ellison wore a pinstripe suit as he delivered an indignant stump speech to Service Employees International Union members preparing to hand out his literature. Ellison had come from the funeral of 15-year-old Courtney Brown, killed a week earlier, apparently by teenagers trying to take his jersey.

"We cannot ignore the fact that when they squeeze us for $5.15 an hour or even $10 an hour, it has social implications." When parents work so much, "the little ones are out on the street trying to figure it out for themselves," Ellison said.

Squeezing all they can

Every minute counts now in a race too close to call. The prediction is somewhere between 65,000 and 80,000 voters will cast ballots.

The candidates long ago identified tactics and issues designed to carve out the biggest piece of the primary pie.

Ellison, the DFL endorsee, is targeting the "unlikely" primary voters who tend to vote only in November. He wants to pull U.S. troops out of Iraq and has made economic and social justice a centerpiece of his campaign. "We all count. We all matter," he said. But issues from his personal life have dogged him since he won the endorsement in May. He failed to pay parking tickets, federal income taxes and file campaign finance reports.

He's considered to be strong in north Minneapolis, an area he has represented for four years but where turnout tends to be low. He focused his efforts on a get-out-the-vote and direct-mail effort. Campaign manager Dave Colling said Ellison is working to get out voters who are black, Somali, gay and lesbian, peace activists and Latinos.

Of the four main candidates, Erlandson hit the air hardest with radio and television commercials. He is focusing on his ties to Sabo and experience and has made the environment a priority in campaigning. He is also targeting voters 58 and older who make up 70 percent of those who vote in the primary. Erlandson said he believes he got a boost from a Star Tribune editorial endorsement that hit on his experience, potential for accruing seniority and DFL credentials.

He expects to do well in his boyhood turf of Fridley and Columbia Heights.

Reichgott Junge has been running a television commercial about the recent deaths of four family members and her top priority -- universal health care coverage.

Reichgott Junge is considered strong in Robbinsdale, New Hope and Crystal, an area she represented in the state Senate for 18 years.

Her opponents have questioned her liberal credibility and tagged her a Sen. Joe Lieberman Democrat. Lieberman's support of the Iraq war cost him a primary in Connecticut.

Reichgott Junge responded with an automated phone call by former Secretary of State Joan Growe on Saturday to 46,000 primary voters.

Ostrow has an army of young volunteers that has knocked on as many as 1,200 doors a night.

Although Ostrow represents northeast Minneapolis, the campaign is targeting his literature to south and southwest Minneapolis, said Ostrow's wife and campaign manager, Julie Mattson Ostrow, because they are traditionally high voter turnout areas.

Ostrow said he would be a strong voice for cities in Congress and wants to serve on the Education Committee to focus on schools.

Perry Rivals Aren't Closing The Gap (HC)

By R.g. Ratcliffe

Houston Chronicle, September 10, 2006

Polls show he's vulnerable, but crowded field has divided vote

AUSTIN - The horse race polls have varied dramatically about who is running second in the Texas governor's race, but those surveys have made one thing perfectly clear: for most of the past year, Texans have been unhappy with the job Rick Perry has done as governor.

Perry's sagging job approval also is reflected in poll numbers showing support for his re-election has hovered between 35 percent and 41 percent since February.

However, that does not mean the Republican incumbent is in immediate danger of defeat. His four challengers are dividing the discontented voters, and none of them has gained traction so far.

"They're like dogs, running around chasing each other's tails, trying to eat the same piece of the pie," said Perry pollster Mike Baselice. "Perry, meanwhile, is sitting over there with a plurality, and he wins."

Perry's main challengers are after what they call the "anti-Perry vote." But the question remains whether Democrat Chris Bell or independents Kinky Friedman and Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn or Libertarian James Werner can consolidate this vote into a winning coalition.

"There is a bloc of voters out there right now waiting to see which one of the three is most likely to get Perry out," said Friedman campaign manager Dean Barkley. "That is the battle of September, to be the alternative to Perry."

Perry's job approval ratings have lagged behind his job disapproval rating among Texans for 10 of the past 16 months in SurveyUSA polling done by television stations WOAI in San Antonio and KEYE in Austin.

Root of the issuePerry's job rating was decidedly favorable only in the month after Texas accepted Hurricane Katrina evacuees; when Perry visited troops in Iraq in January; and immediately after the Legislature passed a bill to solve public school finance problems in June.

The polls raise questions about why Perry's job approval and re-elect numbers are so low after six years in office, and they pose the problem of how he would lead the state for another four years if 55 percent to 65 percent of voters turned against him.

Perry's support for re-election was 36 percent in a February Dallas Morning News Poll. Polls last month by Zogby Interactive for the Wall Street Journal and Rassmussen Reports each set Perry's re-election support at 35 percent.

A survey the Texas Trial Lawyers Association distributed to its members last week showed Perry's re-election support at 41 percent.

"I'm not sure why people don't like him (Perry), except he's been divisive to the extreme," said Democratic political consultant Dan McClung of Houston.

McClung said Perry tailored his political agenda to his own party without worrying about his general popularity. "He has run this state based on primary election polls."

Placing the blameTexas Eagle Forum President Cathie Adams said she thinks Perry's poll numbers are down because he is taking the blame from Republicans angry at the federal government for not doing more to stop illegal immigration.

"I don't think the word has gotten out about what he's done at the border," said Adams, head of the local conservative women's political organization.

Perry last week launched a television commercial promising if re-elected to ask the Legislature for $100 million to fight crime along the border with Mexico.

Former state GOP Chairman Tom Pauken, who is heading a property tax appraisal study for Perry, said he thinks the governor's numbers reflect voter disappointment in the Bush administration and with Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0060857

A CNN poll released last week found 55 percent of the likely voters surveyed nationally plan to vote against the incumbent of either party for federal, state and local offices this fall.

"This is a tough year for incumbents around the country, not just in Texas," Pauken said.

Pauken said he also thinks Perry has not gotten "the credit he deserves" for passage of a school finance plan and a new business tax that will cut property tax rates.

Connecting with votersIn the poll distributed by the trial lawyers, all the candidates, including Perry, were viewed as likable by voters — except for Friedman. Friedman was viewed negatively by 32 percent of those surveyed and positively by 22 percent. Bell was the least-known candidate among the top four. However, at the moment, none of Perry's opponents has surpassed 25 percent support in any of the polls. So how do they make the campaign jell for them?

Barkley said Friedman is trying to expand his base of voters. Friedman also last week tried to appeal to conservatives by undercutting Perry's border security television commercial by proposing to put 10,000 state National Guard troops on the border with Mexico.

"We hit a home run all week with the free media," Barkley said. "Perry's ad on the border, we trumped him."

Bell strategist, Jason Stanford, said Bell's message is simple: Perry is beatable and only a Democrat can do it. Stanford said the built-in Democratic vote and straight ticket voting for Bell means it will be impossible for any other candidate to get enough votes to win.

Two-horse race?Stanford noted that the lowest Democratic vote-getter in 2002 — Marty Akins for comptroller — received 1.4 million votes, 33 percent of the turnout. Democrat Garry Mauro got wiped out in his 1998 challenge of Gov. George W. Bush and still received 1.1 million votes.

"If Chris Bell wakes up on Election Day and he has done nothing, he's going to get in the low 30s percent of the vote," Stanford said.

Strayhorn spokesman Mark Sanders said Bell's strategy will not work because he has no money to advertise his campaign. Sanders said it will quickly become evident to the anti-Perry voters that the two-person race is between Perry and Strayhorn.

Sanders said Perry's problems are multi-fold.

"Democrats absolutely hate him. The far right hates him because of his (business) tax bill, and you've got a group in the middle that has just got Perry fatigue," Sanders said.

He noted Govs. Mark White and Ann Richards were voted out of office after one term. Gov. Bill Clements lost his re-election and then won again four years later.

The race at the moment appears to favor a victory by Perry, said Southern Methodist University political scientist Cal Jillson. Jillson said if Perry wins with a 40 percent plurality, it should not affect his ability to govern.

"Texans don't expect much from state government, and Rick Perry delivers what they expect," Jillson said.

Primary Contest For Governor Overshadowed (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

After 21 months as a candidate for governor, Eliot Spitzer entered this final weekend of campaigning for the Democratic nomination without the battle scars or empty coffers that can often hobble front-runners, and appears poised to defeat Thomas R. Suozzi in Tuesday's primary.

Mr. Spitzer, holding a 50-point lead in the latest polls, and Mr. Suozzi campaigned aggressively in and around New York City in recent days, with Mr. Spitzer seeking to energize his base of liberals and union members and acting like a confident incumbent with a ready-to-roll agenda: job creation, more money for public schools, and an overhaul of the health care system.

If the governor's race is the most consequential one of the ballot, given that Gov. George E. Pataki is stepping down after 12 years, the most compelling contests on Tuesday are further down the ballot — especially a fight between two New York political titans, Andrew M. Cuomo and Mark Green, for the Democratic nomination for attorney general. Tuesday's outcome might well end the political career of whichever man loses.

That hard-fought contest has proved fascinating to Democratic loyalists, bloggers, and political analysts: Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Green each started the race in 2005 as damaged figures seeking redemption from voters.

In conversations with consultants, reporters, and donors, each man sought to explain his past mistakes and say he had learned his lessons. Mr. Green had a grating image for some after several past bids for office, most recently as the Democratic nominee for mayor of New York in 2001. Mr. Cuomo had struck some voters as arrogant as a candidate for governor in 2002.

As newspaper endorsements and analysts have noted, the Cuomo-Green battle will partly hinge on which man is less unlikable in the eyes of voters.

DOJ_NMG_0060858

"It's incredibly telling that Mark and Andrew don't speak or appear prominently in their TV commercials, because likable candidates usually do," said Ruth Sherman, a communications consultant who works with politicians and has examined their behavior. "Mark is perhaps better known, since Andrew worked in Washington, so Mark may have more to overcome there."

Polls show Mr. Cuomo with a 20-point lead. One pollster, Lee M. Miringoff, director of the Marist College Institute for Public Opinion, said that Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Green might cancel out each other when it comes to likability, yet said it was still a factor because there were few substantive issues driving the race.

"It has basically come down to these two well-known personalities slugging it out negatively, and people's feelings about each guy," Mr. Miringoff said.

A third Democratic candidate, Sean Patrick Maloney, is running far behind in the polls, but has made his mark in this campaign for his nimble performance in debates.

Both Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Green deny the charge of unlikability. Mr. Cuomo said no voters had brought up his own likability to him. Mr. Green quipped, "My wife and daughter think I'm lovable."

Mr. Green added that he felt he was enjoying a surge thanks to recent endorsements by editorials in The Daily News and The New York Times.

Mr. Cuomo had moved earlier and more quickly to lock up support from labor unions and political leaders. He counted, in particular, on two king-makers in Democratic politics: His father, former Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, and his political counselor, Jennifer Cunningham, executive vice president of S.E.I.U./1199, the health care workers' union.

Yet Mr. Green's tireless campaigning is legendary, and he released a new commercial on Friday that touted his newspaper endorsements and attacked Mr. Cuomo. Mr. Cuomo unveiled his own ad featuring praise from prominent supporters such as Ed Koch.

Probably the other most competitive Democratic race, in the 11th Congressional District in Brooklyn, has draw attention for its racial dynamic: A respected white city councilman, David Yassky, moved into the district to run for the seat, which has been a preserve of black politicians.

He is running against three black candidates, each of whom has passionate bases of support: Councilwoman Yvette D. Clarke, State Senator Carl Andrews, and Chris Owens, the son of the sitting congressman, Major R. Owens.

Those three candidates risk undercutting each other by splitting the black vote, and Mr. Yassky has won praise from some black voters.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has a primary challenger on Tuesday, Jonathan Tasini, a liberal and former union leader who has based his candidacy on opposition to the war in Iraq.

Mrs. Clinton has a huge lead, but she has still spent money on a glossy mailing pleading for a huge primary vote.

A low turnout might skew the result a bit if liberals embrace Mr. Tasini; for image, the Clinton camp wants to limit the protest vote against her to the single digits.

Turnout is a concern for all of the candidates, particularly on the Republican side, where a former Yonkers mayor, John Spencer, and a former Reagan administration aide, Kathleen Troia McFarland, are vying for the nomination to face Mrs. Clinton. Because both candidates have lacked money to get out their message, they have dwelled on personal attacks instead, especially Mrs. McFarland, resulting in a negative political atmosphere that traditionally depresses turnout.

"McFarland has had a lot of problems as a candidate, and Spencer has not overwhelmed here, so you may end up seeing a historically low turnout," said Jerry Skurnik, a political consultant who analyzes voter trends. "It could even be 10 or 15 percent."

The Republican candidates for governor, John Faso, and for attorney general, Jeanine F. Pirro, do not face primary contests on Tuesday.

For a politically voracious state like New York, it is somewhat unusual that the primary races never became especially creative or close: Mr. Spitzer, Mrs. Clinton, and Mr. Cuomo have all held double-digit leads for months, and only Mr. Green has shown ability to narrow his gap.

"This looks an awful lot like it looked like seven months ago," said Kieran Mahoney, a Republican political consultant in New York, referring to the primary political landscape.

Mr. Suozzi argued that his problem was money: He could not compete with Mr. Spitzer's television commercials — making only one large-scale advertising purchase last spring — or with the Spitzer political apparatus, which included most unions and elected Democrats.

"I would rather I was winning, but I simply haven't had enough money," Mr. Suozzi said. "Eliot's obviously very smart, but I never had enough the resources to put enough pressure to force him to tell us what he's going to do as governor."

Mr. Spitzer wrapped up a bus tour of the state late last week, and said he would campaign flat out through Tuesday night. He said he felt enthusiastic but also a little bit tired — not just from the bus tour, but the primary race that essentially began when he tried to clear the Democratic field by announcing for governor in December 2004.

He said that a great deal of hard work had made him a battle-tested candidate rather than a battle-scarred one.

"The hard work has not just been the campaign, but in the attorney general's office, where the work has reflected the values and dedication to public service that has been part of our message," he said.

Firm Tied To O'Malley Given City Contracts (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

BALTIMORE (AP) -- A law firm that has employed Mayor Martin O'Malley's campaign treasurer for the past six years has been awarded more than $1.2 million in city legal contracts since 2000, city records show.

Brown & Sheehan and its predecessor firm have won city contracts mostly for defending police officers and commanders, according to records obtained by the Baltimore Sun.

During the same time that the city's Board of Estimates voted to award many of the contracts, the firm employed the mayor's campaign treasurer, Martin Cadogan, as an attorney and later as a partner.

David Sheehan, a founding partner, defended the firm's record for obtaining city work, saying that Mr. Cadogan was not involved in the contracts.

He told the newspaper that Mr. Cadogan did not do legal work connected to them and did not benefit financially.

City officials and an attorney with the firm also said Brown & Sheehan's predecessor received its first contract with the city before Mr. Cadogan was hired.

"We're comfortable with it because we're comfortable that [Mr. Cadogan] separates out his political role from his legal role in the firm," Mr. Sheehan told the newspaper. "We're comfortable with it because it reflects such a tiny fraction of our overall business. We think the city really values our work."

Typically, professional-services contracts that are awarded to outside law firms are approved by the Board of Estimates but are not competitively bid.

Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat running for governor, sits on the five-member Board of Estimates and appoints two other voting members, the city solicitor and the head of the department of public works.

An O'Malley spokeswoman referred questions to the solicitor.

Solicitor Ralph Tyler said he did not know why Brown & Sheehan was selected, though he said that there are a limited number of firms -- particularly ones certified as a minority business such as Brown & Sheehan -- able to perform the work.

Mr. Tyler said the city's use of the firm does not represent a conflict for Mr. O'Malley.

"It's my understanding that Mr. Cadogan does not participate in the profits of the firm and therefore would derive no benefits from the firm's representation of the city or its agencies," Mr. Tyler said.

Brown & Sheehan, which has five partners and nine associates, does a wide range of legal work, including commercial litigation, corporate and employment law and government representation.

Before 2004, the firm was known as Brown, Diffenderffer & Kearney.

The firm's Web site (www.brownsheehan.com) indicates that Mr. Cadogan practices "business and corporate law, real estate development and general civil litigation with an emphasis on insurance defense."

Governor's Race Gets Down To Tactics (MINNST)

Minnesota Public Radio had to cancel its customary gubernatorial debate at the recent State Fair because first Gov. Tim Pawlenty and then DFL adversary Attorney General Mike Hatch said they wouldn't attend. The no-shows by the big names have become a pattern this year, and they reflect the front-runners' approach to Tuesday's primary election. The Sept. 12 ballot will present contests for each of the major parties' gubernatorial nominations, but the heavily favored party-endorsed candidates are ignoring their challengers. Overmatched on nearly every conventional measure of political strength, the underdogs remain unbowed and are frantically campaigning to the end.

Here are looks at the candidates' central themes and tactics:

DFL

Attorney General Mike Hatch: Hatch has said almost nothing about Lourey and has been pummeling Pawlenty on the campaign circuit, accusing him of abandoning progressive Minnesota values that were shared by Republican and DFL governors. He is emphasizing an economic revitalization plan, more funding for schools and cutting health-care costs.

On the trail most of last week in outstate Minnesota, Hatch has been hitting state college campuses, focusing on his plan to reduce tuition at state higher education campuses. Earlier he unleashed a $300,000 TV ad campaign, with the punch line, "Minnesota Tough, Making Minnesota Nice."

Sen. Becky Lourey: As one of the Legislature's more ardent liberals, Lourey has made universal health-care coverage and pulling out of the war in Iraq her campaign pillars. Last year she lost a son in combat, and she insists that there are things governors can do unilaterally and cooperatively to push for withdrawal.

Lourey has called for specific tax increases, including restoration of higher rates on the wealthy, to finance her agenda. She describes Hatch's plan on health care and revenue-raising as timid and inadequate, and she says both Pawlenty and Hatch have laid out a lot of costly policy proposals without credible plans to pay for them.

Working her home territory in northeastern Minnesota in the final week, Lourey picked up a half-dozen endorsements from labor union and party activists in and around Duluth. A big showing by anti-war liberals in the Fifth Congressional District, where turnout in a multi-candidate primary is expected to be high, and a strong showing in the northeast, will help produce an upset, her supporters say.

She's campaigning frenetically and attended another Hatch-less debate in Duluth on Friday evening.

Ole Savior, self-described poet, artist and writer: After no fewer than eight landslide losses in candidacies for top office since 1984, Savior is trying again. He's calling for a nuclear-free world and a gasoline price limit of $1.50 a gallon, and he lists as a credential the fact that he is a "certified blood donor of six gallons."

INDEPENDENCE

Peter Hutchinson, consultant to state and local governments, former state Finance Department commissioner, former superintendent of Minneapolis schools: Hutchinson's message is that both of the big parties are dysfunctional and doing a poor job of addressing the "main things," which he lists as soaring health-care and tuition costs, a decaying transportation system and declining water quality.

He has a plan to save the state more than a billion dollars in health-care spending through cutting administrative costs. The savings would be invested in early childhood education and tuition aid, and a 10-cent increase in the gas tax would help bankroll an ambitious restoration of highway and transit programs.

The candidate and his hand-picked team of IP constitutional office hopefuls are blitzing the state on a "Drive to Independence," a ground-level barnstorm through 210 cities covering 5,500 miles.

Pam Ellison, library assistant and St. Paul community activist: Her dominant theme is a call for a universal, single-payer health-care system in Minnesota. She's also calling for total funding of public schools by the state government and ending the reliance on property taxes. And she's encouraging organic agriculture and development of farmers' markets.

She's got media interviews lined up on a swing through central Minnesota and Duluth this weekend. Total funds on hand as of Aug. 21: $616.33.

REPUBLICAN

Gov. Tim Pawlenty: The early message is a classic incumbent story line, that the ship of state is shipshape, that he has balanced a huge deficit, cracked down on crime, and produced strong job growth. His primary focus, the subject of his latest ad, is a batch of public school reform proposals, including a requirement that 70 percent of funds be spent on classroom instruction.

An e-mail "blast" from his campaign office will remind tens of thousands of Republicans to turn out for the incumbent governor, but Pawlenty is not personally campaigning very hard. He's doing gubernatorial stuff instead this weekend, attending funeral services for soldiers and a National Guard send-off. But he has put $300,000 worth of TV ads on the air in the past two weeks.

Sue Jeffers, owner of Stub & Herb's Bar near the University of Minnesota, conservative activist. Jeffers' main thrust is that she's the only real conservative Republican on the ballot and that Pawlenty has violated conservative principles too many times, topped by his tobacco fee and his supporting taxpayer financing for sports stadiums and light-rail systems.

She's raised $24,000 to Pawlenty's $2 million, but the feisty Jeffers insists that her campaign is catching fire.

Democrats Working To Attract Hispanics Throughout South Florida (FLSUNSEN)

By Tal Abbady, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 10, 2006

Democrats are forming Hispanic caucuses in South Florida to bridge the quiet, clannish divisions among immigrant groups and coax more Latinos to the polls in November.

DOJ_NMG_0060861

The last decade's surge in eligible voters with ties to countries as disparate as Venezuela and Peru has challenged the Cuban Republican vote, experts say. But Democrats trying to seize on the numbers and find a common Latino voice are often stumped.

Language barriers, cultural rifts, a lack of trust in the political system and an unwillingness to unite under a single label keep many immigrants eligible to vote away from the polls, activists say.

"We'll meet up to watch fútbol or have a drink. But when it comes to bringing people together for a political vision or to exercise our vote, we don't do that. We don't unify ourselves like the Haitians do," said Peter Camacho.

The Colombian-American is president of the Palm Beach Hispanic Democratic Caucus, which had its first meeting in June. In the past two months, it has held fundraisers and sent bilingual volunteers to canvass neighborhoods in West Palm Beach, Lake Worth and other cities.

There are roughly 321,000 eligible Hispanic voters in South Florida, according to the civic education and voter registration group Democracia U.S.A. in Miami. In 2004, about 40 percent of Hispanic voters were registered Republicans, 40 percent Democrats and 20 percent independents, the group said. Hispanic Republicans are predominantly Cuban-Americans.

Republican gubernatorial nominee Charlie Crist and Democratic nominee Jim Davis have both hired Hispanic outreach directors to court voters.

"There's such an influx of nationalities now. It's a good time for groups to come out from under the perception that all Florida Hispanics are going to vote lock, stock and barrel like Cuban Republicans," said Michael Rodriguez, a Cuban-American who is secretary of the Palm Beach Hispanic Democratic Caucus.

Carlos Mario Ortiz, owner of El Bodegon supermarket in West Palm Beach, has pledged his support to the caucus.

As he walked through his store on a recent morning, shoppers milled around a pyramid of gnarled, pungent chiles and ordered cuts from a barrel-sized round of palomilla steak.

Among Ortiz' customers are Colombians, Peruvians, Mexicans, Guatemalans, Venezuelans and others. He said there's a long road ahead for Democrats trying to unite Latinos.

"We're regionalists," said Ortiz, who is Colombian. "We come here and look out for our own. Colombians help other Colombians. If some Peruvian had come to my door talking about uniting, I might not have paid attention. But when Peter came as a fellow Colombian, I listened."

In Broward County, cultural niches have also stymied efforts to organize, according to Linda Alber, a Colombian who heads the 210-member Latin Democratic Club of Broward County. The group meets twice a month in Cooper City.

"When we do elect Hispanics to local offices, they do little to bring us together," Alber said.

But Mark Romero, 19, a Florida International University student with a major in political science, says the biggest problem is not group divisions, but a lack of organized, political outreach targeted to Hispanics, especially those who are eligible voters but speak little English and have not registered.

Romero, a New Yorker of Puerto Rican heritage, has teamed up with other Hispanics to form a Broward Hispanic Democratic caucus, though it is in the early stages. The effort began when Romero worked for gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis' primary campaign.

"Hispanics in Broward are simply not being reached. If you don't have outreach, you don't have issues," Romero said. "There are a lot of stereotypes out there. Not all people are going to come under one giant blanket issue like immigration."

Michelle Acuña, a Colombian-American Hollywood resident, is helping Romero start the caucus, which she said will focus on Spanish-language outreach to voters with poor English skills. That includes her mother, a citizen and voter.

"On Tuesday my mom asked me, `OK, which Democrat should I vote for?' She speaks little English and depends on me to give her the information," she said.

When language and cultural cliques are not an obstacle, Democrats must still reach voters who lived under broken political systems in their homelands and brought their disaffection to the United States.

Among them is Alcides Gil, 58, a Colombian who lives in West Palm Beach and is a regular at El Bodegon. Gil, a U.S. citizen, has not voted in any election.

"My vote would only serve to keep the privileged in power," he said. "I've seen it in Colombia, and I see it here."

Three Days Before Vote, Democrats Avidly Stump (NYT)

By Jonathan P. Hicks

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

With just three days before voters go to the polls for party primaries, candidates for a number of offices trekked to neighborhoods throughout the New York City area yesterday, to street fairs, housing complexes, outdoor markets and parades.

DOJ_NMG_0060862

Many of the statewide races in Tuesday's primary are seen as being less than competitive, but in the Democratic race for attorney general, Andrew M. Cuomo and his major rival, Mark Green, began broadcasting new campaign commercials this weekend. And they continued to exchange fire yesterday.

A day after Mr. Cuomo criticized contributions to Mark Green's campaign by his brother, the Green campaign shot back with an angry demand for an apology.

"I'm awaiting Andrew's apology for attacking my family member since I wouldn't and haven't criticized his father and brother-in-law for also making perfectly lawful, generous contributions," Mr. Green said in a written statement.

The current attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, is likely to prevail easily over Thomas R. Suozzi, the Nassau County executive, in the Democratic primary for governor, polls have indicated, and United States Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is expected to have little trouble with Jonathan Tasini, a former union leader.

Nonetheless, the candidates were out in full force yesterday, particularly at the Labor Day Parade up Fifth Avenue in Manhattan.

The event began with an old-style political rally organized by the New York City Central Labor Council and the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union.

The speakers included Mrs. Clinton, State Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi and Mr. Spitzer, as well as his running mate for lieutenant governor, State Senator David A. Paterson.

"I never feel confident about victory," Mrs. Clinton said in an interview before marching in the parade. "I'm always running scared. I feel I have to reach every voter that I haven't reached."

In the attorney general's race, recent campaign finance disclosures showed that Mr. Green's campaign received another $102,000 from his brother, Stephen L. Green, a real estate executive. Mr. Cuomo, saying the situation had the makings of a conflict of interest, called on the Green campaign to return that money.

The candidate's brother is part of a group bidding on a 20-year franchise to operate three New York racetracks. The franchise is being monitored by the attorney general's office.

"What's wrong with brotherly or fatherly love?" Mark Green said. "Conflicts? Of course if a matter involving my brother or his brother-in-law hypothetically came before us as attorney general, we would each recuse ourselves. Where's the problem?"

Mr. Green's newest commercial highlighted questions that he has raised about Mr. Cuomo's ethics. The criticism followed an article in The Village Voice that reported that Mr. Cuomo, while federal housing secretary, pursued legal action against a businessman, Andrew L. Farkas, who later settled the case with federal officials, and that years later, Mr. Cuomo went to work for Mr. Farkas's new company, earning $1.2 million over two years. Mr. Farkas and his associates have also contributed $800,000 to Mr. Cuomo's campaign.

The Cuomo campaign made public a letter jointly sent by three public officials asking Mr. Green to stop broadcasting the commercial.

They contended that it had misrepresented Mr. Cuomo's role in a suit by Mr. Spitzer's office against the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Their letter noted that Mr. Cuomo had already left the department by then.

"How could you run to be the state's top law enforcement official while making such a wildly false allegation," stated the letter, sent by Christine C. Quinn, the speaker of the City Council; Scott Stringer, the Manhattan borough president; and William C. Thompson Jr., the city comptroller.

Both candidates marched in the labor parade, but while Mr. Cuomo attended the rally, Mr. Green did not. He marched with members of the Public Employees Federation, which endorsed him. The third candidate in the primary is Sean Patrick Maloney.

The statewide candidates were not the only ones crisscrossing the city yesterday. In Brooklyn, the four Democratic candidates in a hotly contested race for the House of Representatives were scurrying through the 11th Congressional District.

That race in central Brooklyn has attracted much attention because three candidates are black and one is white. The district's population is about 60 percent black, and many black officials in Brooklyn have worried that a crowded Democratic field of candidates would pave the way for the white candidate, City Councilman David Yassky, to win the seat, which has been held by black politicians for years.

The four are running to succeed United States Representative Major R. Owens, who is not running for re-election.

Yesterday, one of the candidates for the Congressional seat, State Senator Carl Andrews, was campaigning at a farmers' market in Park Slope with Mr. Spitzer, who is Mr. Andrews's most prominent political supporter.

Mr. Andrews campaigned at the market just hours after Mr. Yassky greeted voters there and before the arrival of Chris Owens, another candidate, who is the incumbent's son. The fourth candidate, City Councilwoman Yvette D. Clarke, was greeting voters at housing complexes in the district.

The Slenderized Governor, With Advice To Share (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Sept. 8 — Mike Huckabee has been the governor of Arkansas for a decade, but he is most famous for what he has done in the last three years: lose more than 100 pounds and encourage other Arkansans to follow his example.

As he contemplates a bid for the Republican nomination for president in 2008, the slenderized governor has inspired a host of imitators, including Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, who shed 33 pounds, and Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, who promised in June to go on a diet. These and other Southern politicians say they are trying to set an example for their constituents, who exhibit the highest rates of obesity in the country.

But for those who would join the health crusade, Mr. Huckabee's tale includes a cautionary thread. In the South, the fight against obesity is essentially a culture war. And while the campaign may have raised Mr. Huckabee's national profile, not everyone here appreciates a governor whose policies include weighing schoolchildren and sending home report cards on their body mass index.

Mr. Huckabee, a teetotaler who now rises before dawn to jog five miles, has been accused of nagging the populace, banning birthday cakes in schools (not true, he says) and trampling the personal freedoms of smokers with an indoor smoking ban. While he says he uses the carrot, not the stick, to encourage better health, his virtue alone has a way of making people like Pearletha David, the owner of David Family Kitchen, a soul food restaurant here, feel henpecked.

"I think it's fine for him," Ms. David said, putting her hands on her hips. "But he ain't got to make the whole state lose weight."

After the governor's nutritional guidelines for school lunches took effect, one girl wrote a letter to him demanding "real food" like nachos and pizza. A columnist for The Baxter Bulletin imagined a future of diners picking at their "sautéed soybeans with flavor-free dressing" and discussing the criminalization of cheese curls.

Despite the efforts, the state's obesity rate among adults has actually increased since last year, according to the Trust for America's Health.

Mr. Huckabee counters that changing dietary habits is a long-term, generational project, and says that in three years of recording children's body mass index and reporting it to parents, the number of children at risk of obesity has decreased — by half of 1 percent.

Mr. Huckabee knows what he is up against, namely all-you-can-eat buffets, cheese grits and a local ice cream flavor called Woo Pig Chewy. One of his own family dogs is named Sonic, after the fast-food chain whose cherry limeades are favored by his wife, Janet.

"It's not just your culture," he said, speaking in his office in the Capitol building. "It's your comfort."

But Mr. Huckabee insists that a lifestyle revolution can happen, citing four behaviors that have been reshaped over the years by concerted government effort: littering, seatbelt use, smoking and drunken driving.

"In each of those cases, in my lifetime, I have seen the needle move from one side to the other," he said. "People used to throw entire sacks of trash out of their cars without thinking it was inappropriate."

Mr. Huckabee's health obsession began in 2003, when he received a diagnosis of Type 2 diabetes, which can sometimes be controlled by diet and exercise. At the time, he weighed close to 300 pounds.

With the help of doctors at the University of Arkansas for Medical Sciences, the governor went on a strict diet and began to exercise, shedding weight so rapidly that it was as if he simply unzipped a fat suit and stepped out. He wrote a book called "Quit Digging Your Grave With a Knife and Fork." In March 2005, he ran the Little Rock marathon in 3 hours 38 minutes.

But Mr. Huckabee's change of eating habits has put him in another sort of bubble. He no longer eats at banquets and receptions. He keeps a cooler of food in his car. On a recent day, an acquaintance started to offer him a slice of homemade cheesecake, then stopped herself. "I'd give it to you, but then I'd be digging your grave with a fork and a plastic knife," she said.

The governor insists he does not want to create a "nanny state" or a "grease police." Many of his policies include incentives like exercise breaks for state employees. He has expanded state insurance coverage to cover obesity treatment. He advocated restricting access to vending machines for high school students and replacing the sugary sodas in them with juice and water. Arkansas is one of a handful of states where the nutritional guidelines for school lunches are stricter than the federal requirements.

But some critics say Mr. Huckabee's crusade has more rhetoric than substance. Part of his Healthy Arkansas initiative is to give a seal of approval to restaurants that offer healthful alternatives and nutritional information, but critics point out that the list of 106 restaurants includes a Burger King, a Pizza Hut and 52 McDonald's.

The policy that has brought the most attention to the governor, however, was not his initiative. In the spring of 2003, Herschel W. Cleveland, then the Arkansas House speaker, introduced a bill to remove vending machines from elementary schools and send home the body mass index report cards.

The bill passed easily, but the public generally did not notice until Mr. Huckabee had become the health governor. The news made national headlines and brought vehement objections from parents concerned about government intrusion and fragile young egos, recalled the sponsor, State Representative Jay Bradford, a Democrat, who spoke by telephone from his office in Pine Bluff. “I’m also thin, by the way,” Mr. Bradford added.

For those who would change Southern eating habits, though, there is always the problem of tradition and identity. And though Mr. Huckabee is not naïve, his strategy for tackling the issue is optimistic. “There’s much more to celebrate in a person’s health than there is about just what they eat,” he said.

Evangelical Author Puts Progressive Spin On Traditional Faith (WP)

By Caryle Murphy, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Lyndsay Moseley was no longer inspired by the evangelical Christian faith of her youth. As an environmental activist, she believed that it offered little spiritual support for her work and was overly focused on opposing abortion and gay marriage.

Then the 27-year-old District resident discovered Brian D. McLaren of Laurel, one of contemporary Christianity's hottest authors and founding pastor of Cedar Ridge Community Church in upper Montgomery County.

"He always talks about the environment as a priority when he talks about the church being relevant to the world," Moseley said. "He's leading a [spiritual] conversation that needs to happen," one that "I've been hungry for."

McLaren has emerged as one of the most prominent voices in an increasingly active group of progressive evangelicals who are challenging the theological orthodoxy and political dominance of the religious right. He also is an intellectual guru of "emerging church," a grass-roots movement among young evangelicals exploring new models of living out their Christian faith.

Progressives, who range from 11 to 36 percent of all evangelicals, according to various polls, are still overshadowed by the Christian right among evangelicals. But the steady popularity of McLaren's books over the past eight years signals an expanding diversity of thought in this important political constituency.

McLaren, 50, offers an evangelical vision that emphasizes tolerance and social justice. He contends that people can follow Jesus's way without becoming Christian. In the latest of his eight books, "The Secret Message of Jesus," which has sold 55,000 copies since its April release, he argues that Christians should be more concerned about creating a just "Kingdom of God" on earth than about getting into heaven.

Along with such other progressive evangelicals as Washington-based anti-poverty activist Jim Wallis and educator Tony Campolo, McLaren is openly critical of the conservative political agenda favored by many evangelicals.

"When we present Jesus as a pro-war, anti-poor, anti-homosexual, anti-environment, pro-nuclear weapons authority figure draped in an American flag, I think we are making a travesty of the portrait of Jesus we find in the gospels," McLaren said in a recent interview.

Scot McKnight, a professor of religious studies at Chicago's North Park University who has studied McLaren's career, said that "he wants there to be greater cooperation among Christians, and he thinks evangelical Christians have aligned themselves too closely with the Republican Party. He wants to see Christians . . . pursue what is right, regardless of the political party's platform."

What makes McLaren's ideas attractive to progressive evangelicals appalls the more numerous conservatives. Noting that he fails to condemn homosexuality, one conservative Web site called him "A True Son of Lucifer" for ignoring "absolute biblical truth." And last year, Baptists in Kentucky revoked a speaking invitation after McLaren said that followers of Jesus might not be the only ones to gain salvation.

"If you have some person or movement coming along calling into question the non-negotiables of Christianity, then those who espouse Christianity find such a challenge dangerous," said Donald A. Carson, professor of New Testament at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School in Illinois, who has criticized McLaren's theology.

Though a "creative, sparkly writer," added Carson, McLaren has "got so many things wrong in his analysis that his work is not going to last that long."Modernizing the Message

"Emerging church" is a loose network of mostly young evangelicals who believe the Christian message needs to be made more relevant in a time of rapid technological and societal change, particularly to those who've never been part of any church. Participants refer to their interaction as a "conversation," much of which takes place on the Internet at sites such as http://www.emergentvillage.com and blogs such as pomomusings.com.

"We are questioning a lot of presuppositions of conventional Christians: What should a church look like? How do we really understand Scripture in a modern context?" said Tony Jones, the conversation's national coordinator. "To conservatives, we seem like relativists, and to liberals, we seem like Jesus freaks."

The movement has no membership rolls, set beliefs or creed; liturgical diversity is encouraged. There is no way to know how many congregations are putting "emerging church" ideas into practice, Jones said. But "thousands of churches and pastors are . . . listening in, coming to hear Brian and reading my weekly e-mails."

McLaren said the name "emerging church" came out of a 2001 discussion he had with Doug Pagitt, pastor of Solomon's Porch in Minneapolis, about "why the megachurches were not attracting young people." The reasons, experts said, were becoming evident in the 1990s: dissatisfaction with the rightward drift in evangelical politics; worship styles so contemporary and casual they had no spiritual uplift; a lack of emphasis on social justice; and a theology that some say reduced Christianity to a recipe.

"The modern Christian formula of 'I mentally assent to the fact that Jesus died for my sins and therefore I get to live forever in heaven' . . . is entirely cognitive," said Ken Archer, 33, a D.C. software entrepreneur who is studying philosophy at Catholic University. "It's a mathematical formula [that] leaves the rest of our being unfulfilled."

McLaren's 2001 book, "A New Kind of Christian," captured the dissatisfaction. "I felt like someone had read my mind," said Michael Lamson, 31, an evangelical youth pastor in Mercersburg, Pa. Three years later, in "A Generous Orthodoxy," McLaren elaborated his theological outlook, which became a major influence on the "emerging conversation."

"What Brian is contributing is excellent questions that expose the modern roots of our spiritual angst," said Archer, who has had long conversations with McLaren. "He sees the answers coming from others, and he has encouraged thousands of people, including myself, to find the answers."A Fellowship Expands

Cedar Ridge, the congregation McLaren founded, is a far cry from the religious environment in which he was raised in Rockville. His family belonged to the ultraconservative Plymouth Brethren, which also is the childhood church of activist Wallis and radio celebrity Garrison Keillor.

As someone who loved books, music and science, "I was on the way out from the Christian faith" in his mid-teens, said the balding McLaren, who wears glasses and a closely cropped grey beard.

But that changed with the Jesus Movement of the 1970s, whose anti-establishment spirit attracted him. "I've always had the sense that Jesus's message is not a chaplaincy to the establishment," he said, "but that it is countercultural."

In 1982, while he was teaching English at the University of Maryland, McLaren and his wife, Grace, started a small "fellowship group" in their College Park apartment. "We'd have prayer, I'd do a little Bible study, then we'd have dinner. It was mostly grad students," he recalled.

The group met for several years in homes and school buildings until it ended up at Eleanor Roosevelt High School in Beltsville and took the name Cedar Ridge. McLaren left teaching -- and his unfinished doctorate studies -- to be pastor. In the late 1990s, the congregation of about 250 bought a 63-acre farm in Spencerville and moved there in January 1999.

The church now has an average attendance of 600 at Sunday services, and members say a big reason for the growth was McLaren's openness to ideas that are unconventional in evangelical circles.

"I don't see the issue of homosexuality as the simple black-and-white issue that some of my fellow evangelicals make it out to be," said McLaren, who last year was named by Time magazine among the "25 most influential evangelicals in America."

And while not happy about widespread abortions, he added, "to just say 'Okay, let's pass laws about it' seems to me to skip a number of important steps, like honest and open dialogue, persuasion and seeking to remove the conditions that make abortion so prevalent."

McLaren, who never attended seminary or divinity school, said his congregants' questions made him realize that the old answers no longer worked. "I remember thinking these are a different kind of question, and I didn't have good answers," he said. "I went through a real period of doubt . . . about the form of Christianity that I'd inherited. . . . In many ways, that struggle is what gave birth to my first book."A Bigger Mission

The scent of summer grass hung in the steamy air on a recent Sunday morning as a parade of Toyota and Honda SUVs turned off Route 198 into the bucolic compound of Cedar Ridge. The onetime farm's brick silo stood in front of the new church -- built to look like a barn, complete with loft door. No religious symbols adorned the exterior.

Volunteers stood at the door greeting young families, elderly couples, singles and teenagers with studded ears. In the lobby, coffee and bagels were available. "Make yourself a nametag," invited a sign next to pens and labels.

The sanctuary is a huge open space with folding chairs circling a platform that serves as a pulpit. Behind that is an altar covered in purple cloth with a two-foot-high wooden cross. Behind that is a stage with two electric guitars, a keyboard, drums and tambourines. Two large video screens display words to contemporary hymns. The liturgy, which includes Communion, is casual but reverent.

Beverly Farmer of Silver Spring, a traffic reporter with WUSA (Channel 9), has attended Cedar Ridge for five years. "The big, metal building, the folding chairs, was not my idea of church . . . but it appealed to me," Farmer said. "I felt I was at home."

DOJ_NMG_0060866

With McLaren's books drawing increased international attention, he asked to step down last year so he could travel more. Matthew Dyer took over as pastor in February.

But McLaren returned on a Sunday in July to preach on the theme of his latest book. Farmer, who was in the congregation that day, said she misses her former pastor but understands.

"Brian's mission is bigger than just Cedar Ridge," she said. "I know he has more work to do in this world."

Activist Preacher Calls For 'Good Religion' (LAT)

By K. Connie Kang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

At a conference in Pasadena, liberal Christians are urged to create a kinder, gentler way to practice their faith and politics.

Declaring that Americans have been exposed to "too much bad religion" for too long, activist preacher and author Jim Wallis on Saturday called on more than 1,000 Christians gathered in Pasadena to join him in a national movement to create a more unifying "good religion."

"Good religion pulls our best — our hunger for justice, for peace, for connection — and our lives mean something in the world," Wallis said. "Bad religion pulls our worst stuff — our fears, our divisions, our hatreds, our selfishness."

Wallis, founder of Washington, D.C.-based Sojourner, a progressive Christian magazine, and a self-described evangelical, was among prominent liberal Christian leaders who spoke at a three-day conference on "Politics and Spirituality" at Pasadena Civic Auditorium, which concludes today. Other speakers included Father Richard Rohr, a Franciscan priest who founded the Center for Action and Contemplation in Albuquerque, N.M., and Anne Lamott, best-selling author and teacher. The conference included interactive workshops on contemplative prayer, handling the news media and waging campaigns for peace and social justice.

For Christians, good religion means heeding Christ's admonition to look after the poor, said Wallis, who in 1995 founded "Call to Renewal," a national network of churches and faith-based groups that works to influence public policy on social justice issues.

Poverty, he said, is today's slavery.

Wallis, author of "God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It," believes that many Christians feel that their faith has been stolen from them by the Christian right.

He said the Christian right's preoccupation with two issues — abortion and same-sex union — misrepresents their faith.

"How did the faith of Jesus come to be known as pro-rich, pro-war, and only pro-American?" he asked. "How do we get back to a historic, biblical, and genuine evangelical faith rescued from its contemporary distortions?"

Wallis urged the attendees — many of them pastors and Christian workers from around the country — to make a "covenant" for a new America, to overcome poverty with religious commitment and political leadership.

Wallis, who has lived in a tough inner-city Washington, D.C., neighborhood for more than three decades, said liberals and conservatives have both failed the poor.

Overcoming poverty will require personal and social responsibilities, he said.

"I want to see liberals in Washington, D.C., talk about out-of-wedlock births and the need for personal responsibility and better choices," he said. "And I want conservatives to talk about strategic investments in child care, healthcare, housing and education. If that were to happen in Washington, D.C., it would be an explosion."

In his travels around the country — he has about 200 speaking engagements a year — he sees a hunger for spirituality and a hunger for social justice, especially among young people.

The challenge for Christians is to help connect the two, he said.

He believes a change is on the way.

Mary O'Brien, a human resources executive and a Roman Catholic who came to the conference with her husband, Tim, said she found Wallis' message of "transformation in our culture," uplifting.

"It's a very hopeful message," she said. "I am just praying that it will happen."

"I really believe this country has to take a new direction," said her husband, who teaches at Schuur High School in Montebello.

The Rev. Dan Smith, senior pastor of West Hollywood Presbyterian Church, called Wallis' message "very exciting."

"He is one of the best articulators of this spiritual and theological values that can be heard by both sides," Smith said.

"For those of us who live in Los Angeles and interact every day with the poor and the homeless, it becomes a personal experience. I think he is trying to personalize the issues for us."

Among The Thugs (NYT)

By Tara Mckelvey

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

Michael G. Santos hardly seems like a reliable narrator. As a middle-class kid in Seattle, he was "a mediocre student" in high school, and then, three years after graduation, he chose drug trafficking as a profession. He lived "arrogantly," driving Porsches and wearing Cartier diamonds, and he owned an offshore race boat called the Outlaw. He was eventually charged with distributing cocaine and, in 1987, sentenced to 45 years in prison. In his book, he presents accounts of the sex, violence and drugs found behind bars. Yet he knows that a man like him — "a long-term prisoner" — is seen as "prone to prevarication or exaggeration." Few would have believed the Abu Ghraib stories if they'd come from the prisoners, he points out. It was the pictures that made them real.

Santos deserves a hearing. More than 6 percent of Americans will find themselves behind bars at some point in their lives, according to the Justice Department. Nobody knows better than he does what it's like. "Inside" is a quasi-sociological treatise, with sections on the prison economy (it features smuggling and prostitution), educational system (one library specializes in "westerns and romance novels") and labor conditions (prisoners work in a dairy, a slaughterhouse and "a rock patch," raking "parallel lines"). Marx and Maxim both make an appearance.

Mainly, though, it's a diary of "a gladiator school," "a walled city of madness." Guards act savagely — a natural outcome in a culture where "the only thing lower than an inmate is an 'inmate lover,' a 'hug-a-thug.' " They can also be infuriatingly petty. "Guards are the only people I see throwing cigarettes on the ground," one prisoner says. "They walk across lawns and then order inmates to rake up behind them." Meanwhile, prisoners stab and rape one another and make weapons out of everything from a heavy pipe to a tube sock filled with combination locks. Violence, or the threat of it, permeates Santos's life. When he runs into an old buddy, "a hard-core gang leader" named Crip Tank, he calls out a friendly greeting: "The last time I saw you, you were leaving a guy's guts hanging out of his stomach in the corridor." Santos survives among the thugs by acting as a jailhouse lawyer for Crip Tank's friend and others, and he backs up stories of brutality by citing federal cases.

His writing is stilted (he's no Jean Genet), and the narrative jumps, jarringly, from prison to prison (he's been held in at least six). With all the blood and gore, it's hard to know where we are. Also, the book hits some false notes. Santos shows only a crude understanding of female psychology. His spicy accounts of encounters between prisoners and hot women — including an educator, a business manager and a lawyer, all with their skirts hiked up — seem based more on prison-porn fantasy than on empirical evidence: "Wendy cannot help herself," he writes, unconvincingly.

Nevertheless, he lays out a strong case for prison reform. Most inmates focus on survival, not rehabilitation. And the flaws in the system seem to create a steady stream of prisoners — namely, those who are released and then end up back behind bars. Even worse, "neither those in corrections, nor those benefiting from the enormous capital disbursements — like prison towns, suppliers, contractors, etc. — want to see material changes. Why would they? Doing so would be akin to those in Las Vegas making a call for an end to gambling." Despite a breathless style, Santos provides more than just a seamy look at prison life. He also offers a chilling, timely portrayal of a place where, as one man says, all you need to survive is "a steel ball of hate and a knife."

European Union In Last-Ditch Talks With Iran On Nuclear Plans (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 9 — Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief and Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, said Saturday that they would continue last-ditch negotiations on Sunday in Vienna to see how far Iran would go to meet United Nations Security Council demand that it freeze its uranium-enrichment program or risk sanctions.

Christina Gallach, Mr. Solana's spokeswoman, told reporters that the three hours of talks on Saturday had been "positive and constructive.'' Mr. Larijani said, "We had some good and constructive talks, we made some progress in some areas, and we shall continue tomorrow."

Diplomatic pressure on Iran to halt its enrichment of uranium has increased in recent weeks. Iran says its nuclear program is designed to generate electricity, but the United States and Europe suspect the program is meant to develop nuclear weapons.

R. Nicholas Burns, the American under secretary of state for political affairs, said Friday in Berlin that the United States hoped to begin talks next week to fashion a resolution that would seek sanctions against Iran if it did not halt its enrichment of uranium.

Mr. Burns was speaking after extensive talks with the other four permanent members of the Security Council — Russia, France, China, Britain — as well as with Germany. Talks were held separately with Canada, Italy and Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0060868

He said the talks with the Europeans, Russia and China would continue Monday and would focus on the possibility of drawing up a draft on sanctions before the General Assembly convened the following week.

But Russia and China have made it clear that they will oppose sanctions, and on Saturday, the Chinese prime minister, Wen Jaibao, warned against stepping up pressure on Iran.

"To mount pressure or to take sanctions will not necessarily bring about a peaceful solution," he told a news conference in Helsinki, Finland, after a meeting with European Union officials. He added that resolving the nuclear dispute peacefully would take time.

Mr. Wen will start a two-day official visit to Germany on Wednesday, and is expected to discuss Iran with the German chancellor, Angela Merkel.

Before arriving in Vienna, Mr. Solana said he did not want United Nations sanctions to be imposed on Iran "as long as meetings with Mr. Larijani continue."

Britain, France and Germany circulated a letter to other European capitals on Thursday warning that Iran was intent on "splitting the international community" and playing for time by declining to answer in detail a package of economic and political incentives that American, European, Russian and Chinese negotiators presented it in July.

Iran Nuke Negotiators Report Progress (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Senior negotiators for Iran and the European Union reported progress Saturday at talks meant to find common ground for resolving Tehran's defiance of a U.N. demand that the Islamic republic freeze uranium enrichment or risk sanctions.

In an encouraging sign, the two sides agreed to hold further discussions Sunday.

"We had some good and constructive talks and we have made some progress in some areas, and we shall continue ... tomorrow," chief Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said, speaking through an interpreter.

Cristina Gallach, spokeswoman for Javier Solana, the EU's foreign policy chief, confirmed that more talks would be held Sunday. "The feedback from the table is that the talks have been constructive and positive," she said.

The discussions have been billed as possibly the last chance for Iran to avoid sanctions for rejecting the U.N. Security Council's demand that it suspend its uranium enrichment processes, which can be misused to make nuclear bombs.

Being held at the Austrian chancellor's office, the talks are looking for a basis to open negotiations between Iran and six world powers that have offered a package of economic and diplomatic incentives meant to persuade Tehran to limit its nuclear program.

The five permanent Security Council members — the United States, China, Britain, France and Russia — along with Germany have demanded that Iran halt enrichment as a condition for the talks, but the Iranians have steadfastly refused to do so.

With the two side seemingly so far apart, hopes for success had been slim for the mission by Solana, who is formally authorized by the six powers to carry their message and listen to the Iranians, without actually negotiating.

Still, positions appeared to have shifted slightly.

European officials who insisted on anonymity for sharing confidential information with The Associated Press suggested that at least some of the six nations were at least ready to listen if Iran committed itself to an enrichment freeze soon after the start of negotiations instead of doing so as a condition for such talks.

The officials declined to provide details. But such a readiness would deal a blow to U.S.-led attempts to hold fast to the demand that Iran freeze enrichment before any talks commence — or face the prospect of Security Council sanctions.

One of the officials said Solana discussed the issue with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice before going into the meeting but declined to offer details.

As late as Friday, U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Washington expected the Security Council to start discussing a draft on sanctions as early as next week unless Tehran reversed course and agreed to freeze enrichment.

But there might be opposition to that within the council. Russia and China have resisted a quick move to sanctions even while agreeing to them as the ultimate punishment.

And French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy on Thursday appeared to suggest the demand on freezing enrichment first and talking later was negotiable. "The question is to know at what moment this suspension takes place compared to negotiations," he said.

He later appeared to reverse himself, saying in separate comments that suspension "is an absolute prerequisite for restoring trust and resuming negotiations."

DOJ_NMG_0060869

A European diplomat told AP the mixed signals seemed to reflect that a sizable number of countries within the 24-member EU oppose a quick move to sanctions — even though Britain, France and Germany formally represent the bloc within the six-nation negotiating group.

China, meanwhile, repeated on Saturday its stance that patience was needed in dealing with Iran.

During a meeting with EU leaders in Finland, Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao urged Tehran "to make constructive steps" toward ending the standoff, but added: "Our purpose is that the nuclear issue of Iran will be settled peacefully."

Burns had dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-power coalition on when Iran should commit to enrichment Friday, a day after those six countries ended confidential discussions on Iran in Berlin.

Outlining the U.S. view of the timetable on Iran, Burns said the six nations would consult further by phone Monday and hoped to present a unified approach on sanctions to their foreign ministers by the time the U.N. General Assembly opens Tuesday.

"The American view is that following these discussions on Monday and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution" on sanctions, he said.

Iran says it wants to develop an enrichment program to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that generate electricity. But there are growing concerns it seeks enrichment technology to make weapons-grade uranium for the core of warheads.

The six powers agreed on a package of economic and political rewards in June to be offered to Tehran, but only if it stops enrichment before the start of negotiations aimed at a long-term enrichment moratorium.

But the international alliance also warned of punishments, including U.N. sanctions, if Tehran did not halt enrichment — something Iran refused to do by the Aug. 31 deadline set by the Security Council.

Associated Press writer Robert Wielaard in Helsinki, Finland, contributed to this report.

Iran, EU Negotiators Make Progress In Nuke Talks (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 10, 2006

Video Of Iranian Missile Test Is Fake, Pentagon Says (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. military intelligence has determined that a video released by the Iranian government purporting to show a test of a new submarine missile is bogus, three Pentagon officials confirmed.

The Iranians released the video Aug. 27, one of a series of steps the Tehran government has taken in recent months to display its military potency in the midst of a confrontation with the United States and other Western nations over its nuclear ambitions.

The test apparently was designed to intimidate Iran's neighbors in the Persian Gulf, including Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which are U.S. allies and important oil-producing countries, regional experts said. The video showed what appeared to be a successful test of a submarine-fired missile that flies above the water's surface to attack ships.

But U.S. intelligence officers analyzed the plume of smoke from the missile and determined it matched a video of an earlier Chinese test.

"It's the identical launch," a Pentagon official said. "The plume, everything, is the same."

U.S. officials have been unable to confirm whether any test took place during the Iranian exercise. They say they are certain, however, that the video of the purported test is not of an Iranian sub in the Persian Gulf.

U.S. intelligence agencies have been closely tracking developments in Iran in an attempt to monitor Tehran's efforts to build up its nuclear capabilities as well as its conventional military capacity. The surveillance efforts are part of what experts see as a strategic contest of increasing complexity, with the two nations working to decipher each other's motivations and intentions.

The purported missile test was announced by Iran's official news agency a day before the video was released and just before an Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations for Iran to halt its uranium enrichment.

The Bush administration is pushing for U.N. sanctions against the country unless it stops enriching uranium. Although Iran, an oil-rich country, says it is solely pursuing civilian power, the U.S. and other countries believe Tehran is intent on building nuclear weapons.

The test video was broadcast on Iranian state television and picked up around the world, including by CNN and Fox News.

What has American military officers scratching their heads is why the Iranians would see the need to release a phony video.

"They have enough things they can do to frighten people, I don't know why they would have to fake something," a senior defense official said. "They are frightening enough as it is without faking things."

Iran said it was conducting the test as part of a summer war games exercise in the Persian Gulf that began Aug. 19. U.S. military officials believe such exercises are aimed primarily at intimidating gulf countries.

"It is like when the missiles went through Red Square in front of the Politburo," a military official said. "Their MO is to put on a media blitz."

The officials asked that their names not be used because the Defense Department had decided not to publicize the discovery. Taking on the role of superpower tattletale could exacerbate already tense relations, or provoke more, real tests.

The missile was named Sagheb, meaning "penetrating" or "piercing." After the alleged test, Adm. Sajjad Kouchaki, the top Iranian naval commander, said on Iranian television that the weapon was a long-range missile that could be fired from a variety of ships and evade radar.

(A copy of the Iranian television report, including the video of the missile launch, can be seen at http://www.youtube.com/watchvtvpPAKNlf44.)

"It is smart," Kouchaki said, according to a BBC transcript. "It has a very high degree of precision, taking the enemy by surprise. The missile has a massive destructive power."

Pentagon officials said Iran had several Russian Kilo-class submarines, the kind shown in the Chinese video. Iran's growing naval capability is real, said the senior official, which is what made the use of fake video seem particularly "clumsy."

"They do have a serious military capability," the official said. "They are a growing military problem."

DOJ_NMG_0060871

Wayne White, the former deputy director of the State Department's Middle East intelligence office, called the news of the deception "a scream."

"I was looking at what they were showing" on the video, White said. "And it was not the kind of thing that would intimidate a military of the capabilities of the United States."

White argued that Iran wanted to intimidate Saudi Arabia and other gulf countries, saying that if the U.S. tried to destroy Iran's ability to create nuclear weapons, oil tankers in the gulf would be a likely target of an initial Iranian counterattack. And Iran may hope that the threat it poses to U.S. allies in the region is its best chance at pressuring Washington not to attack.

The video, White said, "is aimed at intimidating the Saudis and the gulf states, to get them to press Washington not to exercise the military option."

But he said that Iran's recent tactics seem to be self-defeating, only working to increase the perception in Europe that the country is becoming an ever greater world threat.

And so why highlight a video, so easily determined to be fake?

"They may not have believed that the inauthenticity would be so easily detected," said John Calabrese, a scholar at the Middle East Institute. "It's an attention-grabber. But it's bizarre."

The Roots Of Hezbollah's Clout Lie In Iran (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

The ties between the militant group and Tehran are complex and go back decades. For many in Lebanon, it's a beneficial partnership.

BAALBEK, Lebanon — Charities modeled after Iranian organizations provide healthcare to the poor. Religious schools funded with help from an Iranian bank educate thousands of children. Islamic foundations with ties to Iran make loans to home buyers.

And when a "martyr" falls in battle, posters reminiscent of the ones studding Tehran rise up in the scenery of south Beirut, southern Lebanon and here in the Bekaa Valley. They even appear to have been drawn by the same artist.

A tour of Hezbollah's state within a state in southern Lebanon reveals a replica of the distinctive institutions and styles of the Islamic Republic's ideological machinery, and offers clues to the militant group's powerful hold here.

Iran's relationship with Lebanon's Shiites is a complex web stretching back decades and spanning nearly all facets of religious, economic and social life — ties that have grown stronger since hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad came to power last year.

"The Americans and Israelis are convinced that they're fighting a terrorist organization and they'll bomb it and the people will turn against it, like you're making a coup d'etat," said a critic of Hezbollah, who asked that his name not be printed for fear of retribution. "But the Iranians have knitted a carpet. You have to have patience to unravel it."

Lebanon and Iran have had strong religious and commercial ties for centuries.

The charismatic Imam Musa Sadr came to Lebanon from Iran in the 1960s to help the then-disenfranchised Shiite plurality, financing a series of schools throughout the country. After the 1979 Iranian revolution led by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, those ties were strengthened by blood as Iran dispatched hundreds of Revolutionary Guard troops to the Bekaa Valley to help organize Shiite militants and direct their guns toward invading Israeli forces.

In return, Lebanese guerrillas trained Iranian soldiers, accustomed to American equipment, to use Russian-made weaponry during Iran's 1980s war against Sunni-dominated Iraq, said Hassan Hosseini, a Beirut researcher writing a book on relations between Iran and Lebanon.

The Islamic Republic opened its purse to Hezbollah with the group's inception in 1982, in part because the militants provided direct access to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Iran's new rulers were ideologically committed to opposing Israel and eager to prove themselves as the true champions of the Islamic nation.

Almost immediately as well, Iranians began exporting versions of their unique institutions. Jihad al Bina, which is handing out cash to homeless Shiites, was launched in 1984, an offshoot of the similarly named organization in Iran. The Imam Khomeini Foundation began operations in 1987.

Overt Iranian funding comes through Bank Saderat, a state-owned import-export bank that arrived in Lebanon in the early 1960s and expanded its presence there during the 1990s, opening branches in the Bekaa Valley and the south.

DOJ_NMG_0060872

The bank was used as a tool to further Iran's foreign policy goals in Lebanon, disbursing funds for charities, social services and several networks of schools, said a former financial services industry professional and scholar who has studied Saderat's operations.

"It became a receptacle of all the goodwill activity of all the organizations that are linked to Iran," he said. "They funnel through the bank."

On Friday, the Treasury Department announced it was barring Saderat from doing business with the U.S. The bank allegedly has given one Hezbollah-controlled organization $50 million since 2001, the department said in a statement.

"Bank Saderat facilitates Iran's transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to Hezbollah and other terrorist organizations each year," said Stuart Levey, the department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence. "We will no longer allow a bank like Saderat to do business in the American financial system, even indirectly."

Indeed, Saderat practices none of the traditional banking activities in Lebanon: There are no ATMs or gifts for opening savings accounts. Its assets totaled a modest $101 million in 2004. Yet at times its receipts have careened off the map, the former industry professional said.

Lebanon is awash in cash. Although the country of 4 million has an annual trade deficit of $6 billion to $7 billion a year, it almost always ends up with a positive balance of payments, meaning more than $7 billion in cash enters the country annually, said Kamal Hamdan, a Lebanese economist.

"Nothing is really traceable," he said. "You have remittances. You have tourism. You have transfers from nonofficial sources and direct private investment."

Even after Lebanon implemented strict money-laundering laws in 2001, funds kept flowing to Hezbollah. In a 2004 study, one secular Shiite political party estimated that Hezbollah had an annual budget of $600 million to $700 million and was providing jobs to 37,000 people.

"Hezbollah is not a volunteer thing," said Ahmed Asaad, leader of Competence, a small political party with roots in Lebanon's south. "Even from day one they had a payroll system."

Iran's election of reformist President Mohammad Khatami in 1997 spurred a dramatic change in relations with Hezbollah, as the moderate cleric tried to cut off covert ties with the group or rein it in. Although Hezbollah's relations with the state faltered, it maintained strong contacts with the Iranian clerical establishment in Qom and with figures in the country's security apparatus, several experts said.

During the 1990s, Hezbollah allegedly continued to receive weapons from Iran across the Lebanese-Syrian border, including sophisticated medium-range rockets.

Hezbollah officials scoff at the suggestion that Iran supplies them with arms, saying they have built up such an economic base among Lebanese at home and abroad that they don't need Iranian largesse to equip themselves.

"It's very easy to buy arms when you have the money to get arms," said Nawar Sahili, a member of Hezbollah's 14-member parliamentary bloc.

Under Ahmadinejad's presidency, Tehran's official players and its shadow government of hard-line clerics have become one, and the rhetorical support for Hezbollah has increased.

Ahmadinejad and his inner circle include hard-core ideologues who hope to reinvigorate the Islamic Republic's revolutionary goals.

"This man means business," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a professor at the Lebanese American University who has studied Hezbollah for more than a decade. "His rhetoric means open support for Hezbollah and Hamas against Israel."

Even as Israeli warplanes wreaked havoc on Lebanese housing and infrastructure, Iranian officials promised a quick reconstruction. Jaws dropped as Hezbollah officials, acting through Jihad al Bina, began handing out wads of crisp $100 bills to homeless families, reportedly to the tune of $180 million.

"You want to tell me Lebanese investors are paying for that?" said Asaad, the Competence party leader. "This is Iranian money."

Although some argue that Lebanese Shiites have no cultural affinity with their Persian coreligionists, the money, schools, charities and attention have paid off in loyalty to Iran.

"I feel closer to Iran than to other Lebanese," said Tarek Adad, a 36-year-old iron importer and a Hezbollah supporter in the Bekaa Valley. "This is natural, because the Shiites in Iran would never betray us. The others in Lebanon have all betrayed us."

Lebanon Left To Face Most Basic Of Issues (WP)

War Exposes Deep Conflicts About the Nation's Identity and Its Future

BIKFAYA, Lebanon -- From the terrace of former president Amin al-Gemayel's ancestral mansion, Lebanon appeared so beautiful that it seemed it should go on forever. Traditional houses of ocher stone huddled far below in close-knit villages, and churches with tiny domes stood sentinel along the twisting roads. In the distance, the Mediterranean gleamed under a warm Middle Eastern sun.

But the recent 33-day war between Israel and Hezbollah has raised fundamental questions about Lebanon's future and its identity, straining the political institutions on which the country was built, perhaps to the breaking point. In Bikfaya, Gemayel's tranquil little town in the hills behind Beirut, and across the rest of Lebanon, people have begun to think that their country and its historic melding of Christians with Muslims may not prevail after all.

"Lebanon is at a crossroads," said Gemayel, who was president during wars from 1982 to 1988. "Either we draw the lessons from the war and build a Lebanon that is genuinely democratic and liberal, and an example of intercommunal coexistence, or we are headed for the disintegration of Lebanon."

In their own ways, Israel and the Bush administration have grappled with the same problem in Lebanon. In parallel policies, they have insisted that Hezbollah disarm and fully join in the Lebanese political process. But because Lebanon's political institutions do not reflect Hezbollah's wider support in the population, the militant Shiite Muslim movement has made it clear that greater changes will be needed before it lays down its arms.

The Gemayel family, Maronite Christians, had a lot to do with the creation of Lebanon's old landscape, a place where Christians and Muslims coexisted and business flourished while the tax man looked the other way. Amin al-Gemayel's father, Pierre, was a pharmacist who became a leader of the independence movement. His elder brother, Bashir, was president briefly in 1982 before being assassinated at the behest of the Syrian government.

The Lebanon most foreigners think of -- tolerant, easy-living, Western-oriented -- bore the imprint of Maronite families such as the Gemayels, and not by accident. France, the mandate power here until just after World War II, originally carved Lebanon off from Syria to provide a place for the Maronites in the predominantly Muslim Middle East. They made it into a "hinge country," linking East and West.

To rule the new country and preserve its unusual personality, France left behind a system under which the president and the army commander must be Maronites, giving decisive power to what was then the major community. The prime minister was to be Sunni Muslim and the speaker of parliament a Shiite.

Lebanon's demography has changed drastically since then. No official census has been taken, a reflection of how delicate the issue is here. But academics said that over the past two decades, Shiites have become a plurality -- estimates range from 32 percent to 45 percent of the population -- and Maronites a minority of less than a quarter. With Sunni Muslims and other sects counted, the overall balance has changed to more than 60 percent Muslim.

Hezbollah's emergence as a political party and armed militia was in large measure a response to that shift. In effect, the organization stepped in to represent Shiites because many of them felt the government did not, particularly in the southern hills along the border with Israel.

"We are not a replacement for the state," Hasan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, said in a recent televised interview. "But where the state is absent, we have to take up the slack."

The war with Israel further dramatized the gap between Lebanon's institutions and its new political demography. Communal strains had been swept under the rug for years under the leadership of Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri, who was assassinated in 2005. But in the crucible of a destructive, bloody war, those strains suddenly seemed glaring.

Lebanon's official, Maronite-led army sat out the conflict, for instance, while Hezbollah's militia, which was better armed, did the fighting and dying. President Emile Lahoud, the other Maronite pillar of power, was also on the sidelines because of his association with Syria, an ally of Hezbollah.

As a result, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a Sunni economist, spoke in the name of Lebanon and received foreign visitors such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice for negotiations about the war. But he had to check with Nasrallah regarding important decisions, because Hezbollah was the seat of Lebanon's real power of war or peace.

"What institutions do we have?" asked Social Affairs Minister Nayla Moawad, a Maronite and the widow of assassinated president RenÃ© Moawad. "We have inherited a non-administration. The Lebanese government is like this box," she said, holding up a silver coffee-table decoration. "There is nothing in it. It is empty."

Moawad and other Christians, along with Sunni Muslims, have stressed that the right response is strengthening the Lebanese government. Hezbollah must recognize that only the state can have the power of arms, they said, and it must turn away from Iranian-style theocracy to become part of the relaxed mix that has made Lebanon so attractive over the years to investors and Arab vacationers.

DOJ_NMG_0060874

"It is up to Hezbollah to make this decision," Gemayel said. "Unfortunately, Lebanon is hanging on the choice."

Although the country's Sunni establishment fought the Maronites in the 1950s and again in the 1970s in the heyday of Arab nationalism, it has recoiled at Hezbollah's politically charged brand of Islam and its ties with Iran. In the debate over Lebanon's identity, conducted before the war in a round of meetings called the National Dialogue, most Sunnis opted for alliance with the Maronites and endorsed their demand for Hezbollah's disarmament.

"Nasrallah has been lying to us all along," sneered a Sunni minister in describing Hezbollah's participation in the National Dialogue.

Nasrallah has gone out of his way to reassure fellow Lebanese that Hezbollah has no intention of remaking Lebanon to look like Iran. In his recent interview, he pledged loyalty to the Lebanese tradition of religious and social tolerance.

"Lebanon is a pluralistic country," he declared. "It is not an Islamic country. It is not a Maronite country. It is not an Orthodox country. It is not a Shiite country. It is a country of consensus. You have nothing to fear from anybody from Hezbollah."

But Nasrallah's pledge was not well received by many Sunnis and Maronites. Hezbollah only weeks ago went to war without consulting the government, they noted, and moved as soon as the cease-fire took effect to help refugees without reference to government agencies charged with the same task.

Perhaps more important, they noted, was Nasrallah's postwar assertion that Hezbollah must be taken into account in government deliberations from here on out. The party ran for office in the last elections, gaining seats in parliament and two ministers in Siniora's cabinet. But Nasrallah seemed to be saying his group will be seeking more power now that, in his words, it has fought a war on Lebanon's behalf.

A share of power that reflects the Shiites' true place in the population would probably change Lebanon's orientation significantly, the Sunni and Maronite observers predicted. But a refusal to acknowledge the demographic change and Hezbollah's enhanced status after the war, they said, would be a recipe for more intercommunal conflict. As a result, the timeless view from Gemayel's terrace may be in for a change.

"I don't see Lebanon surviving as it is today," said Dori Chamoun, leader of the Maronite-based National Liberal party and son of a former president and longtime political figure, the late Camille Chamoun. "It is inevitable that the Christians will have a smaller share of the country. I only see one solution, cantonization. Everybody wants it. Nobody says it out loud."

In a recent book, Gemayel proposed abandoning Lebanon's current system and replacing it with election of the president by popular vote and decentralization along the geographical lines that largely define where Muslims and Christians live in any case. "The institutions of Lebanon are tired," he said. "They are drained of their blood."

The losers in such a change would largely be Sunni Muslims, Chamoun pointed out, because by and large they have not carved out sections of the country as theirs. Public Works Minister Mohamad Safadi, a Sunni who lives in Beirut, said he was discussing the problem with his wife recently and reassured her that, if worse comes to worst, they could always live in their weekend house -- in the quintessentially Christian port of Byblos.

Italy Says Syria OKs EU Border Personnel (AP)

By Zeina Karam, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Italy's prime minister said Saturday that Syrian President Bashar Assad has agreed to the deployment of European Union personnel along Lebanon's border with Syria.

Syria's official news agency denied news reports that the EU personnel under discussion would be border guards.

"The reports by some news agencies that Syria has accepted that European border guards monitor the Lebanese-Syrian borders are not true," the official Syrian Arab News Agency reported.

The positioning of European Union guards could help allay Israel's concerns about the smuggling of weapons from Syrian to Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon, which the U.N. Security Council has demanded be stopped under the nearly month-old cease-fire it brokered to end the war in southern Lebanon.

Syria and Iran are Hezbollah's main backers, and Western and Israeli officials repeatedly have said the guerrillas receive arms from the two countries, often in land convoys from Syria.

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi issued a statement Saturday saying he had spoken with Assad several times over the last few days and he has agreed "in principle" to an EU presence on the border between Lebanon and Syria.

"I reminded President Assad that the European Union has significant experience in training programs for frontier guards, and that the idea of an EU mission of assistance on the border between Syria and Lebanon would be an excellent signal of cooperation between Syria and Europe," Prodi's statement said. "President Assad gave me his accord in principle."

Prodi's statement also said "we believe that a significant quantity of arms pass through this border ... toward southern Lebanon."

DOJ_NMG_0060875

The Italian news agency ANSA quoted Prodi as saying Syria had agreed to European border guards in plainclothes and without weapons to prevent arms shipments to the Hezbollah. Prodi's office earlier on Saturday confirmed the ANSA report was accurate.

But after Syria issued its denial, Prodi's spokesman Silvio Sircana clarified the prime minister's earlier statements. He said Syria's denial was accurate and quoted Prodi as saying Syria had agreed to "EU personnel." He denied Prodi had referred to them as border guards.

"I confirm that Prodi and Assad did not discuss troops or guards, but only EU personnel without uniforms or arms that will be at the disposal of the Syrian forces," Sircana told the Associated Press.

The Syrian news agency did not say whether the president had agreed to any other type of European presence on their border. It said that as part of continued consultations between Syria and Italy, Assad and Prodi spoke by telephone Saturday night during which "the talks were on technical assistance, including training, that is expected to be offered to Syrian border guards."

Until now, Syria has vehemently rejected the deploying of armed U.N. peacekeepers on the Lebanese side of the border. Assad has said he would consider such a deployment a hostile move toward his country.

In a meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in Damascus earlier this month, Assad promised to increase Syrian patrols on the border and work with Lebanese troops to enforce the arms embargo.

Prodi said Saturday that Assad told him Syria would send 500 border guards, but did not say when. The Lebanese military said Saturday there had been no changes on the Syrian side of the border.

The U.N. resolution that halted 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah on Aug. 14 laid out a delicate and complicated process for keeping the peace — but so far its provisions are slowly coming together.

Israel lifted its air and sea blockades of Lebanon this week, and Israeli troops are pulling out of the south as the Lebanese army moves in.

Some 3,250 U.N. peacekeepers have fanned out across the south as well, part of a force planned to reach 15,000. A naval force is patrolling off shore, and international officials will operate at Lebanon's seaports and airport to help Lebanese officials watch for arms smuggling.

The next test will be how the U.N. peacekeepers deal with Hezbollah as they enforce a buffer zone in southern Lebanon where the guerrillas' weapons are banned.

Another major issue remains sensitive and untouched: Hezbollah's disarmament.

The U.N. force, known as UNIFIL, does not plan to seek out hidden Hezbollah arsenals, only to deal with any weapons its troops might encounter.

"We're mandated to make sure there are no forces outside the Lebanese army and UNIFIL in south Lebanon. But I'm not a fortuneteller and we haven't been in such situations yet," UNIFIL spokesman Alexander Ivanko said.

He repeated Annan's position that "disarming Hezbollah is something for the Lebanese army."

Some 200 French soldiers landed in Beirut on Saturday to join the U.N. force, the largest French deployment so far out of 2,000 troops it has promised. The amphibious ship La Foudre delivered some 100 military vehicles and weaponry as well.

Also Saturday, Pakistan's Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz said his government would send hundreds of army engineers under the U.N. umbrella to Lebanon to help clear land mines.

The United Nations said, however, that Pakistan's participation was not a done deal, alluding to Israel's objection to UNIFIL troops coming from countries that have no diplomatic relations with the Jewish state.

Hezbollah, meanwhile, criticized the Lebanese government's decision to allow foreign ships to monitor the coast, saying that put the country under foreign sway.

Israeli Says Fatah Leader Could Help Free Soldier (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 9 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Saturday night that he was prepared to meet the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, even without the release of the Israeli soldier captured by militants in Gaza.

Mr. Olmert, after meeting with the British prime minister, Tony Blair, said that “I intend to meet Chairman Abbas” in the near future.

“I have no conditions or prerequisites for such a meeting,” Mr. Olmert said, in an apparent policy shift. He added, “It may be even be helpful with regard to Gilad Shalit,” referring to the Israeli corporal who was captured June 25.

In that episode, Palestinian militants, including members of Hamas, which runs the Palestinian Authority, entered Israel from Gaza through a tunnel. They also killed two soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0060876

Three days later, Israeli forces re-entered Gaza to try to force Corporal Shalit's release and weaken the Hamas government. But the Hamas political bureau leader, Khaled Meshal, in Damascus, has insisted that the corporal will only be released in a prisoner exchange.

Mr. Meshal has reportedly rejected an Egyptian proposal that the corporal be handed over to Egypt, and that hundreds of Palestinian prisoners would be released later, after Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas meet.

Faced with that stalemate, and under much criticism for Israel's recent war in Lebanon — prompted by Hezbollah's capture of two Israeli soldiers — Mr. Olmert has apparently decided to play on the obvious rift between the Hamas government and Mr. Abbas, who is known as Abu Mazen and is the elected president from Fatah.

After all, Mr. Olmert said, "I know very well that Gilad Shalit is not being held by Abu Mazen and I'm sure he would like to see his release."

But he also emphasized that there could be no political progress with the Palestinians until the corporal is free, and then only along the path of the so-called road map for peace. But with his plan to pull thousands more settlers out of the West Bank put aside for now, he is clearly trying to find an agenda in dealing with the Palestinians, as his allies are urging him to do.

The meeting with Mr. Blair drew together two war-damaged prime ministers — Mr. Olmert for the 34 days of military strikes against Hezbollah in Lebanon, and Mr. Blair for his strong support of the Bush administration's positions in Iraq and Israel.

Mr. Blair deflected questions from the British press about his political future and his reaction to criticism of his heir apparent, Gordon Brown. The prime minister said it was "kind of disrespectful" to discuss such internal matters in Israel.

He also gave a ringing defense of his support of the United States and Israel in the war against terrorism, saying, "We face a global threat." Problems in the Middle East have a direct impact on Britain, he said, adding: "I will continue to stand up for an alliance of people who believe in peace and tolerance and democracy against those who believe in terrorism. There is no bigger and more important struggle in the world today."

Mr. Olmert said Mr. Blair was a loyal but critical friend, always pressing humanitarian concerns about the Palestinians and the need to negotiate a two-state solution with them. Mr. Blair has been criticized at home for his support for the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq and for support of Israel in the war in Lebanon.

But Mr. Blair, who pressed for a robust international force in Lebanon, said the United Nations resolution that ended the fighting could be "a major strategic advance for peace in the region."

Israeli PM To Meet Palestinian President (AP)

AP, September 10, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Saturday he would meet Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and work closely with him to advance peace efforts.

Olmert, who spoke after meeting with visiting British Prime Minister Tony Blair, did not say when he would meet Abbas.

Olmert said the meet was not conditional on the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier being held captive by militants with links to the ruling Hamas party. But Olmert said no progress would be made in the peace process until the soldier is released, indicating talks with Abbas could help gain Shalit's freedom.

"I assured Prime Minister Blair that I am ready to work closely with ... Mahmoud Abbas," Olmert said at a joint news conference with his British counterpart. "I also told Prime Minister Blair that I intend to meet with him (Abbas.)" Olmert has not met with Abbas since June.

Shalit was captured on June 25 by militants in Gaza who carried out a cross-border on a military outpost in southern Israel.

Long-stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace talks hit a new obstacle in January when the Islamic Hamas group swept a Palestinian parliamentary election.

Blair expressed support for a renewal of Israeli dialogue with Abbas despite Hamas' control of the Palestinian parliament and government. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel or renounce violence.

"It's very important that we see what we can do to re-energize this process," said Blair.

Blair this week gave in to a fierce rebellion in his Labour Party, reluctantly announcing he would resign within a year. He brushed aside suggestions that his Mideast visit was an effort to distract attention from those woes.

"People can be as cynical as they like, but I've been passionate about this issue (Mideast peace) ... for many years and I'm not going to stop trying on it," he said.

Blair's handling of last month's fighting between Israel and Hezbollah militants in Lebanon is a major cause of his political troubles. Many in his party were infuriated by his refusal to break ranks with President Bush and call for a swift end to the fighting, interpreting that stance as a tacit backing of Israel's offensive.

Blair defended his position.

DOJ_NMG_0060877

"We worked very hard to get the only cease-fire that was ever going to be sustainable, and that was one based on the political framework set out in (U.N.) Resolution 1701," he said.

He has also alienated many in the Palestinian territories, where a group of prominent intellectuals published a statement Thursday saying he would not be welcome in the West Bank.

He plans to meet Abbas there Sunday.

He will not see Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas or other members of his administration.

Haniyeh blasted Blair in a column published Saturday in the London-based Guardian newspaper, accusing him of having "one-sided" policies that hurt the Palestinians.

"At the heart of our region's problems is the Israeli occupation, which has brought about endless suffering and disasters. If you wish to do the right thing, Mr. Blair, then work for the end of occupation without further delay," Haniyeh wrote.

Thousands In Tel Aviv Demand War Inquiry (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

About 30,000 Israelis demonstrated in Tel Aviv to demand that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert order an independent state inquiry into his government's handling of the war in Lebanon.

It was the largest public show of dissatisfaction with Olmert since he took office in May. Polls show his popularity has tumbled amid public frustration with Israel's failure to crush Hezbollah guerrillas. Olmert has pledged only a government inquiry on the war.

Russia And The Mideast: Talk, No Walk (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

MOSCOW

IS Russia the new powerbroker — even peacemaker — of the Middle East? It certainly aspires to be.

On issue after issue this year, Vladimir V. Putin's Kremlin has thrust itself back into the thicket of Middle Eastern diplomacy, most recently, to urge caution and more talks with Iran over its nuclear ambitions. In this, it has been reasserting a Russian role that was largely abandoned when the Soviet Union collapsed.

But one thing is lacking so far: results.

In March, after Hamas won control of the Palestinian Legislature, Mr. Putin invited the new leaders to Moscow even as the United States, Europe and Israel tried to isolate them. He insisted that holding talks with the movement would nudge its leaders to the bargaining table. "I don't think Hamas would have any serious future if Hamas doesn't change," Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov said at the time.

On Thursday, Mr. Lavrov was still repeating the theme, saying that Hamas, now joined by Hezbollah, needed to renounce terrorism and recognize Israel's right to exist. Neither group has.

Mr. Lavrov included Hezbollah while he was in Beirut on a Mideast tour after the recent Israel-Hezbollah fighting was halted by an indefinite cease-fire. The truce was arranged largely as a result of efforts by the United States and France, and in the face of a Russian counterproposal for a 72-hour cease-fire, which Hezbollah and Syria would have preferred.

Now Russia is promising Lebanon support for reconstruction, but so far it has offered only $1.75 million. Its Defense Ministry has also balked at sending peacekeepers to join a new United Nations force, although officials have said they might send military engineers to help rebuild bridges.

To supplant the United States or Europe as a real broker in the region, experts say, Russia will have to do more. "Even the Germans, with all their history, are sending soldiers," one Middle Eastern diplomat said in an interview in Moscow.

Other Russian diplomatic efforts have sputtered as well. Mr. Putin, who last year became the first Russian president to visit Israel, has hinted that Russia has been reaching out through unspecified channels to free the two Israeli soldiers whose capture in July set off Israel's incursion into Lebanon. "I have reason to believe that our efforts are not in vain," Mr. Putin said.

That was a month and a half ago. The soldiers remain captives.

At the same time, Mr. Putin's tactics have frequently put Russia at odds with the United States and Israel. "We're not playing games here," the American ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, responded bitingly to Russia's cease-fire proposal.

So what exactly is Russia after? Most of all, it is a quest for prestige. And a suggestion of the strategy was contained in Mr. Putin's comment to the Group of 8 summit meeting in St. Petersburg in July. "We will not participate in any crusades, in any holy alliances," he said. Emboldened by an economic boom and seeing an opening caused by Muslim anger at America, the Kremlin seems to be using the Middle East as a forum to reach with new confidence for an independent global role. Vladimir Y. Satanovsky, the president of the Institute for Near Eastern Studies, a private research group in Moscow, put it simply: "The period of collapse is over."

Russia's deep interest in the region is also driven by economics — including arm deals with Syria, Iran and Algeria — and by hope that good relations with the Muslim world may cool any support for Russia's own Islamic insurgencies in and around Chechnya.

"The Middle East is one of their historic bastions of influence," said Clifford Kupchan of the Eurasia Group, a Washington consulting firm. "I think they see their old contacts and their history there as an opening for a resurgent Russia to return to the world stage."

That does not necessarily mean a new zero-sum confrontation with America, though almost certainly some of those advising Mr. Putin would welcome it. In fact, there are signs that the Bush administration has resigned itself to Russia's new role, at least to a point.

That is certainly the case with Iran. President Bush has welcomed Mr. Putin's proposals for a compromise in which Iranian nuclear materials would be processed in Russia, and his willingness to warn Iran of the consequences of failing to agree to U.N. demands that it halt uranium enrichment — even if the Russians now appear unwilling to take that next step.

"It's important to give Russia credit for how constructive they have been," Mr. Kupchan said.

Many here say that Russia, which has more than 20 million Muslims, has a special affinity with the Islamic world that can make Russia a mediator between it and the West. Just two weeks ago, in Kazan, the capital of the Russian republic of Tatarstan, Russian officials met with leaders of Islamic countries as part of a newly created body called the Strategic Vision Group.

"In the Islamic world, Russia is viewed as a friendly power," Veniamin V. Popov, a Russian diplomat, told Izvestia, "and our participation is a guarantee to Muslims that negotiations will produce reasonable results."

In that, the Kremlin faces some wariness. Its willingness to negotiate with Hamas and Hezbollah stands in contrast to Mr. Putin's refusal to talk with the Chechens he considers terrorists. Russia's eagerness to sell arms in the region has also revived old suspicions.

Mr. Satanovsky said that in the end what Russia feared most was instability in the region, especially if another war like the current one in Iraq spread unrest and violence much closer to Russia's border.

"The strategy is 'we don't need enemies,' " he said. "The distance between Iran and Russia is nearly the same as between Cuba and the United States."

Where Big Is Always Better (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

MOSCOW

ONCE Russia wanted the biggest dams in the world. Now it wants the biggest corporations.

Next month, if the deal goes through as expected, Russia will have the world's largest aluminum company, a step that is part of President Vladimir V. Putin's effort to create giant enterprises as a way of reviving Russia's strategic industries.

Some Russians, recalling the Soviet boasts of having the biggest rockets, the biggest steel mills, the biggest ice-breakers, were cynical. "We had a joke in the 1980's that our microchips were the biggest in the world," said Aleksei Venediktov, the editor in chief of Echo of Moscow Radio. "It's that mentality of greatness, in the sense of size, even if it doesn't make sense."

But Russian leaders say that the creation of giant enterprises makes perfect sense in a world that has seen consolidation in natural resources industries, which make up a huge portion of the country's economy.

Last month, Russian Aluminum, or Rusal for short, announced plans to merge with a smaller domestic competitor while also swallowing the mines and factories belonging to Switzerland-based Glencore, a commodity trader. The deal would create a company that would pour more aluminum than the Aluminum Company of America — roughly 4 million tons a year, compared with Alcoa's 2005 output of 3.55 million tons.

While Rusal's executives insist that size itself is not the goal, this is only one of several large-scale projects undertaken recently in industries like oil, natural gas, minerals and aerospace. The most striking example is Gazprom, which has become the second-largest publicly traded energy company in the world, after Exxon Mobil of the United States.

In the steel industry, a Russian tycoon proposed last spring to merge with the Luxembourg-based Arcelor, the world's largest steel company by volume of sales. The deal ultimately unraveled, but it suggested the sweep of Russian ambition these days, in which market capitalization is the new yardstick for comparison with the West.

DOJ_NMG_0060879

Stephen Kotkin, a professor of Russian history at Princeton University and author of "Magnetic Mountain," about the archetypal Soviet steelworks at Magnitogorsk, says that ultimately Russia's new giants "will either be competitive companies or they will fail."

"That is not Soviet," he wrote in an e-mail message.

Mr. Putin, who published a doctoral dissertation in the 1990's on the role of large, state-supported companies in reviving the economy of Western Europe after World War II, says he is aware of the new climate. "This result didn't happen by itself, but as a result of focused actions of the government," he said at a news conference.

The Kremlin is clearly hoping to sell the new gigantism not just as a business strategy, but as a balm for the wounded pride of Russians who endured the economic disasters of the 1990's.

Mr. Venediktov of Echo of Moscow radio explained it this way: "We need to say we are the greatest somewhere, in something. Russia is suffering post-imperial syndrome, like England in the 40's or France in the 50's. But ah-hah! We are still the best someplace. We win more gold medals in gymnastics. And now in this: We passed America in aluminum."

Critics say these bulging new corporations trace their origins to patronage within the Kremlin's factions. Members of their boards tend to be allies of Mr. Putin. Dmitry A. Medvedev, for example, is simultaneously deputy prime minister and chairman of the board of Gazprom.

Mr. Medvedev and others cite arguments that internal competition would only lower export profits in natural resources, depriving Russia of its maximum income. Yaroslav D. Lissovolik, chief economist at Deutsche UFG, estimates that 30 percent of the Russian economy is now controlled by monopolies, both private and state-owned. Official statistics, Mr. Lissovolik said, have become suspect since an anti-monopoly committee was found to be taking bribes from companies to avoid classification as a monopoly.

"I do not see competition policy as being very important to the Russian government right now," he said. "Gigantism, just like in the past, is a popular thing that is seen as very successful."

The Rules According To Putin (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

MOSCOW -- What he has done to the once-turbulent Russian political scene Vladimir Putin would like to do to the world's equally volatile energy markets: Make them as stable and peaceful as the graveyard.

This grand ambition comes through vividly if implicitly as I listen to the Russian president outline in detail the concept of "energy security" that he had presented to world leaders in July at the Group of Eight summit. Putin wants markets built on long-term contracts guaranteeing not only adequate supply (of oil and gas from Russia) but also sustained demand (from consumers willing to pay fixed prices that would hold for decades).

His fellow leaders listened politely but did not commit to an idea that might have seemed quixotic coming from anyone else. Given the year that Putin is having, however, no one was willing to bet that he would fail at grand designs.

He has crushed the vibrant domestic opposition that flourished under Boris Yeltsin. With a 70 percent approval rating, he holds the power to name his successor. He has gained control over the flood of oil dollars pouring into Russia. And perhaps most satisfyingly for him, the political revolution lapping at Russia's frontiers a year ago has receded as reformers who accomplished Ukraine's Orange Revolution splintered and as his non-democratic allies in Belarus easily won reelection.

So the wiry former KGB colonel was chipper as he underwent an annual political checkup of sorts by a group of about 40 American, European and Asian policy and academic experts at his sprawling dacha in suburban Moscow yesterday. He took questions between servings of octopus carpaccio, baked sea bass and figs with yogurt sorbet, all prepared by his Italian chef and washed down by an unassuming pinot grigio 2005.

The clearest sign that fortune has smiled broadly on Putin since he met with the same organization, the Valdai Discussion Group, a year ago in the Kremlin was his warm praise for Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko, whom he now magnanimously terms "a serious, responsible" leader. Last September, he accused Yushchenko of allowing corruption to flourish in Ukraine while suggesting that the West was fomenting upheaval throughout the former Soviet Union.

President Bush also came in for praise and was offered a carefully hedged olive branch on Iran:

"Iran is a special case" located "in a very dangerous area," Putin said. Other nuclear-capable countries such as Brazil or South Africa "do not establish in their constitutions the goal of destroying another state," as he said Iran did with Israel.

"Iran should abandon its plans for nuclear enrichment on its soil," he continued. When asked specifically if Russia would support U.S. calls for sanctions, he declined to rule them out. Economic reprisals should be avoided if possible and adopted only after more discussions between Iran and the six-nation negotiating group that includes Russia and the United States. But Putin's remarks, delivered in simultaneous translation, lent weight to reports that Moscow has agreed to support symbolic sanctions if Iran remains adamant.

Putin, however, does not do mellow for long. He remains intense, focused and at times prickly even when munching the octopus carpaccio (quite tasty, by the way). His eyes flare when the subject turns to energy supplies and the vast infrastructure of new pipelines and producing fields that Russia intends to develop over a decade to become the world's dominant exporter of energy.

Putin and his aides insist that to justify the investment needed to build that infrastructure, consuming nations must begin to sign 20- to 30-year contracts with Russia now to avoid the boom-and-bust cycles of petroleum and natural gas prices of the past three decades.

"We have tremendous potential in energy. Not everybody appreciates that potential," Russia's president said in a waspish swipe aimed at the European Union, which is wrangling with Moscow over natural gas supplies. "But it is not their resource. It is Russia's resource," which must be developed "under clear rules of behavior ."

Asked by British political theorist Anthony Giddens to consider swift changes that technology could force on energy suppliers because of global warming in that time frame, Putin turned the question away: "Stability is what the world economy needs . . . to become more predictable."

In his view, the same is true for Russia's political future. Putin promised again not to change the constitution so he could serve a third term after 2008. "Public opinion wants a country that will be stable, and stability is not assured by one man alone," Putin said. It comes instead from following Moscow rules.

As OPEC Meets, Fresh Doubts About Its Power (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

When the secretary general of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries spoke in London in October 2003, he advocated moderation in oil prices, sounding a familiar OPEC theme that extremely high prices could drive off consumers.

"OPEC knows, through both intuition and experience, that it does not operate in a vacuum," said Alvaro Silva-CalderÃ³n, then the secretary general. "If it wants to sell its oil, then it must attract buyers. And it does not attract buyers by scaring them off, or being unreliable." He added, "Producers need consumers and consumers need producers."

When he gave that speech, OPEC's price target for a barrel of crude oil ranged from $22 to $28. Three years later, the price of oil has nearly tripled. And as OPEC prepares to meet on Monday, the group is worried that high oil prices will chase consumers to alternate energy sources, weaken Western and Asian economies to the point of hurting demand and bring about a boost in supply from non-OPEC countries.

While OPEC ministers no longer forecast prices in the mid-$20s, they still talk about a sustainable price in the $50 to $55 range -- well below current market levels, which have already fallen more than $10 a barrel from the $78 peak in mid-July. Every $10 drop in the price of crude oil knocks about 25 cents off the price of a gallon of gasoline.

The 11-member organization is not expected to make changes in output or production quotas on Monday. But its very lack of action raises questions about whether the group, which produces nearly 40 percent of the world's petroleum, can still act effectively to sway prices or whether its members are simply riding the cyclical waves of the market.

"OPEC has been a hostage to fortune: to what happens on the demand side, to non-OPEC output and geopolitics," said Leo Drollas, deputy executive director and chief economist of the Center for Global Energy Studies in London. At the same time, he noted, its members are "crying all the way to the bank."

In order to act effectively as a cartel, OPEC would have to be able to cut or increase supplies to influence prices. But outside Saudi Arabia, OPEC members have virtually no excess capacity to help drive down prices. And outside Saudi Arabia, hardly any OPEC member has the political will or desire to cut production.

At the moment, the only factors reining in production by the group have nothing to do with oil policy. Nigeria's output has been cut by 600,000 barrels a day because of insurgents sabotaging pipelines in the Niger Delta. Iraq's production has been trimmed by about 800,000 barrels a day by the continuing mayhem there. Venezuela, which is busy quarreling with oil workers' unions and foreign oil companies, is falling about 600,000 barrels a day short of what it once produced. If the would-be cartel is holding back, it isn't by grand design.

And few of the members can boost production immediately -- except Saudi Arabia. The kingdom has a capacity of more than 10 million barrels a day, but it is currently producing around 9.1 million barrels. That has prompted some critics to complain that Saudi Arabia is not doing all it can to lower oil prices.

Saudi oil minister Ali Naimi, citing rising world crude oil inventories, has said that supplies are plentiful and that customers aren't interested in buying more.

Drollas called that "disingenuous." He said, "It's a question of price." The extra oil Saudi Arabia can produce is heavy, high-sulfur crude that costs more to refine and yields a lower-value range of products. Saudi Arabia provides a discount to customers, but Drollas said that isn't enough. "People will lift your oil if they can take it to a refinery and make money," he added.

At the same time, oil analysts say, prices over $70 a barrel make many OPEC members nervous. While OPEC countries sit on top of four-fifths of the world's proven oil reserves, if prices are high enough all sorts of other sources become attractive, from the icy waters off Sakhalin Island to the mile-and-a-half-deep waters in the Gulf of Mexico, from gas liquids projects in the Persian Gulf to the unwieldy oil sands in Canada.

"What's keeping them more anxious is demand," said Roget Diwan, an OPEC expert at PFC Energy, a consulting group. "They want to see China keep growing. They want a soft landing in the United States. They don't want to see a crash."

The outdated OPEC price band was suspended in early 2005, but Diwan said Saudi Arabia and others will try to keep the price around $60. "It's in their interest," he said. "They won't do it to please America."

Indeed many consultants and oil executives who have spoken to Naimi say that the Saudi was miffed earlier this year when President Bush said the United States should reduce dependence on Middle Eastern oil while his administration was urging the kingdom to boost its production capacity to ease world prices. Saudi Arabia has committed to expand its production capacity to 12.5 million barrels a day.

Other OPEC countries could also step up exploration and boost output. A Cambridge Energy Research Associates forecast issued last month predicted that oil and gas liquids production would hit 110 million barrels a day by 2015, up from 89 million barrels today, with most of that coming from OPEC nations.

By then, who knows what prices will be.

"My theory is that the reason the price of oil is very high today is that it was excessively low 10 years ago and the reason it's going to be low 10 years from now is that it is excessively high today," said Paolo Scaroni, chief executive of Italian oil giant ENI SpA. "When the price is very low no one invests in development. Prices go up and everybody invests."

Central Asia Pact Frees The Region Of Nuclear Arms (NYT)

By Ilan Greenberg

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

SEMIPALATINSK, Kazakhstan, Sept. 9 — Five nations in Central Asia signed a nuclear-free-zone treaty on Friday that commits the region's rich uranium deposits to peaceful uses but leaves open loopholes that could allow Russia to transport nuclear weapons into Central Asia.

It is the first mutual security pact among all five Central Asian nations, a group that has often quarreled about security issues.

By adopting the legally binding nuclear-free pact the signatories — the former Soviet republics of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan — agreed that they would neither acquire nuclear weapons nor allow them within their borders. But the treaty does not cancel an agreement that the Central Asian nations signed in 1992 that allows Russia to transport and deploy nuclear weapons in Central Asia under certain circumstances.

The United States, Britain and France boycotted the signing ceremony because they objected to that aspect of the treaty, said embassy officials and participants in the treaty negotiations. Only Russia and China sent representatives to Kazakhstan to observe the treaty signing.

Central Asia currently contains no nuclear weapons, but Kazakhstan was home to the world's fourth-largest nuclear missile arsenal in the wake of the Soviet Union's dissolution. Kazakhstan voluntarily decommissioned its nuclear weaponry in the mid-1990's. Nuclear-free zones often are opposed by the large nuclear powers because they can limit the movement of military assets and expose military bases to intrusive inspections. The United States has an air base in Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan allows NATO fighter planes with missions in Afghanistan to use its territory.

But zones can be crucial confidence-building measures among suspicious neighbors in a troubled region, said John Endicott, a professor of international affairs at the Georgia Institute of Technology, in a telephone interview.

"The United States' lack of support for this nuclear-free zone is a colossal mistake," said Mr. Endicott, who participated in the initial round of talks over the treaty nine years ago in Tashkent, Uzbekistan.

Rescue Darfur Now (WP)

By John McCain And Bob Dole

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

In 1995, the writing was on the wall. The conflict in Bosnia was escalating. Tens of thousands of civilians had been driven from their homes and were trapped in places the United Nations had designated as "safe areas," including Srebrenica. Only a few hundred poorly equipped U.N. peacekeepers stood between those civilians and Bosnian Serb forces. The Serbs had signaled their defiance of the United Nations, their disdain for diplomatic overtures and their determination to advance on the safe areas and finish the job of ethnic cleansing in Bosnia. All the makings of a massacre were present, and, before the eyes of the world, that is what unfolded. Eight thousand Bosnian Muslims were systematically killed at Srebrenica, and history has judged severely those policymakers who failed to heed the warning signs of mass murder.

As advocates of military action in Bosnia, we will never forget those terrible days. We remember that when the United States and its allies did finally act, military intervention saved countless lives. And all of us pledged anew that, should such a situation again unfold, we would do things very differently.

Today, the Darfur region of Sudan faces its own Srebrenica moment.

The scale of human destruction thus far in Sudan has been staggering. Already, more than 200,000 civilians have been killed, with perhaps 2.5 million forced into squalid camps. This catastrophe is the result of a directed slaughter perpetrated by the Sudanese government and allied Janjaweed militias.

Faced with its moral responsibility to act, the U.N. Security Council has adopted a resolution that would replace a courageous but inadequate African Union force with a much larger U.N. force empowered to protect civilians. Last week, the Sudanese government not only rejected the resolution but demanded that the African Union withdraw from the country, leaving civilians vulnerable. Meanwhile, government forces have launched a major offensive in Darfur to finish off any rebel forces there, pushing tens of thousands more civilians into the camps.

As with Srebrenica in 1995, the potential for further mass killing in Darfur today is plain for all to see. All the warnings have been issued, including one from the United Nations that the coming weeks may see "a man-made catastrophe of an unprecedented scale." What remains unclear is only whether the world has the will to impose an outcome on Sudan different from that which unfolded so tragically in Bosnia. Make no mistake: At some point we will step in to help victims in Darfur and police an eventual settlement. The question is whether the United States and other nations will act now to prevent a tragedy, or merely express sorrow and act later to deal with its aftermath.

Urgent action is required in the coming hours and days.

First, the United States should reject out of hand Khartoum's demand that the African Union force leave and should insist that it stay, with broad international support, until the introduction of a robust U.N. force in accordance with Security Council Resolution 1706.

Second, the United States should call on the European Union to impose financial sanctions against the Sudanese leadership and to pursue the immediate imposition of similar sanctions by the U.N. Security Council.

Third, NATO should immediately establish and enforce a no-fly zone over Darfur to ensure that Khartoum ends its offensive military flights and bombing raids, as the Security Council has already demanded.

Fourth, the United States should intensify efforts to persuade U.N. members to commit troops and funds for the U.N. force in Darfur, and it should develop plans for U.S. logistical support. The administration should push the United Nations to draw up firm plans for the entrance of a robust force into Darfur and contingency plans for the force to enter without Sudanese consent.

Fifth, U.S. and allied intelligence assets, including satellite technology, should be dedicated to record any atrocities that occur in Darfur so that future prosecutions can take place. We should publicly remind Khartoum that the International Criminal Court has jurisdiction to prosecute war crimes in Darfur and that Sudanese leaders will be held personally accountable for attacks on civilians.

Finally, the United States should increase pressure on countries friendly to Khartoum -- and particularly our allies in the Arab League -- to abandon their support for Sudan's refusal to accept the U.N. force.

Some of these steps would be dramatic and difficult. But the circumstances imposed on the people of Darfur are likewise dramatic and difficult. And so would be the consequences of inaction: a humanitarian disaster that the world will in any case have to address; a massive and possibly permanent population of refugees dependent on international support; a conflict spreading to neighboring countries with prospects for settlement even more remote; and a permanent stain on our conscience.

Throughout the world, people of conscience were shocked by and ashamed of our failure to stop the genocide in Bosnia and Rwanda. We must not repeat these mistakes. In Darfur, the moment of truth is now.

John McCain is a U.S. senator from Arizona and Bob Dole was a longtime senator from Kansas and the 1996 Republican presidential nominee.

Why Genocide Matters (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

When I spoke at Cornell University recently, a woman asked why I always harp on Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0060883

It's a fair question. The number of people killed in Darfur so far is modest in global terms: estimates range from 200,000 to more than 500,000.

In contrast, four million people have died since 1998 as a result of the fighting in Congo, the most lethal conflict since World War II. And malaria annually kills one million to three million people — meaning that three years' deaths in Darfur are within the margin of error of the annual global toll from malaria.

So, yes, you can make an argument that Darfur is simply one of many tragedies and that it would be more cost-effective to save lives by tackling diarrhea, measles and malaria.

But I don't buy that argument at all. We have a moral compass within us, and its needle is moved not only by human suffering but also by human evil. That's what makes genocide special — not just the number of deaths but the government policy behind them. And that in turn is why stopping genocide should be an even higher priority than saving lives from AIDS or malaria.

Even the Holocaust amounted to only 10 percent of World War II casualties and cost far fewer lives than the AIDS epidemic. But the Holocaust evokes special revulsion because it wasn't just tragic but also monstrous, and that's why we read Anne Frank and Elie Wiesel. Teenage girls still die all the time, and little boys still starve and lose their parents — but when this arises from genocide, the horror resonates with all humans.

Or it should. But for whatever reason, Sudan's decision to kill people on the basis of tribe and skin color has aroused mostly yawns around the globe. Now Sudan is raising the stakes by starting a new military offensive in Darfur — and by eliminating witnesses.

The government charged Paul Salopek, an ace Chicago Tribune correspondent, with espionage in an effort to keep foreign reporters away (on Saturday it released him after a month in prison). And even African Union peacekeepers may be forced out of Darfur by the end of this month.

Twelve aid workers have been killed since May — more than in the previous three years. These killings are forcing aid groups to pull back, and the U.N. warns that if the humanitarian operation collapses, the result will be "hundreds of thousands of deaths." If all foreign witnesses are pushed out, the calamity is barely imaginable.

We urgently need U.N. peacekeepers, even over Sudan's objections. (If Sudan sees them coming, it will hurriedly consent.) The U.S. should also impose a no-fly zone from Chad and work with France to keep Chad and the Central African Republic from collapsing into this maelstrom.

President Bush showed an important flash of leadership on Darfur early this year, but lately he has fallen quiet again. He should appoint a special envoy for Darfur and use his bully pulpit to put genocide on the international agenda — for starters, by employing his speech to the U.N. General Assembly this month to remind the world of the children being tossed onto bonfires in Sudan. He could also announce that the U.S. will choose candidates to support for U.N. secretary general based in part on their positions on the genocide.

You can see how your member of Congress does on Darfur at www.darfurscores.org. Information about Darfur rallies next Sunday in New York and other cities worldwide is at www.savedarfur.org.

If we don't act, the slaughter may end up claiming more than one million lives, but this is about more than body count. This time the teenagers are not named Anne and Elie, but Fatima and Ahmed, but the horror is the same.

To stir up interest among young people in issues like Darfur and global poverty, I held a contest in the spring to choose a university student to take with me on a reporting trip to Africa. From 4,000 entries, I chose Casey Parks, a young woman from Mississippi who had never been outside the U.S.

We're leaving tomorrow for Equatorial Guinea. It's a backwater that has fascinated me since I first traveled through Africa in 1982 and my Lonely Planet guidebook said about it: "We've never heard of any travelers going there, so we have no details."

Casey and I then travel through remote parts of Cameroon and the Central African Republic. You can follow our journey beginning Wednesday with our daily blog entries at www.nytimes.com/kristof.

Darfur Trembles As Peacekeepers' Exit Looms (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

TAWILA, Sudan, Sept. 8 — They call this place Rwanda.

A year ago it was a collection of straw huts, hastily thrown together in the aftermath of battle, hard by the razor-wire edge of a small African Union peacekeeper base.

Today it is a tangle of sewage-choked lanes snaking among thousands of squalid shacks, an endless sprawl that dwarfs the base at its heart. Pounding rainstorms gather fetid pools that swarm with mosquitoes and flies spreading death in their filthy wake. All but one of the aid groups working here have pulled out.

DOJ_NMG_0060884

Many who live here say the camp is named for the Rwandan soldiers based here as monitors of a tattered cease-fire. But the camp's sheiks say the name has a darker meaning, one that reveals their deepest fears.

"What happened in Rwanda, it will happen here," said Sheik Abdullah Muhammad Ali, who fled here from a nearby village seeking the safety that he hoped the presence of about 200 African Union peacekeepers would bring. But the Sudanese government has asked the African Union to quit Darfur rather than hand over its mission to the United Nations. "If these soldiers leave," Sheik Ali said, "we will all be slaughtered."

Tawila and the sprawling, makeshift camp of displaced people at its edge sit astride a deadly fault line in Darfur. This small but strategic town has been the front line of some of the deadliest battles in a conflict that has killed hundreds of thousands of people and sent 2.5 million fleeing.

It is a place where a grim struggle between the government and its Arab allies, and non-Arab rebel factions, has given way to a fractured struggle that pits non-Arab tribes against one another, fanning centuries-old rivalries and setting the scene for a bloodbath of score-settling vengeance should the African Union soldiers withdraw, as demanded, at the end of this month.

Tawila is an apocalyptic postcard from the next and perhaps the grimmest chapter in Darfur's agony, a preview of the coming cataclysm in the conflict the United Nations has called the world's gravest humanitarian crisis.

Thousands of people in this squalid camp fear that their annihilation will be the final chapter in this brutal battle over land, identity, resources and power, which the Bush administration and many others have called genocide.

"We beg the international community, somebody, come and save us," Sheik Ali said. "We have no means to protect ourselves. The only thing we can do is run and hide in the mountains and caves. We will all die."

The portents of violence have become so ominous, and Sudan's stonewalling of international intervention so complete, that Kofi Annan, secretary general of the United Nations, warned last week that the Sudanese government would be "held collectively and individually responsible for what happens to the population in Darfur."

Death is no stranger here. Malaria and diarrhea course through the camp, picking off children first, then the old. There are no doctors or nurses or medicine. There is no clean water. There are no toilets or latrines. And yet the conflict, unchecked even by the presence of the African peacekeeping force, drives more people from their homes into the camp each day.

Mariam Ibrahim Omar buried her son Ismail in a graveyard near here Wednesday. She was not sure what had killed him, only that he burned with fever, heaved and vomited. She took him to a clinic run by the aid organization Relief International in town, carrying him on her back swaddled in rags, only to find its doors locked and its doctors and nurses long gone. The lone aid organization still operating here is the United Nations World Food Program, usually the last to go in even the direst situation.

"We bought medicines in the market but none of them helped him," Ms. Omar said, her face swathed in black. "He died yesterday and we buried him."

Ismail was 21 months old. They buried him in a growing graveyard on a small rise above the camp. Two bricks stood atop his grave, indicating where his tiny head lay, pointed toward Mecca, as Islamic custom demands.

Next to his fresh coverlet of earth, men in white robes dug a new pit, deep and wide, to hold the camp's latest casualty. No one was sure how old Halima Batwal was — some said 80, others 90. They dug the loose sand with shovels until they hit hard-packed earth, and then switched to pickaxes to carve a narrow trench for her slender, wasted body.

The rituals of a Muslim burial are simple, easily satisfied even by the destitute — the body must be washed, then wrapped in unbleached cloth. The men gently placed her in the trench, then stacked bricks atop the body, a makeshift crypt in a makeshift graveyard.

Ms. Batwal was from Tina, a village just a few miles away, but she had to flee when rival rebel factions clashed there this spring. Her relatives said she would have preferred to be buried nearer to home, as tradition demands. But it was too dangerous to carry her body there.

"She will have to stay here," said Adam Ali, a distant relative who teaches mathematics to children at the camp. "We have no choice."

Whether the living will remain here, too, is an open question.

A United Nations Security Council resolution authorized a force of more than 22,000 troops and police officers to take over peacekeeping duties from the African Union. But Sudan has refused to allow the new force to deploy, and it says the African Union must leave by the end of this month, when its mandate ends, if it cannot work on its own.

If the African Union troops leave, the residents of the camp say, they, too, will flee. But there are few places for them to hide — in the mountains or hundreds of miles west, across the border with Chad.

For the moment the peacekeepers are still here, the contingent of 200 Rwandan troops led by a Ghanaian lieutenant colonel named Wisdom Bleboo. But there is little they can do to help the people living in the Rwanda camp.

"People are dying here," Colonel Bleboo said. "Children are dying. They come to us thinking that we can help them, but we have no means to help them."

Similarly helpless is the sole Red Cross worker still permanently based here, a slender 29-year-old with a faint goatee named Issa Ahmed Muhammad Sraj. His job is to help families separated by the war to stay in touch.

In a dusty black nylon briefcase he carries forms that camp residents fill out to send to relatives elsewhere in Sudan, simple messages of greetings — news of weddings, births and deaths. He is originally from Tawila, but like most of its residents, he had to abandon his home and move into the camp.

He has nothing else to offer but his forms, yet residents of the camp come to him anyway with their endless problems — sick children, stolen goats, leaky huts and empty food bowls.

"I have nothing to help them, so I just explain to them, 'I am living here in the camp just like you, suffering together,' " Mr. Sraj said. "I sympathize with them and listen to them. I report back to headquarters what is happening here, but no one comes." The local Red Cross headquarters is in El Fasher, the state capital.

Aid organizations have always found Tawila a difficult place to operate in. Nestled in the foothills of the rich and fertile farmland of the Jebel Marra mountains and home to a mix of Arabs and non-Arabs, herders and farmers, it sits along a crucial livestock migration route and next to the main east-west road in Darfur, stretching from Chad to the main north-south road leading to Khartoum, the capital. Tawila is a strategic prize all sides in this increasingly complicated conflict have tried to win.

On Feb. 27, 2004, hundreds of Arab tribesmen in military uniforms attacked Tawila, led by Musa Hilal, the leader of the Arab militia known as the janjaweed.

Mr. Sraj was in his house when the assault began, but at the first crack of gunfire he fled with his family to a nearby valley, where they hid for three days.

When they returned to survey the damage, much of the town was leveled, including his house. Their furniture and livestock had been stolen, their store of grain burned. Dozens of people had been killed, and many women and girls had been raped. The attack on Tawila and its surrounding villages was to become one of the most notorious of the Darfur conflict.

Mr. Sraj fled to El Fasher, where he and his family lived in the vast Abu Shouk camp. The rebels regained control of Tawila from the Arab militias, and last year its residents started to return, planting their fields and resuming their lives.

A cease-fire agreement seemed to bring some modicum of tranquillity. Mr. Sraj came back, this time as a worker for the Red Cross.

This spring the troubles started again, this time between the non-Arab tribes that had previously been the champions of the people of this area, mostly Fur villagers who lived as farmers and Zaghawa herdsmen and traders.

The Sudanese Liberation Army, the main rebel group fighting the government for greater autonomy in Darfur, split in two along tribal lines. The two sides fought for control of this crucial territory in advance of a peace agreement with the government that one of the factions, the Zaghawa-led group, signed in May.

The peace agreement has only made things worse here. The Fur-led faction of the Sudanese Liberation Army did not sign, and violence between the factions increased. The Rwanda camp, estimated in May to have had 9,000 residents, now holds perhaps double that number.

As the battle between the factions has intensified, ethnic lines in the camp have hardened. The Fur majority is suspicious of Zaghawas, who it claims have joined with the government to oppress the Fur.

Most of the displaced people at Argo, another camp just outside Tawila, have fled to the Rwanda camp to be closer to the African Union soldiers.

Those who remain at Argo are the most destitute. Under a thorn tree in the center of the camp sit a few old men, so poor that they lack the most basic furniture for any Darfurian household — a woven plastic mat on which to sit, eat and pray. They sat on empty wheat sacks, their foreheads sprinkled with dust and gravel from praying on the naked earth.

As the men talked, a dozen women on donkeys laden with water jugs, cooking pots, sacks of grain and children approached. One woman, Leimoun Ali Ahmed, said she had fled her village, Kalma, after bandits attacked to steal her livestock. She loaded her four children on two donkeys and was headed for the Rwanda camp.

"We don't have anything so we hope they will help us there," Ms. Ahmed said, referring to international aid organizations. She had heard that food, health care and clean water were available in the Rwanda camp.

But she will find little food and none of the rest. Relief International and Save the Children pulled out after attacks on their workers and vehicles. Relief International had offered health services, but its midwives, nurses, vaccinators and nutrition counselors have been evacuated to El Fasher. A dozen aid workers have been killed since May, all of them Sudanese, so aid organizations have had to curtail their activities in many areas. A World Health Organization car traveling with the World Food Program was hijacked Thursday by rebel gunmen.

That has left hundreds of thousands of people across Darfur without food, shelter, medicine and clean water. Disease and hunger are rampant.

"It is painful to think of those I left behind," said Halima Muhammad Ahmed, a midwife who had been working for Relief International in Tawila and who is now in El Fasher, waiting to return to the expectant mothers she left. Like so many of the aid workers in Darfur, she, too, is a victim — her village, Umo, was attacked by janjaweed in March 2004.

"We only think of going back," Ms. Ahmed said. "We are helpless here."

At the Rwanda camp, babies arrive, midwife or no. In a straw hut at the edge of the camp, Hasima Abakar sat with her month-old baby, a boy she named Hamid. The birth had been hard, and she lost a lot of blood. But she was more worried about Hamid — pus oozed from his navel. Radiant with fever, he squirmed and turned away from her breast.

"I don't know my future," she said, her face blank as she gazed down at Hamid. "Only God knows."

D.C. Demonstrators Call On Bush to Press for U.N. Peacekeepers

Two years after the Bush administration said genocide had taken place in Sudan, protesters marched yesterday on the White House, demanding that the president press for U.N. peacekeepers who could halt the continuing attacks in the country's Darfur region.

The United States and other members of the Security Council have endorsed a plan for U.N. peacekeepers to replace a beleaguered force of African Union soldiers in enforcing a peace agreement signed last year. But the Sudanese government has rejected the deployment, which would be bigger and better-equipped than the African Union force.

With signs that the Sudanese government and its allied militias are preparing to step up their attacks, demonstrators said time was short for President Bush to exert U.S. influence on Sudan's president.

"We need to hurry up; we need to put pressure," Fatima Mohammed Haroun, a Sudanese activist, told a crowd of a few hundred protesters massed in Lafayette Square, across from the White House.

Fresh from a trip to see family in Darfur, Haroun said her besieged homeland is desperate for the help of the international community. "The people are just waiting for someone to come and help them," she said.

Organized by Africa Action, the rally coincided with the group's release of a report comparing the restrained U.S. response to Darfur to the Clinton administration's inaction on Rwanda as hundreds of thousands of people perished there more than a decade ago.

Almost everyone in the crowd wore a shirt with the report's title: "A Tale of Two Genocides." Underneath the title were images of two bloody handprints, one above the word Rwanda, the other above the word Darfur. And below the handprints, an assertion: "The U.S. Has the Power to Protect."

In a planned act of civil disobedience, 30 protesters carrying signs marched from Lafayette Square across Pennsylvania Avenue, where they lay down on the sidewalk outside the White House fence and held up the signs.

The protesters were arrested by U.S. Park Police to the cheers of hundreds of fellow demonstrators who watched from across Pennsylvania Avenue, chanting for their cause.

"Stop the genocide! Break the deadlock! Protect the people!" the group called out as the 30 demonstrators lay, still holding up their signs.

A poor region of Sudan, Darfur has been at war since 2003, when rebels attacked government posts, triggering a massive response by the Sudanese military and the notorious government-backed militias known as Janjaweed.

Hundreds of thousands of people have died in the war, and an estimated 2 million people have been forced from their homes. Their plight has provoked protests across the country over the past couple of years, including a large demonstration in April on the Mall.

Yesterday's protest was aimed at pushing Sudan back into the broader public conscience and onto the president's agenda two years after his secretary of state made what many thought would be a seminal statement on Sudan.

"It's been two years, and Mr. Bush hasn't done anything about it," said Emily Funigiello, 17, who traveled from the University of North Carolina in Wilmington to join the demonstration.

Her friend Melissa Salvatore, 18, said the United States and the president cannot forget what happened not so many years ago.

"We can't let what happened in Rwanda happen in Darfur."

China Urges EU To End Ban On Arms Sales (AP)

Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao urged the European Union Saturday to lift its ban on arms sales to Beijing imposed after the 1989 crackdown on pro-democracy protests in Tiananmen Square.

Beijing has lobbied repeatedly for lifting the ban, calling it a "Cold War relic." France is in favor, but others in the 25-nation EU have failed to reach agreement.

Wen told a news conference China has made significant progress in "protecting the human rights of Chinese people."

"No country can say they can resolve all the issues related to human rights perfectly," Wen said after a summit meeting with EU officials.

The European arms ban has been a sticking point in the EU's relations with Beijing and stems from China's questionable human rights record.

Wen objected to the EU's practice of linking "economic and trade issues with the so-called human rights issues."

"China attaches great importance to the issue of human rights and we identified human rights as the basic rights of the Chinese people," he said.

Wen also urged the international community not to threaten Iran with economic and other sanctions over Tehran's nuclear enrichment program.

"It is our hope that the international community ... will exercise caution on this matter and continue to work for a peaceful solution," he said.

The permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — the U.S., Britain, France, China and Russia — plus Germany have offered Iran economic incentives to persuade Tehran from enriching uranium.

Iran has ignored an Aug. 31 U.N. Security Council deadline to suspend enrichment.

The EU and China, meanwhile, agreed to step up cooperation in nonproliferation and disarmament issues and "expressed their grave concern over (North Korea's) recent multiple launch of missiles," said a final summit statement.

The two sides called for an early resumption of six-nation talks designed to resolve North Korea's standoff with its neighbors over its nuclear arms ambitions.

In those talks, South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States have tried to persuade the North to abandon its nuclear program. North Korea has refused to negotiate since November to protest a U.S. crackdown on Pyongyang's assets abroad for alleged money-laundering and counterfeiting.

Protesters Call On Taiwan's Leader To Quit (WP)

Chen Urged to Take Responsibility for Alleged Wrongdoing by Relatives, Aides

TAIPEI, Taiwan, Sept. 9 -- Tens of thousands of protesters took to the streets of Taiwan's capital Saturday demanding the resignation of President Chen Shui-bian, whose family members and close aides have been embroiled in a string of corruption scandals.

Chanting "Step down!" and wearing red, the protesters called for Chen to take responsibility for the alleged wrongdoing and resign.

Huge red balloons, some with the Chinese characters for "honor," floated above the masses of people gathered in a main street near the Presidential Office in Taipei. Organizers of the mostly peaceful rally said the protesters' numbers swelled to 200,000, but police put the figure at 70,000.

Chen, a passionate supporter of formalizing Taiwan's independence from China, has the backing of his party and pro-independence stalwarts and is unlikely to step down before his term expires in 2008.

The months-old allegations that his wife, other relatives and key aides exploited their positions for illegal financial gain have weakened his leadership. The situation has raised questions about whether Chen will have the confidence to push for formal independence for the self-ruled island of 23 million, a move China has threatened to oppose with military force.

The rally, one of the first not to be sponsored by either Chen's party or the opposition, was led by Shih Ming-teh, former chairman of Chen's ruling Democratic Progressive Party. Shih, a former mentor of Chen's, was a prisoner for more than two decades for opposing the authoritarian rule of the Nationalist Party, or Kuomintang.

Shih announced his campaign to oust Chen last month, saying he would seek support from a million people and ask each to donate about $3. He said he reached his target of $3 million in less than two weeks.

Taiwanese intellectuals who formerly supported Chen, including artists, novelists and key members of bar associations, have joined the push for his resignation.

Shih appeared before the crowd Saturday making the "thumbs down" sign. Shih, who plans to stage a sit-in outside the Presidential Office until Chen steps down, said the protest would continue indefinitely.

DOJ_NMG_0060888

Chen's son-in-law, Chao Chien-ming, was indicted on insider trading charges in July. Prosecutors are also investigating allegations that first lady Wu Shu-chen accepted millions of Taiwan dollars in gift vouchers in exchange for using her influence in a department store takeover.

The Presidential Office acknowledged in a statement Thursday that prosecutors had questioned Chen last month about the suspected use of fake receipts to account for part of secret state funds used for diplomatic activities. Chen has said that he and his wife are innocent and that no state funds went to private individuals.

Protesters said Saturday that the statement was not enough and that the president should resign.

"We hope our president can step down," said Lee Huang-ming, who works at a state-run enterprise. "He is corrupt, and his family is corrupt. He is not suited to our times."

Independent analysts said the protests could compel the judiciary to investigate the scandals more thoroughly.

Blair Warns Against Infighting, But Feud Persists (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 9 — Prime Minister Tony Blair warned Saturday that Britain's Labor Party would lose control of the government if it did not show it was "hungry for power" and halt the "irredeemably old-fashioned" personal feuds surrounding his succession.

After a week of bitter infighting and pressure from his rival and onetime ally Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair was forced Thursday to set a 12-month limit on his tenure after nine years in office.

But the feuding has continued. On Saturday, Charles Clarke, a Labor stalwart and a government minister until Mr. Blair dismissed him in May in a cabinet shuffle, said in an interview with The Daily Telegraph that Mr. Brown was an uncollegial "control freak" who had "psychological" problems with debate.

"We just don't know what he thinks on a range of issues," Mr. Clarke said. "What would his foreign policy look like? Will he pull troops out of Iraq? He wants to produce rabbits out of a hat after he becomes leader. I think he's got to produce his rabbits now. He's got to explain what his vision is."

Mr. Brown offered no public response to the attack, the second by Mr. Clarke in two days. But one Labor legislator and Brown loyalist, George Mudie, said Mr. Clarke's "abusive and offensive language" seemed to suggest an effort by Mr. Blair's supporters to discredit Mr. Brown as a potential successor. By that argument, Mr. Blair wishes to block Mr. Brown, fearing he would undo Mr. Blair's political legacy.

At a speech to the loyalist Progress research organization, Mr. Blair said "there was something irredeemably old-fashioned" about the sparring between rival camps over the past week. "The only thing we did not have is the smoke-filled rooms, and that is because we banned those," he said, referring jokingly to Britain's broad indoor smoking ban.

But, Mr. Blair said, "we are not going to win if we have personal attacks by anybody on anyone because it turns the public off and makes them think we are interested again in ourselves and not in them."

He said Labor could win a fourth term in office, "not by behaving like we did last week, but behaving like we did when we were hungry for power before 1997, when we understood that what matters is the people of the country, not ourselves."

Mr. Blair seemed relaxed and at ease among faithful followers who gave him three standing ovations before he left, heading for the Middle East on a trip likely to focus on Lebanon and the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

The speech was Mr. Blair's first since his reluctant announcement on Thursday that he would resign within 12 months. He has not specified a date, but acknowledged that "there is a stage at which it is sensible as a political leader to move on and that is just the way it is."

Mr. Blair is the first Labor leader to win three successive terms in office. He said two years ago that he would not try for a fourth election, and Mr. Brown has been pressing for a firm date for him to go.

The prime minister's less harried mood suggested that he felt the pressure had eased — if only slightly — with the spotlight now shifting to Mr. Brown, his policies and his prospects. But many in the party still seemed troubled by the high-level fighting.

"This government is becoming a wounded animal," said Diana Strongbow, a Labor Party figure who spoke during a question-and-answer session after the speech. "This has got to stop," she said of the warring camps. With young men "coming back from Afghanistan in body bags," it was an insult for politicians to go on fighting among themselves, she said.

Mr. Blair's speech seemed to persuade some loyalists that the party would survive the crisis to fight the next election, due by 2010 at the latest. "In the last few days people thought we had lost it," said Lord Clive Soley, a Labor peer who was part of the audience. "I think people will pull back."

Blair Urges Party To Stop Infighting (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0060889

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Prime Minister Tony Blair said Saturday his Labour Party risks losing the next general election if personal attacks among party members continue and the party fails to redefine itself and its goals.

Blair urged his party to stop the disputes and clearly outline its positions on complex issues such as security during the war on terrorism, immigration, pension shortfalls and global warming.

"We're not going to win if we have personal attacks by anybody on anyone," Blair said in a speech to a progressive think-tank in London.

Many party members had hoped that Blair's reluctant announcement on Thursday that he would resign within a year would quiet the bitter infighting that flared in the party last week.

But even after Blair left London for Jerusalem — where he met Saturday evening with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert — the issue refused to go away.

During a news conference with the Israeli leader, Blair was asked if he would endorse Treasury chief Gordon Brown, widely expected to be the next prime minister, as his successor.

He said he was "not going to go back into all the leadership issues" and chastised journalists for continuing to press the matter.

"I actually think it's kind of disrespectful to come here, after everything this country and this region has been through, and talk about our own internal matters," Blair said.

It is believed that Blair and Brown have reached a private understanding over the handover of power. But angry comments by Charles Clarke, formerly Britain's top law and order official, have since demonstrated how uneasy the new peace is.

In comments published Saturday in The Daily Telegraph, Clarke said Brown's "massive weakness" was that he was a "control-freak" who could not work with people and who lacked Blair's "charm."

In comments published Friday in London's Evening Standard newspaper, Clarke harshly criticized Brown for the way he handled the week's turmoil, saying that his succession as prime minister was not guaranteed.

Brown's allies have insisted he was not behind the anti-Blair plotting.

Senior party figures have publicly backed him as the next Labour leader in an effort to prevent the eventual handover of power from getting even uglier and throwing national elections expected in 2009 to a resurgent Conservative Party.

In his speech in London on Saturday, Blair said the infighting reminded him how his party's ideological disputes had kept it out of power for many years. He said the center-left party, which has been in power since 1997, could still win the next general election if it puts aside the infighting and adapts its positions on complex issues of concern to the British general public.

In a newspaper article Friday, Brown sought to ease the fears of those who worry he would veer left instead of following in Blair's centrist footsteps.

Brown praised the prime minister as courageous and promised that Britain would do whatever was necessary to battle terrorism. He said that during an upcoming trip to New York he would reaffirm to Americans that, as it did after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, Britain "stands ... shoulder to shoulder with them."

At a joint news conference with Olmert, Blair expressed his support for Olmert's decision to renew Israel's dialogue with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, despite Hamas' control of the Palestinian parliament and government.

President Bush issued a statement praising Blair's visit to Lebanon, Israel and the Palestinian territories, saying the trip is timely given the deployment of international forces in Lebanon.

"I wish him well in his efforts to promote peace and stability," he said.

Britain's Leadership Battle Years In Making (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

Tony Blair's ally and enduring rival, Gordon Brown, tired of waiting to ascend. Now he has forced the issue -- and cast Labor into chaos.

LONDON — The photographs of the two men from the old days look like weathered yearbook snapshots, two fresh-faced politicians elected together to Parliament in 1983, their hair a little too long. One of them, a young man named Tony Blair, is beaming broadly; the other, Gordon Brown, looks studious and serious.

They shared an office for a time, eventually collaborating in drafting a new vision of what Britain's Labor Party should be, marrying its old trade union, socialist traditions with market principles. When the party leadership came up for grabs in 1994, both men wanted the job. Brown, especially, thought he had earned it.

DOJ_NMG_0060890

"Basically, Brown was the senior partner. Brown had been in the party longer, had more sort of intellectual roots," said Nick Kochan, coauthor of "Gordon Brown: The First Year in Power." "Blair was Johnny-come-lately, trained as a barrister, had lots of charm and appeal and savoir-faire. Brown was rather retiring and awkward — brainy, but bad at people."

The two reportedly struck an agreement: Blair would take the party leadership — and soon, the leadership of the country — and Brown would inherit later, being granted responsibility for social and economic policymaking in the meantime.

More than a decade later, Brown tired of waiting. As chancellor of the exchequer — Britain's treasury chief — he has been one of Blair's most important allies and his most enduring rival during the prime minister's nine years in office. But he finally struck last week, forcing Blair to announce his departure within the year.

The move left the Labor Party in chaos and virtually guaranteed that Blair's final months in office would be marked by a bruising battle for leadership of the party both men helped to shape.

On Saturday, Blair appealed to the party to leave behind the vicious internal sniping of the last week and remake Labor's message to suit a changed Britain.

"There was something sort of irredeemably old-fashioned about it, I'm afraid: the attacks on the leader, the leader responds…. The only thing we didn't have was the smoke-filled room, and that's because we banned those," said Blair, whose entry into the room of party supporters was met with a standing ovation.

"We're three years away from an election, and we can remake ourselves," he said. "But we can only do it not by behaving like we did last week, but by behaving like we did when we were hungry for power, before 1997, when we understood that what mattered was the people and the country, not ourselves."

The story of Blair's last months as prime minister, like the years that preceded them, cannot be written without reference to his relationship with Brown, the brooding and brilliant son of a Scottish minister who both guided Blair's Britain to economic vigor and waited resentfully in Blair's shadow for the day he would be allowed to lead.

The political fortunes of Britain for years have depended on the interplay between these two powerful politicians who have worked closely together for two decades, sometimes while barely speaking to each other.

"Each of them and their acolytes spilling bile into the media [about each other] is pretty much normal behavior for them," said Tony Travers, a professor of politics at the London School of Economics.

"At one level, they're like an elderly married couple who kind of hover between a sort of final divorce, which would shock everybody, and occasionally getting back together and everything's fine. There's an element of can't live with and can't live without each other," Travers said.

The marriage of opposites seemed to work. After Blair became prime minister in 1997, Brown proceeded to take expert command of the economy, handing over responsibility for interest-rate setting to the Bank of England and charting nine years of steady growth, while Blair focused on high-profile foreign policy initiatives and plunged into overhauling healthcare and education.

But well into his third term as prime minister, Blair had steadily refused to either step aside or set a date for when he planned to, leaving Brown, aides said, feeling frustrated and betrayed — all the more so as the party's poll numbers plummeted in the face of Blair's increasingly unpopular alliance with the U.S. on the war in Iraq.

Brown's supporters have been urging him to launch an attack on Blair for months. Blair's backers warned that attacking the sitting prime minister of a successful party 16 months after he had been reelected would amount to political suicide for all involved.

"Blair's star has really waned, ever since the end of the [initial phase of the Iraq] war and the failure to find any weapons of mass destruction. And yet each time it seemed to me there was a moment where Brown might have moved, he stood back," Kochan said.

Even last week, he said, Brown fell short of demanding Blair's immediate resignation, although reports have circulated of a private deal under which Blair would step down in the spring.

"Sometimes I think maybe the reason he doesn't go for it is he's not totally convinced that he's a natural leader," Kochan said. "Is Brown really convinced he'd be the right prime minister?"

Blair has never been troubled by such doubts, and even in the current crisis, with his party threatening open revolt, he has not been cowed, say those who know him. To the contrary, they said, Blair thrives on high drama.

"His adrenaline flows in helpful ways in his body. It's fight and fight, not fight-or-flight," said Anthony Seldon, headmaster of Wellington College and one of Blair's biographers. "He also has a kind of Zen personality whereby he is able to be remarkably positive about events. To a remarkable degree, he is able to let things go and live in the present, without being dogged by regret. He just bounces back."

In the end, Blair appears to have a kind of toughness, even ruthlessness, that Brown lacks, say many who know Blair. And he is buoyed in the current showdown, some suggested, by caring less about the consequences of the infighting.

DOJ_NMG_0060891

"For Gordon Brown, the longer this civil war goes on, the more likely it is that Labor will lose the election. From Tony Blair's point of view, it's much less of a problem. Because the worst that could happen from his point of view is that Labor loses the election, and that in turn would suggest that he, Tony Blair, had been the magic ingredient that had won all the elections before," Travers said.

"And it is just possible, although the Blairites would aggressively deny it, that Tony Blair thinks [Conservative Party leader] David Cameron might be a better long-term successor as prime minister than some of the Labor candidates on offer."

Yet policy differences between Blair and Brown are not substantial. Both place greater value on transatlantic relations than on those with Europe.

"Brown will want to maintain the traditional British alliance with the U.S., and while he probably will not think the current policy on Iraq is sensible, until there is a change of U.S. presidents he won't be able to do much," said Patrick Dunleavy, a professor at the London School of Economics.

In general, Brown is thought to be to the left of Blair, more at home with labor-movement roots and slightly less committed to market-based solutions for base-line public services, including healthcare.

But because of the ghost of the Blair-Brown feud, the upcoming leadership contest will involve personalities as much as policy. Some Labor deputies have acknowledged reservations about whether Brown is up to the job, or have suggested, as Labor deputy Meg Hillier has, that Brown would need a good running mate.

"Politics is about communicating," Hillier said. "Brown is very warm one-to-one, but you need someone who can go out and talk the language that people can understand on the street."

Please Don't Hire Tony Blair (WP)

By James Forsyth

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

Things must be pretty bad for a trip to the West Bank town of Ramallah to seem like a chance to get away from it all. But that is where British Prime Minister Tony Blair -- hounded at home by his own party -- headed this weekend.

America's top defender abroad spent last week pulling knives out of his back, front and sides. Critics within his party insisted that he should announce the date of his resignation-- a move that would make Blair not just a lame duck but a legless one. His statement on Thursday that he would be gone by this time next year isn't enough: The rebels want a precise timetable. Even former Blair loyalists have collected signatures for letters imploring him to stand aside.

One small consolation for the prime minister: He won't be short of job offers once he takes early retirement. As long ago as 2001, the then-popular P.M. mused to the Sunday Telegraph about how "lucky" he was that he'll "get out before my working life is over. I'll have time to do something else."

That something else is likely to be on this side of the Atlantic, where Blair is in greater demand than back home and would probably earn more money -- a real concern for a man who likes the good life and must pay off a mortgage on a $6 million London townhouse. Indeed, if the London papers and rumor mills are to be believed, establishment Washington institutions such as the Carlyle Group or Georgetown University -- where Blair delivered a major foreign-policy speech in May -- could be seeking his services.

But American institutions should issue a moratorium -- a long one -- on hiring Blair. Yes, America's best friend has stood by the nation in times of war and controversy. But for that very reason, the U.S. national interest would be better served if Blair remained in Britain, where his reputation will steadily recover after he steps down, and where he could continue to make the case for the values that unite the two nations.

If Blair takes a big-bucks job over here, he will join a long line of world leaders whose support for American values has landed them in U.S. universities or think tanks. It must be nice to have friendly foreigners on hand to lionize U.S. virtues, but this pro-American brain drain is a luxury the United States can't afford as it wages a battle of ideas worldwide.

As Washington looks south at a rising tide of Hugo ChÃ¡vez-led populism, it must rue the fact that two of Latin America's most high-profile supporters of free markets now reside at U.S. universities. Former Brazilian president Fernando Henrique Cardoso, who tamed his country's inflation and transformed its economy, is now a professor at Brown University. And after serving as Mexico's budget secretary and president during the 1990s, U.S. ally Ernesto Zedillo returned to Yale, his alma mater, to direct its center on globalization. Similarly, as U.S. policymakers contemplate how India's intransigence contributed to the recent failure of the World Trade Organization to reduce trade barriers, they must wonder whether Indian free-trade guru and economist Jagdish Bhagwati could have tilted the balance back home if he still lectured at the Indian Statistical Institute or the Delhi School of Economics rather than Columbia University.

Consider the debate over Muslim radicalization in Europe. The Dutch-Somali politician Ayaan Hirsi Ali -- famous as a writer for the documentary "Submission," about the role of women in Islam -- was making the provocative but important argument that, in the Netherlands, Dutch values should trump Islamic ones when they come into conflict. But now she's at Washington's American Enterprise Institute. And former Spanish prime minister JosÃ© MarÃ-a Aznar -- who sent his country's troops to Iraq despite deep resistance at home -- isn't spending his time in Europe debating the merits of U.S. policy; instead, he's a scholar at Georgetown and sits on the board of Rupert Murdoch's News Corp.

Hiring friendly foreigners not only cuts them out of the debate in their own countries, but also taints their reputations back home, as former Harvard academic Michael Ignatieff is learning. Ignatieff is running for the Liberal Party leadership in his native Canada, where he supports involvement in the fight against terrorism and ridicules anti-Americanism as the "patriotism of fools." In short, Ignatieff is as good as Washington can get as the leader of Canada's left-wing party.

But his political opponents are using the time he spent south of the border against him. "Michael Ignatieff wants to be prime minister of our country," columnist Paul Wells wrote in the Canadian newsweekly Macleans last week. "And just in case I'm not being clear, I mean Canada ." The many years Ignatieff spent in England don't generate anywhere near as much attention as his five-year stint as a professor in Cambridge, Mass., illustrating people's sensitivity to the notion of their leaders being seduced by the Yankee dollar -- or corrupted by superpower values.

U.S. institutions should not, obviously, bar their doors to foreigners. American universities, in particular, generate goodwill toward the United States; those who spend a few years studying here are more likely to return home and foster empathy for the American predicament. In the short term, however, even the most precocious Fulbrighters are unlikely to reshape their countries' attitudes toward the United States. Leading pro-American politicians and intellectuals from abroad are a rare commodity -- one that shouldn't be wasted here on the homefront.

The United States must export more pro-Americans than it imports. Maybe it's time to round up all these sympathetic foreigners -- and send them home.

Trade Ministers Vow To Break Log Jam (AP)

By Michael Astor, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 10, 2006

Developing nations on Saturday called on rich countries to restart global trade talks, saying the suspension of negotiations not only threatened the current round of discussions but also the multilateral trading system itself.

The Doha Round — named after the Qatari capital where they were started in 2001 — is aimed at slashing trade barriers across the planet. But the Doha talks stalled in July over the question of rich nations' subsidies for agriculture. The meeting here was the first since the World Trade Organization discussions faltered.

Developing nations are demanding greater market access for their agricultural products while developed nations complain of barriers in emerging markets for their industrialized goods and services.

"Not only is the round threatened, but the multilateral trading system itself now faces a serious crisis," said the statement issued by the emerging market nations of the Group of 20. "This is an unacceptable situation for all developing countries."

The trade representatives from nearly 30 nations seemed determined to plow ahead even though neither side seemed prepared to give much ground.

"The simple fact that we are meeting here demonstrates our engagement with the negotiations," Brazil's Foreign Minister Celso Amorim said. "We are living a unique moment where developing companies are saying, 'We need more access and less restrictions. Failure is simply not an option.'"

Analysts said the presence of U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson, WTO chief Pascal Lamy and Japanese Agriculture Minister Shoichi Nakagawa was a positive sign but that gaps between the two groups would be difficult to bridge. The four will meet with G-20 members Sunday.

Philippe de Pontet, an analyst with the Eurasia Group consulting firm, said that an immediate resumption of talks was unrealistic.

"More plausible would be a return to the negotiating table in November or early December," he said.

But the G-20 statement made clear developing nations were unlikely to back off their key demands developed nations do away with agricultural subsidies and tariff barriers for their farm products.

"Most of the world's poor make their living out of agriculture. Their livelihood and standards of living are seriously jeopardized by subsidies and market access barriers prevailing in international agricultural trade," the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0060893

Powerful farm lobbies in the United States, Europe and Japan, however, oppose an end to subsidies, which they fear will leave them unable to compete with the flood of cheap imports.

Indian Commerce Minister Kamal Nath said it was up to the developed countries to take the lead in talks.

U.S. trade representative Schwab said she was trying to take that lead.

"I am actively seeking a new way forward for the Doha Round," Schwab said in statement.

Supporters say a successful round will boost the global economy and lift poor countries out of misery. But opponents contend a binding WTO trade treaty will simply reap more profits for multinational companies while virtually enslaving workers in developing nations.

The entire process is rapidly running out of time because President Bush's authority to "fast track" the trade deal expires in mid-2007. The fast-track mechanism enables U.S. envoys to negotiate an agreement that can be submitted to Congress for a yes-or-no vote without amendments.

The G-20, formed in 2003, includes Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, China, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paraguay, the Philippines, South Africa, Tanzania, Thailand, Uruguay, Venezuela and Zimbabwe.

Montenegro Votes, With Post-Serbia Path Unclear (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

PODGORICA, Montenegro, Sept. 9 — Montenegrins vote in parliamentary elections on Sunday and few have any doubts who will be the winner. For 15 years, Prime Minister Milo Djukanovic, the longest-serving political leader in the Balkans, has dominated Montenegrin politics and is likely to continue to do so after the votes are counted late Sunday night.

Buoyed by electoral success in May, when referendum voters backed Mr. Djukanovic's call for Montenegro to split from Serbia and form an independent state, his two-party alliance is expected to win about 45 percent of the vote to fill the 81-seat Parliament, according to recent polling.

The margin of that expected victory will dictate the exact shape of the next government. But the real mystery is how Mr. Djukanovic — whose career was initially defined by making an alliance with the Yugoslavian leader Slobodan Milosevic and was later enhanced by breaking it — will choose to lead this country into a future seemingly free of the baggage of the former Yugoslavia.

In what has turned out to be a lackluster campaign compared with the emotional independence vote, Mr. Djukanovic has portrayed his coalition as an inevitable choice and the one best-suited to lead Montenegro to full membership in the European Union.

The Parliamentary election is "the second leg of the match we played up to May 21," he told supporters last month, referring to the May independence referendum. "After winning back our home at the referendum, at these elections we should pick a responsible caretaker."

But while he has emphasized that Montenegro is free to redefine itself, diplomats and experts here say it will have a tough time doing so, in part because of Mr. Djukanovic himself.

His tenacious hold on power — indeed, few here seemed shocked that his repeated promises to step down before this vote have gone unfulfilled — has contributed to the challenges still facing this state of 650,000 people.

Montenegro's tiny size has raised a question over its capacity to complete the complex and highly technical application process for the European Union. There are, for example, no precise figures on the number of government employees.

Vanja Calovic, the executive director of a group that is lobbying for government and administrative overhaul, said, "We are a really small country, so we have a few government employees, and on the other side our system of education does not prepare people do their jobs sufficiently well."

Montenegro's involvement in organized crime has earned it one of the worst reputations in the Balkans.

Mr. Djukanovic's government has long been at the center of corruption allegations, and it was named in a European lawsuit against American tobacco makers alleging collusion in cigarette smuggling.

Philip Morris agreed to pay $ 1.25 billion over 12 years in an out-of-court settlement with the European Union in July 2004, with the money earmarked for helping to crack down on the smuggling.

Mr. Djukanovic himself faces an arrest warrant in Italy, brought by a court there in 2004 in connection with the smuggling. He dismisses the charges as politically motivated.

DOJ_NMG_0060894

After he aligned himself with Western countries pitted against Mr. Milosevic and Serbia, little international pressure was initially brought against him to end the illicit trade, which was seen by some as a crucial source of revenue for the country.

Although the recent European pressure seems to have reduced the smuggling, opposition politicians charge that Mr. Djukanovic and his allies have grown rich while in power and have little interest in real economic reform.

"Djukanovic is directly linked to the financial oligarchy in Montenegro," said Nejbojsa Medojevic, the leader of the Movement for Changes, a new opposition party that has campaigned on an anticorruption platform. "Their interests are opposed to European standards. If Djukanovic wins the elections, E.U. integration will go very, very slowly."

In a twist to the Parliamentary election campaign, a state prosecutor announced Thursday an investigation into Mr. Medojevic's purchase of an apartment in Podgorica. Mr. Medojevic — who polls show is one of Montenegro's most popular politicians but is unlikely to win enough votes to rival Mr. Djukanovic — said the inquiry was designed to discredit him before the vote on Sunday.

Others suggest that corruption in Montenegro is no worse than in any other Balkan nation. Croatia and Macedonia are beset by similar problems, said James Lyon, an analyst with the International Crisis Group, and each of those countries already has European Union candidate status.

Spain To Monitor Senegalese Coast (NYT/AFP)

By AFP

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

MADRID, Sept. 9 — Spain said Saturday that it would send planes to scan the coast of Senegal for migrants trying to sail to Europe, in a bid to stem a flood of illegal immigration from Africa to its shores.

Spain's interior minister, Alfredo Pérez Rubalcaba, announced the measure after a meeting on Friday with his Senegalese counterpart Ousmane Ngom and after 90 migrants landed overnight in a vessel on Tenerife, a Spanish island.

They were the latest of more than 22,000 illegal arrivals on Spanish soil from Africa this year. Many of the migrants have landed on the Canary Islands, a Spanish-held archipelago north of Senegal off the Moroccan coast. They often risk death, traveling in small boats, to enter Spain in hopes of finding work in Europe.

Spain and Senegal also agreed to bolster the measures in place on the Canaries to identify people arriving from Senegal, one of the main countries of origin for the wave of migrants.

The two countries signed an agreement in August for Senegal to discourage people from migrating and providing logistical help for Spain to monitor the African country's coasts.

Senegal's president, Abdoulaye Wade, criticized Spain on Thursday for what he described as its government's slowness to send adequate patrols to Senegal.

Rescue services estimate that 550 people may have died this year in unsuccessful attempts to reach the Canaries.

Ownership In Cuba Becomes Hot Issue (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 10, 2006

With democratization possible, exiles wonder whether they'd get back the land seized decades ago -- and how, if it all, they'd be compensated.

MIAMI — In the 1950s, when Alberto Beguiristain's family owned 130,000 acres of farmland, two sugar mills and a distillery in Cuba, their 5,000 employees earned an average of $6 a day.

Now, at the dilapidated mill in Quemado de Guines that is the sole Beguiristain enterprise still functioning, it takes the average laborer almost a month to earn $6.

Beguiristain, who now lives in Miami, says he thinks his former countrymen would welcome his return to run what's left of the family business if the ailing Fidel Castro dies and Cubans turn toward a democratic government and pro-market economy.

"My cousin went back to our hometown a few years ago," the 74-year-old insurance agent recalled. Outside the mill gates, the travelers encountered some elderly peasants. "They told her, 'We need your people. When are you coming back?' "

The question of who will own what in a post-Castro Cuba has been an intoxicating subject here since the July 31 news of the president's surgery and temporary transfer of power to his brother Raul.

But few are as optimistic as Beguiristain that the question could be resolved cleanly and simply.

Beguiristain is one of more than 150,000 Cubans who initially fled the 1959 revolution that brought Fidel Castro's guerrillas to power. Each family stripped of its property for alleged collaboration with the deposed regime of Fulgencio Batista was usually allowed to take only $5 and the clothes they were wearing.

DOJ_NMG_0060895

Many of the exiles have kept tabs on their properties through friends who visit the island, or, like Beguiristain, from the Google Earth program that allows them to see satellite images on the Internet. There they get a glimpse of the time, money and energy needed for restoration.

It has been nearly half a century since Castro's revolutionaries took control of the Cuban economy. Factories were put under state management, farmland handed to cooperatives, and elegant houses carved up into small apartments and doled out to the poor.

The Communist government settled claims early on with most foreign investors, though not with U.S. owners. There are about 6,000 claims valued at nearly $8 billion registered with the U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

But the vast majority of property seized in the name of Castro's revolution was from Cuban owners, large and small. Though original owners are dying, some survive on dreams of recovering family homes, replanting gardens or rebuilding businesses opened by their ancestors.

Cuban American lawyer Nicolas Gutierrez, whose family was one of the wealthiest in Cuba before the revolution, estimates that at least $100 billion in property was taken from Cuban owners.

Although there is no formal registry of Cuban claims, Gutierrez estimates that at least 2 million people on the island or in exile may have the right, as original owners or their heirs, to claim seized assets or compensation if Cuba is democratized.

"Restitution is not only a pro-exile policy, it's a pro-Cuban policy. Most former property owners are still on the island," said Gutierrez, who was born in Miami to exile parents. "We want everyone to get what they lost."

Cuba has the advantage of learning from the mistakes and successes of new democracies in Eastern Europe, said Tania C. Mastrapa, a Miami consultant on foreign property claims who did her doctoral dissertation on ownership resolution in those post-Communist countries.

How quickly any restitution or compensation program could be enacted in Cuba depends on when and what kind of change occurs, Mastrapa said.

Flocks of former owners have descended on Mastrapa's practice in recent weeks, newly encouraged that political change is coming in Cuba because of the illness and incapacitation of 80-year-old Castro.

"I try to get my clients to hope for the best but to expect the worst," she said.

Even if transition is swift and thorough, a Communist-controlled judiciary will probably still be in power during the crucial early days — and therefore in charge of administering privatization and setting terms for resolving multiple claims and ethical conflicts.

In Eastern Europe, private ownership has been restored with an array of privatization, restitution and compensation programs.

In Latvia, residential property that had been seized from owners after the 1940 Soviet takeover was occupied — sometimes for decades — by other families.

The new Latvian government crafted a seven-year property ownership transition period after the country broke from the Soviet Union in 1991, leaving original owners and occupants to negotiate rents or buyouts and providing arbitration for the few irreconcilable cases.

Mastrapa conducted an informal survey of Cuban exiles with property claims. She said she was surprised to learn that most would be willing to accept some other form of compensation if their property was irreparable or being used for a socially redeeming purpose. Only 23% insisted on restitution.

Over the years, Cuba's government has equated any steps toward capitalism with an invasion of property-grabbing exiles. Some exiles with more recent experience of life on the island warn that the property issue is hypersensitive and that owners should come to terms with their losses.

"It's a page in ancient history, and it would be sheer madness from the political standpoint to be making claims," said Domingo Amuchastegui, a former Cuban intelligence official who defected in 1994.

Restoring private property and settling outstanding claims are among the transitional issues addressed in the 2004 report by the U.S. Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba, which lays out over nearly 450 pages Washington's priorities for rebuilding democratic and free-market institutions in Cuba.

Amuchastegui criticized the Bush administration report as presumptuously advising Cubans on what reforms they should undertake, and he warned that it fed into the Castro regime's propaganda meant to frighten Cubans about change.

"The U.S. government, if requested by a transition Cuban government, could help establish a structure for addressing property expropriations," the report says, detailing a legal and judicial process for Cubans to follow.

Cuban American social leaders agree the issue is delicate and divisive.

"Cuban exiles are not going to go back and boot people out of their homes," said Alfredo Mesa, executive director of the Cuban American National Foundation.

DOJ_NMG_0060896

Attorney Gaston Cantens represents the Fanjul family, which lost sugar mills, farmland and homes in Cuba but rebuilt in Palm Beach County into Florida Crystals, the state's largest sugar producer. Cantens says that recovering property is "in the back of everyone's mind," but that most exiles are more focused on seeing democracy brought to their native land.

Recalling the Eastern European success in restoring property, Cantens added: "I can't imagine in Cuba there is not going to be a similar process. But I don't think you're going to have people knocking on doors saying, 'This is my home, you've got to leave.' "

Still, it remains uncertain whether, when and what kind of change is ahead for Cuba — a Western-style democracy, the Chinese model or some hybrid.

Though most former owners are in their 70s or older, they refuse to concede that they are unlikely to live to see their properties returned to them.

That hope dies last is evident in the long-nurtured dreams of exiles like Beguiristain to once again see the land of their birth and the backdrop of their youth.

Beguiristain, who moves slowly and with a cane after knee surgery this year, said that he would never displace Cubans from the residential properties his family lost but that he would eagerly return to a free Cuba to try to breathe life into his family's dying businesses.

"I hope that it is in my lifetime," he said with a dejected glance at his swollen leg. "I think once it gets going, it's going to be almost immediately. Once they get an elected government, they'll need to reconstruct everything."

He's ready to leave his spacious home and the comforts he built for himself and his family to be part of that reconstruction, he said, noting that his son's power boat is gassed up and ready to depart for Havana at the first sign from either government that U.S. investment is welcome on the island.

Reason On Holiday In Mexico (WP)

By Ruben Navarrette Jr.

The Washington Post, September 10, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- The long wait is over in Mexico, where the top electoral court has declared a winner in a presidential election held two months ago. The hope is that things will calm down.

Don't bet on it.

Having lost the election, a left-wing populist with a flair for the dramatic labels his opponents "criminals" and vows to set up a shadow government.

About 150 equally dramatic legislators in Congress take control of the podium and prevent the sitting president from delivering his final state-of-the-nation address. In the streets, protesters throw rocks and bottles at police and stage sit-ins at makeshift shantytowns.

Who needs a presidential address? The state of the nation is obvious: Mexico has gone mad.

More so than usual, I mean. Our neighbor to the south is no model of stability. If that were the case, it wouldn't be hemorrhaging its best people -- the daring young men and women whose optimism leads them north in search of a better wage. There wouldn't be polls showing that nearly half of Mexicans would migrate to the United States if they could.

Still, economic instability is one thing. Political turmoil is a whole different headache. As long as the issue has a binational dimension to it, Mexican elites can dodge accountability by spinning it as Mexico vs. the United States. Concerned that Mexico can't provide opportunities for its people? What you should be concerned about, the elites say, is how los americanos treat your sons and daughters in el norte .

With political turmoil, there is no place to hide. It is Mexico vs. Mexico -- in this case, middle-class Mexico vs. poor Mexico.

Never mind the rich. They're yesterday's news. They still have resources, but their candidates don't have the popular support to win elections without dealing from the bottom of the deck. The party that many of them backed, the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), came in third in the presidential race, lost seats in Congress and teeters on the brink of extinction.

The real struggle is between those in the middle class who are afraid to lose what they have earned and the poor who have nothing to lose.

A few months ago, before Mexican voters went to the polls on July 2 to select a new president, I suggested that Mexico needed a revolution. I also said that such a thing would never come to pass if pro-business conservative Felipe CalderÃ³n got more votes than left-wing populist AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador.

I was one for two. I was right that Mexico needs a revolution; the poor have had enough of being swindled and preyed upon -- first by the rich and then by the middle class. In fact, the poor are so accustomed to this sort of treatment that it's easy to see why they have taken to the streets. But I was wrong that a CalderÃ³n victory would preserve the status quo. Instead, that victory -- and how it came to be -- may just send the country into a tailspin.

Which is not to say that LÃ³pez Obrador was the better choice. Just take a look at his loco behavior since the election, and you'll see: He's not ready for prime time.

After the initial count showed CalderÃ³n winning by about 243,000 votes out of 41 million ballots cast, LÃ³pez Obrador called for a full recount. Election officials granted a partial one.

There was nothing wrong with LÃ³pez Obrador's asking for a recount. It was a close election. Wrong was when he went on television before the recount was completed and unilaterally declared himself the president-elect. Wrong was when he accused his political opponents -- including CalderÃ³n -- of orchestrating a coup d'etat and then charged that Mexico's electoral tribunal had gone along with it. Wrong was when LÃ³pez Obrador called for democracy and then wiped his feet on the democratic outcome when it didn't go his way.

Poor CalderÃ³n. He has an uphill climb. The first goal of his presidency has to be to convince the poor and the disaffected that they have a voice and he's listening to it. The president-elect can also expect to battle rival factions in Congress.

That includes those feisty legislators from LÃ³pez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) who caused the scene last week by preventing Mexican President Vicente Fox from speaking. The lawmakers said they were protesting voter fraud and the theft of an election.

The protest wasn't supposed to happen. CalderÃ³n's supporters had hoped that the PRD would part ways with LÃ³pez Obrador over his antics and concentrate on building on its significant gains in Congress.

That approach makes sense. It is practical and reasonable and mature, which explains why some Mexicans want nothing to do with it.

Turkey At The Tipping Point (NYT)

The New York Times, September 10, 2006

After a Kurdish group claimed responsibility for a series of recent bombings in Turkey that killed three civilians and injured many others, the United States appointed a retired Air Force general and former NATO commander, Joseph Ralston, to work with Turkish authorities. General Ralston will be responsible for coordinating American antiterrorist efforts with Iraq and Turkey, both of which have sizable Kurdish minorities — and minorities within those minorities who have resorted to terror.

The Turkish foreign ministry hailed the appointment as a “new opportunity” for cooperation between the United States and Turkey.

The United States would be wise to create many more and varied opportunities to engage with Turkey, a longtime ally, and a uniquely important one. Turkey is a predominantly Muslim, secular democracy, situated between Europe and the Middle East. After years of trying to make amends for having suppressed its Kurdish population, often brutally, Turkey has seen violence resume of late. The United States needs to frankly acknowledge that instability in Iraq, on Turkey’s southeast border, has fomented instability in Turkey. That morally obligates the United States to help with corrective action.

Equally important, a renewed focus on Turkey is in the United States’ self interest. Last week, the nonprofit German Marshall Fund of the United States released the results of its annual survey of public opinion in the United States and 12 countries in Europe, including Turkey. The survey’s most striking finding is the degree to which Turks now question their ties to the United States and Europe, and have warmed to Iran, their neighbor to the east.

The discontent appears anchored in Turks’ overwhelming disapproval of President Bush’s handling of international affairs and growing disapproval of European Union leadership. Both are manifest in waning Turkish support for the institutions that have bound Turkey to the West. Though Turkey has been a staunch NATO member since 1952, only 44 percent of Turks in this year’s survey agreed that NATO was essential for Turkey’s security, versus 52 percent in 2005. Even though Turkey opened official membership talks with the European Union last year — after strenuous efforts to meet the union’s criteria — only 54 percent of Turks now view membership as a good thing, versus 73 percent in 2004.

As Turks see it, their support over decades for the West and for democracy has been rewarded with severe regional tension brought on by the United States, and by a cold shoulder, particularly from France and Austria, ever since Turkey qualified for European Union accession talks.

The appointment of General Ralston may help the United States to re-engage with Turkey, though ending Kurdish violence and tensions requires mainly political solutions. The United States can also help to keep Turkey’s aspiration to join the European Union on track, by advocating more openly for resolution of the division of Cyprus between Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

The United States must not ever take Turkey for granted.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Seeks To Boost Support For War Against Terrorism With 9/11 Commemorative Events. President Bush's efforts to boost pubic support for the global war against terrorism as the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks approach were analyzed in a number of prominent national newspapers Saturday morning. While the White House has signaled the 9/11 commemorative events will be non-partisan, Bush's efforts were framed in political terms.

The New York Times (9/9, A1 Sanger, Stolberg, 1.21M) in a front page story describes it as a "carefully calibrated strategy" and quotes presidential counselor Dan Bartlett saying, "You can never turn back the clock. … But we knew that news organizations and everyone else would be using this moment to define where we were five years later, and the president wanted to articulate his view, too." While the White House has downplayed the politics of Bush's 9/11 activities, "it is impossible to separate remembrance and politics" and GOP strategists "say the critical question is whether Mr. Bush still holds the power to alter the course of national conversation away from the Iraq war and back to the theme that has worked for them before, countering direct threats to the United States." Yet "there is another, related question as well: whether Republicans can succeed again in convincing the nation that Democrats cannot be trusted with keeping it safe." The Times notes, "The White House has signaled its intentions on that score and appears to be pivoting to a more openly political phase of its strategy, in which the administration and its allies will try to undermine the Democrats."

Similarly focusing on the political angle, the Washington Times (9/9, Dinan, 88K) in an article titled "Bush Resets Political Debate With Demands For Action" notes Bush garnered "top headlines three days in a row as he dropped several political hot potatoes into Congress' lap and demanded action this month." He "has honed in on one overriding message: Democrats can either join Republicans to pass bipartisan bills or they can try to block them and see how that plays in November." Bush " tried to put a face on the terrorists, asked Congress to approve his terrorist wiretapping program and announced he has transferred 14 top terrorists from CIA custody to the Defense Department. He called on Congress to authorize military commissions to try them." White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "That is the No. 1 priority right now."

And the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Dreazen, 2.03M) in an article titled "Bush 9/11 Tour Aims To Bolster Republicans" reports the Administration hopes Bush's trip to the 9/11 sites "can once more lift Republicans to victory." The Journal states, "With the Republican majorities in Congress endangered by economic uncertainty and public fury over the war in Iraq, the White House is striving to remind voters of its response to Sept. 11 -- part of a broader assertion that Republicans take the terrorist threat more seriously than Democrats do and are better prepared to defend against it." While the White House says Bush "will make the Sept. 11 commemorations as apolitical as possible by not giving prepared remarks, Bush's aides "believe terrorism remains a winning political issue for Republicans In recent meetings with lobbyists and political operatives, White House strategist Karl Rove and White House political director Sara Taylor said that Mr. Bush and other top administration officials would make regular reference to Mr. bin Laden and the threat posed by Islamic extremists in the eight weeks that remain until the elections, according to several of those in attendance."

Taking a more neutral tone in its coverage of President Bush's commemoration of the 9/11 attacks the Washington Post (9/9, A4, Asthana, Fletcher, 748K) notes, "The anniversary of the deadliest terrorist attack in the nation's history also will inspire a brief moment of bipartisan comity. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) will be among those joining Bush at the Pentagon ceremony. That evening congressional leaders from both parties will lead a commemoration of the national tragedy with speeches, a moment of silence and patriotic songs from the steps of the Capitol."

Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (9/9, Gerstenzang, 918K) notes, "The speech Monday evening will be the fifth address in 12 days Bush will have delivered on terrorism and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The previous speeches have delineated his policies, setting out markers that differentiate them from those of Democrats, without naming the opposition party." But "Snow said the speech Monday 'is not something where we're trying to draw bright lines to separate Democrats from Republicans.'" Snow said, "Bush would try to draw on the way the country responded to the attacks, which Snow said was 'nothing short of sensational, and it's something that could only have happened in this country.'"

And the AP (9/9) briefly notes White House press secretary Tony Snow's characterization of Bush's 9/11 activities. He "said Bush's address would not be a political speech or a charge to Congress for action. Rather, he said, it would be reflective of what Sept. 11 has meant and 'how we move ahead as a country in making use of the lessons of Sept. 11.. … It will have a note of optimism as well as sobriety about what we've been through."

Bush Confident US Public United In Support Of Winning War. Describing President Bush as confident and resolute the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush on Iraq he "is a bit reflective, if also insistent about the costs of failure. 'I'm not surprised that this war has created consternation amongst the American people,' he concedes. 'The enemy has got the capacity to take -- got the willingness to take innocent life and the capacity to do so, knowing full well that those deaths and that carnage will end up on our TV screens. So the American people are now having to adjust to a new kind of bloody war. … Now, my view of the country is this: Most people want us to win. There are a good number who say, get out now. But most Americans are united in the concept -- of the idea of winning.'" Asked why "both Iraq and his larger antiterror policies have become so politically polarized. 'Well, first of all, I do believe there's a difference between the political rhetoric out of Washington and what the citizens feel. … But this is a different kind of war. In the past, there was troop movements, or, you know, people could report the sinking of a ship. This is a war that requires intelligence and interrogation within the law from people who know what's happening. … Victories you can't see. But the enemy is able to create death and carnage that tends to define the action."

Bush Losing Support Among "Security Moms". NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 6, 2:55, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, Among suburban voters, what a difference two years makes. In the summer of 2004, according to one poll, the President's job approval rating among married women with children, security moms, stood at 52%. Now it's fallen 12 points, just 40% approval. The concern that the President's plunging popularity will hurt Republicans this fall."

Poll Shows US Public Remains Concerned About Terrorist Attacks. ABC World News (9/8, story 3, 0:25, Gibson) reported, "With the fifth anniversary of 9/11 approaching, we have a new poll tonight, which shows the attacks are still having a profound effect on Americans. According to the ABC News survey, seven in ten Americans still think about the attacks regularly. And nearly eight in ten say the attacks changed their outlook in a lasting way. Giving many a sense of insecurity and vulnerability. Two other numbers to mention -- 55% believe the US is safer now than before 9/11. But only 38% say the government is doing all it can to prevent another attack."

Chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos on ABC World News (9/8, story 4,1:40, Gibson) said the poll shows concerns about a terrorist attack are "number five right now" on the list of top issues after "the economy, behind health care, behind rising gas prices. But this shows it has a deep cultural impact. Almost everyone, 95% of Americans know where they were at the moment of attack." Stephanopoulos added, "Women tend to think more about 9/11. And to worry more that it's going to happen again. And as you said, 55% of Americans think we're safer right now. But that masks a deep partisan divide. Almost 40 points, 76% of Republicans think we're safer. Only 39% of Democrats."

Bush's Focus On War On Terror Said To Risk Reminding Voters Of "Failures." In an analysis piece for the AP (9/9) Tom Raum writes, "President Bush is casting the war on global terrorism as the central issue of the midterm elections. But it's a risky political strategy. The approach carries reminders of failures in Iraq, prisoner treatment at Guantanamo Bay, warrantless wiretapping at home and Osama bin Laden's endurance abroad. … Democrats were quick to portray the president's recent statements — including his acknowledgment Wednesday of a secret CIA prison system and the movement of 14 high-profile detainees to Guantanamo — as an admission of failure."

Democrats Attack Bush Counter Terrorism Policies. The Washington Times (9/9, Bellantoni, 88K) notes the conflicting message some Democrats are offering reporting, "Democrats are challenging Republicans to put politics aside as they craft a resolution commemorating the anniversary of September 11, but also are accusing the majority party of making the country less safe in the five years since the terrorist attacks." Rep. Ed Markey said, "Today, we are still living in a state of homeland insecurity. … That is really what the Bush administration has as a legacy five years after 9/11." And House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer said, "September 11th is not a time for politics," but then proceeded "to outline his view of Republican security failures."

Lawmakers Split Over 9/11 Resolution. McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Talev) reports, "Republicans and Democrats can't agree on how to honor the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks five years after the tragedy pulled the nation together." In addition to non-controversial sections mourning the victims and condemning terrorism, "it also lauds several Republican-led legislative moves that Democrats opposed or sought to modify." The "Democrats want Republicans to strike those and other references to legislation. But, as of Friday, Republicans were holding firm."

Global Terrorism Seen As On The Rise. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, A6, Etter, 2.03M) in its "Hot Topics" column notes "Bush has made uprooting terrorists the focus of his presidency. Abroad, the president has tried to disrupt terror networks by sending U.S. forces into Afghanistan and Iraq." The Journal notes, "To the surprise of many analysts, there hasn't been another major terror incident in the U.S. since 9/11. Still, global terrorism is on the rise. In 2005 there were 4,960 terrorist incidents, up from 1,150 in 2000, according to the Terrorism Knowledge Base. Critics say the war in Iraq has helped create terrorists. The State Department said this year that terrorists are becoming more sophisticated."

Threat Of Terrorist Attack On US Seen As "Overblown". John Tierney in his column in the New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) highlights the opinions of Ohio State University professor John Mueller who downplays the threat of terrorism. Tierney says, "The Bush administration likes to take credit for stopping domestic plots, but it's hard to gauge whether these are much more than the fantasies of a few klutzes. Bush also claims that the war in Iraq has diverted terrorists' attention there, but why wouldn't global jihadists want the added publicity from attacking America at home, too?" Mueller concludes "that there just aren't that many terrorists out there with the zeal and the competence to attack the United States. In his forthcoming book, 'Overblown,' he argues that the risk of terrorism didn't increase after Sept. 11 -- if anything, it declined because of a backlash against Al Qaeda, making it a smaller and less capable threat than before. But the terrorism industry has been too busy hyping Sept. 11 and several other attacks to notice." Tierney states, "Compared with past threats -- like Communist sociopaths with nuclear arsenals -- Al Qaeda's terrorists are a minor problem."

WSJ Applauds Administration Efforts To Prevent Terrorist Attacks. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, 2.03M) in an editorial reviewing progress made in the years after the 9/11 attacks says lack of any new attack on US soil "should temper the criticism of those who claim that the U.S. policy of aggressively interrogating suspects has yielded no credible information, a point President Bush finally got round to making this week. And it is a strong rebuttal to the argument that, by invading Iraq, the Administration lost focus on the terrorist threat and made America less safe." The Journal applauds Bush's recent efforts to boost support for the war against terrorism "because the great challenge for this presidency is to remind Americans that the threat they face is undimmed even as the events of September 11 recede in memory. The costs of responding to 9/11 have been many, and the temptation is strong to think we can withdraw from Iraq, or from the larger Middle East without consequence to our own security. The abiding lesson of that day five years ago is that this is a dangerous illusion."

Thatcher Will Visit Washington, Meet Rice To Commemorate 9/11. AFP (9/9) reports former UK Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher "will attend events in Washington to mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, her office said." She is slated to accompany Vice President Cheney to a church service and commemorative ceremony Monday. Later, Thatcher "will attend a ceremony at the State Department, where she will meet" Secretary Rice.

Rice Will Meet MacKay, Visit His Nova Scotia Constituency To Commemorate 9/11. AFP (9/9) reports Secretary Rice "will mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001 attacks in Halifax, Canada, the State Department said." Assistant Secretary McCormack is quoted saying, "Secretary Rice wanted to go to Canada on September 11th as a way of thanking Canada and the Canadian people for all that they did on that day." Canadian willingness to host stranded American passengers "was just an extraordinary act of trust, generosity and kindness in a moment of need, and Secretary Rice wanted to travel to Canada to thank the Canadian government and the Canadian people for those extraordinary act."

More Commentary. Michael Hirsh in a Newsweek (9/9, 3.12M) web exclusive faults Bush's rhetoric on the war against terrorism, contrasting it with former Presidents Harry Truman and Dwight Eisenhower who according to professor of defense analysis at the Naval Postgraduate School John Arquilla, "crafted grand strategy that everybody in America, right and left, accepted for decades. They knew they needed broad support. We don't have that now. We're trying to wage the war on terror with the support of only part of the American people." Hirsh adds, "Perhaps the only thing that is clear any longer is that the war on terror will continue for a long time to come. And so will the war of words over the war on terror."

Bush Defends Rendition Policy. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 3, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "NBC's Matt Lauer sat down today with President Bush, one of the topics they discussed -- the President's confirmation this past week of those secret CIA prisons. He asked if the President, if such facilities passed legal muster." NBC (Lauer) added, "You admitted that there were these CIA secret facilities." President Bush: "So why is that not within the law?" Lauer: "The Amnesty International say that secret sites are against international law." President Bush: "We disagree with them. My job is to protect you. Most American people, if I said we have who we think is the mastermind of 9/11, they'd say, why can't you get information out of him without torturing, which is what we did."

Judge Rejects Padilla Motion To Throw Out Evidence. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Blum, 918K) reports, "A federal judge has refused to throw out evidence related to the 2002 arrest of alleged Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport." The Times notes, "Rejecting defense lawyers' requests, U.S. Magistrate Stephen Brown said in a pair of rulings that jurors should be allowed to consider the terror suspect's statements prior to his arrest in May 2002, as well as items in his possession at the time including about $10,000 in cash, a cellphone and a phone book containing numbers for alleged Al Qaeda contacts. Brown's rulings, signed Tuesday, became public Friday."

Senators Work On Tribunal Formation. The New York Times (9/9, Zernike, 1.21M) reports, "The main Senate Republican in talks with the White House over bills to establish tribunals for terror suspects said Friday that a small set of problems divided the two sides and that they would negotiate through the weekend in an effort to reach a compromise. The senator, John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said '90 percent' of the proposal that the White House submitted this week reflected a proposal that he and other Republican senators who have taken the lead on the question had drafted over the summer." The disputes "include whether suspects can be excluded from their trials and what types of evidence would be admissible." Senator Lindsey Graham (R-SC) said that the administration's plan to "deny the accused the right to see and therefore respond to classified evidence" would be struck down by a court "in 30 seconds."

The Washington Post (9/9, 748K) editorializes, "President Bush appears to be hoping that, with an election just around the corner, Congress will not have the stomach to deny him the latitude he demands both on the trials themselves and on larger questions of the treatment of detainees. But quietly, over the past few weeks, a trio of Republican senators -- Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (Va.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John McCain (Ariz.) -- has put together a remarkably good alternative bill." The Post finds the alternative bill "superior to the president's proposal."

Graham Insists On Defendants' Right To See Evidence. McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Rosen) reports, "Sen. Lindsey Graham said Friday that he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them." Graham remarked, "I don't feel good about telling someone - no matter who they are - `We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why." He "said that every general and admiral at the top of the country's military justice system agrees that classified information can be shared with accused terrorists without jeopardizing national security."

Time magazine (9/8) also reports on Graham's misgivings that Bush built "a bridge too far." As the "only serving judge advocate general in the armed forces" in the Senate, Graham has "authority" on the issue of allowing detainees to see evidence used against them. Time observes that, while generally a reliable conservative vote for the administration, Graham has "trumped" his own party's leadership on the issue.

Bush Has "Raised His Game." In the New York Times (9/9, 1.21M), columnist Roger Cohen writes, "A lot of words have been expended on President George W. Bush these past years, many of them harsh, and in the cacophony a single thought has perhaps been overlooked: He's a pure political animal." By hammering on "the theme that brought Bush his victory in 2004: terrorism and the supposed resolve of Republicans and wobbliness of Democrats before this mortal threat to America," he has "raised his game when it mattered." Cohen warns Democrats, "A perception of Democratic obstinacy in delaying military tribunals for the likes of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed could carry a heavy political price."

Rivkin And Casey Favor Abbreviating Rights of Gitmo Detainees. In the Wall Street Journal (9/9, 2.03M), former DOJ attorneys David Rivkin and Lee Casey argue, "As it enacts new rules for military commissions, Congress -- as well as the public -- should keep two overriding principles in mind. One: While the jihadists detained at Guantanamo Bay must have due process of law before they can be criminally punished, they are not ... entitled, under the U.S. Constitution or relevant international law, to the same level of procedural protections enjoyed by the lawful soldiers of sovereign states. Two: The methods of warfare employed by unlawful combatants in the war on terror fully justify extraordinary trial rules." President Bush's military commissions bill "should be promptly enacted."

Bin Laden Has A "Blueprint." In a commentary for the Washington Times (9/9, 88K), UPI international editor Claude Salhani writes, "In order to better grasp bin Laden's long-term thinking you will need to look at a map of Central Asia." Salhani sees possible expansion by bin Laden into Pakistan, "Tajikistan, to the northeast, Uzbekistan to the immediate north and Turkmenistan to the northwest." He adds, "The new Muslim empire, or Caliphate, governed by bin Laden or the Taliban would encircle Iran, itself a Muslim nation, also rich in oil and other natural resources. Look at the map again and see the implications for the rest of the oil-rich Arabian Gulf. Iraq, Kuwait, Bahrain, the Emirates, Saudi Arabia and Oman are only a small step and a revolution away. ... Now look at the map again; we are back in the Middle East. Palestine, Israel, Jordan, Egypt, North Africa and sub-Saharan Africa are the natural extension for bin Laden's Caliphate."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Urges Congress To Address Gaps In Security. The AP (9/8, Jordan) reports today "The nation's homeland security chief urged Congress on Friday to approve plans to better protect seaports and chemical plants from terrorists or risk another attack on the scale of 9/11." In his speech, Chertoff discussed the many advances in Security that have been made since September 11th. He "also rebuked critics who have resisted stepped-up safeguards that might be costly or inconvenient. 'That kind of backsliding runs directly contrary to the lessons of 9/11,' Chertoff told an audience of hundreds at Georgetown University." He also urged if the US had done these changes years ago 9/11 may not have occurred.

Critics Question Administration Dedication To Improving Airport Security. The AP (9/8, Lindlaw) reports that September 11th has led to an "accelerated" effort "to develop better screening technology, research that has advanced with each thwarted terrorism plot." Today "'some things are imminently deployable. Some things are further off,' said Steve Hill, spokesman for GE Security, the unit of General Electric Co. that makes transportation security equipment. "We are not light years off.'" Many critics question if the "Bush Administration is investing enough, even as it spent nearly $1 billion in fiscal 2006 on explosive-detection equipment for checked luggage and checkpoint screening." Currently "TSA and the Department of Homeland Security have repeatedly failed to spend tens of millions of dollars that Congress earmarked for new airport security equipment." At the same time a British Terrorist plot unfolding, Homeland Security quietly tried to take away $6 million that was supposed to be spent this year developing new technology for detecting explosives."

Utah Logs 96 Terrorism Cases In 2005, Tops In Nation. The Deseret Morning News (9/9, Davidson, Fattah) reports, "Federal data on criminal cases show Utah tops the nation in terrorist-related activity. But does it really? … The U.S. Department of Justice reported 96 terrorism-related prosecutions in the Beehive state in 2005. That represents one out of every eight such cases nationwide, well ahead of the second-place 80 filed in the Eastern District of Virginia (in the suburbs of Washington), and the third-place 67 in the Southern District of Texas. … But Utah has not turned suddenly into a stronghold for al-Qaida." The News continues, "A Deseret Morning News review of the cases shows that most of them likely would not be considered terrorism-related by people outside of the Justice Department. In fact, 87 of the 96 were identity-theft cases. None of the cases reviewed had any apparent ties to organized crime or terrorist groups listed in court documents. … The Justice Department provided only vague, general reasons why such cases were coded as terrorism-related for national databases. Officials say that terrorists use crimes like identity theft to fund their efforts, making those crimes a potential threat to national security. … 'Since our goal is to charge defendants before they can put their plans into action, this very often leads to the use of non-terrorism statutes such as fraud or false statement charges, immigration violations, identity theft and other offenses that often carry lesser penalties than offenses associated with completed terrorist acts or conspiracies,' Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. He added that smaller offenses allow officials to disrupt and prevent more serious attacks." The News notes, "Perhaps the reason for the high number of terrorist-related cases in Utah has to do in part with the way the Utah office classifies some cases. Because the Utah Identity Theft Task Force is a component of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force, identity-theft cases often are termed as terrorist-related. … While some of those those cases are not directly linked to a terrorist plot, others are considered 'domestic terrorism' because they have been linked to groups, such as white supremacists, who use identity theft to fund their efforts."

EU Official Angry At Chertoff Allegations About Information Sharing. Sophie in't Veld, a Dutch member of the European Parliament and its Committee on Civil Liberties, Justice and Home Affairs, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (9/9, A17, 748K) takes issue with DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff's Aug. 29, op-ed "A Tool We Need to Stop the Next Airliner Plot" in which he state "that the fight against terrorism is being hampered by European privacy concerns about the U.S. government's use of data collected on airline passengers. This is a very serious allegation that calls for a reaction and some qualification." Veld argues, "friends and allies work together on the basis of mutual respect, trust and shared values. I ssues such as Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, illegal rendition flights and secret detention camps, the SWIFT spying scandal and the unsatisfactory implementation of the PNR agreement have done much harm to the traditional trust between the transatlantic partners. If we want to beat the terrorists, it is essential that trust be restored. That will not be achieved by tough language between the parties but through respect and willingness to seek compromises."

Police Now Watching For Terrorists With Missiles Near US Airports. The Washington Post (9/8, Wilber, 748K) reports "Police officer Steven Benner was on patrol in northern Anne Arundel County, driving his unmarked sport-utility vehicle through parking lots, climbing onto rooftops and peering down access roads that wind through wooded areas." He has been "looking for threats from shoulder-fired missiles around Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport." Currently "airport police have expanded their anti-missile networks by reaching out to other law enforcement organizations that patrol potential launch sites and "Police officials said they work closely with the Transportation Security Administration and the FBI to learn about threats" However, Scott Hugh. "former federal security directors say the community meetings have dwindled and occur at only a few airports. He said TSA officials have failed to implement policies that could effectively counter the threat.." In response TSA says "they work closely with local police and federal law enforcement on the issue of shoulder-fired missiles."

Radar Defenses Have Improved. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 4, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Another failure exposed by the 9/11 attacks was a hole in our aviation communication system. When the hijackers diverted four passenger planes, air force pilots had no way to find or stop them." CBS (Keteyian) added, "Five years ago, on a morning marked by chaos." Unidentified male voice: "It's been hijacked. We don't know where he's going." Keteyian: "Confusion." Unidentified male voice: "I don't know where I'm scrambling these guys to." Keteyian: "And cries for help from the cockpit of one of the hijacked planes. The FAA and North American Aerospace Defense Command, or NORAD, were without a direct line of communications, essentially flying blind during 109 minutes of terror." General Eric Findley: "We had no capability, really, to start looking in because all of our radars looked out." Keteyian: "I welcome to US Northern Command, or North Com, and the new world order of our nation's defense. Inside this nerve center, dozens of military officers and civilians now sit side by side, tracking all things domestic air, land, and sea directly linked to 150 other command centers involved in public safety. And none of this communication was in place five years ago. ... Since the 11th of September, the US has flown more than 44,000 missions, safeguarding the skies over US cities. Radar systems now monitor virtually every aircraft in the sky."

Explosives Lost During Logan Airport Training Exercise. ABC World News (9/8, story 9, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "In Boston, there are a lot of red faces at the Massachusetts port authority. They were using real plastic explosive during a training exercise at Logan airport. And now, they can't find it. And now they can't find it. Eight ounces of semtecks that was attached to a truck bumper. There looking for it now."

Muslims In New York Angered Over Monitoring. The Financial Times (9/9, Birchall, Chaffin) reports that "after being shaken by the widespread detentions of suspected illegal immigrants that followed the 9/11 attacks, recent events have highlighted tensions" in New York's Muslim community. Recently Shahawar Matin Siraj was found "guilty of conspiring to blow up the city's Herald Square subway station" and his "case underlined the level of monitoring of some sections of the city's Muslims. Charges were brought against Siraj after a police informer began operating in his mosque."

New Book Describes Missouri Man's Ties To Bin Laden. The Kansas City Star (9/9, Rizzo, 278K) reports, "Did a Kansas City college student help Osama bin Laden start al-Qaida? Federal law enforcement officials think he did. So do private-sector experts on international terrorism. Now, a new book that chronicles the history of al-Qaida portrays former Kansas City resident Mohammed Loay Baizid as a confidant of bin Laden in the early years of the terrorist organization. While The Looming Tower: Al-Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, by Lawrence Wright, a staff writer at The New Yorker magazine, provides Baizid's firsthand account of his association with bin Laden, the former Kansas City resident's activities already have been extensively documented in federal court transcripts and law enforcement documents."

Paulson Reviews Emergency Response Plans. The Financial Times (9/9, Wighton, Taylor) reports, "Concerns about Wall Street's ability to withstand a terrorist attack, natural disaster or flu pandemic have prompted Hank Paulson, the new US Treasury secretary, to review the financial market's disaster-planning." He "has asked the president's working group on financial markets to assess the improvements made since September 11 2001. This comes amid continued Wall Street concerns – five years after the World Trade Center attacks – about the resilience of power and telecommunications services." The Times notes, "Experts say financial services companies in New York and London have improved the resilience of their operations. But some senior Wall Street figures are concerned that the utilities, on which the financial markets depend, have made less progress. There is also greater focus on the impact of a flu pandemic."

The Financial Times (9/9, Wighton, Brewster, Taylor, Gangahar) reports, "Five years and billions of dollars of investment later, many of those flaws have been addressed and there is little doubt that financial markets in New York – and in other leading financial centres – would now be more resilient in the event of a similar disaster." Yet, "concerns remain, not least about the key utilities on which the financial services sector depends and the industry's ability to handle other sorts of threat, such as a flu pandemic." Deputy assistant Treasury secretary for critical infrastructure Scott Parsons "says the most basic lesson learned from September 11 was the need for back-up facilities far enough away from a main site."

Few Major Changes Made In Infrastructure After 9/11 Attacks. The New York Times (9/9, Chan, 1.21M) reports, "The destruction of the World Trade Center produced calls for a wholesale re-evaluation of the way tall buildings are designed and built, but five years later, the changes to New York City's building code, and others across the nation, have been few and modest." Federal recommendations "are still being debated and may yet result in modifications to a national building code that the city plans to adopt. So far, though, 9/11 has not been a turning point for code revision, in the way past disasters were — like the Triangle Shirtwaist fire of 1911."

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Powell Michelle Garcã, 748K) in a front page story reports, "Some days the hole in the heart of this city appears healed over. The braggadocio is back and the jackhammers rattle near Ground Zero. The scar that is the 16-acre hole is still there, a monument to political paralysis. But a forest of blue condominium towers rises, Hermes and Tiffany are opening shops downtown, Goldman Sachs is throwing up a 43-story office tower, and those Viking-stoved, Jacuzzi-ed lofts still attract high-roller bid-a-thons." Over "5,800 apartments have been built in Lower Manhattan since 2001, and the median residential sales price has jumped 75 percent. Big corporations -- the Bank of New York, Goldman and Moody's Investors Service -- are building millions of square feet of new office space."

Economy Thrives Despite Impact Of 9/11 Attacks. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, A1, Hilsenrath, Pleven, 2.03M) in a front page story reports that despite concerns the 9/11 attacks would continue to have a negative impact on the economy, "The number of security guards on business and government payrolls has declined, companies are holding less inventory, and the amount of freight moving though the nation's ports has soared. Not only has the economy grown, it has become more efficient. And office construction in downtown New York and Washington has continued." The Journal notes, "Several forces are behind the surprising turn. In 2001, years of heavy spending on technology had already begun paying dividends for many companies, permitting them to become more efficient even as they had to divert some resources to security. Massive government stimulus -- hastened by an economic downturn that was in place before the attacks -- helped the economy crawl out of its slump and get on a sustainable growth path. The medicine included steep interest-rate reductions, tax cuts, emergency spending increases and a federal backstop for terrorism insurance -- meaning the U.S. would front part of insurers' losses in the event of a major attack. Meanwhile, crime rates were falling, reducing security needs in some places even as fears of domestic terror rose."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Chancellor, Vise, Cox, 2.03M) in its EU notebook reports, "Stocks fell by 11% in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. At the time, many anticipated dire economic consequences. Fears of financial Armageddon turned out to be exaggerated. Five years later, stocks are up by a third from shortly after the markets reopened. However, it's too early to draw up a final reckoning for that terrible day." The war against terrorism "has boosted U.S. military and security expenditures. Yet foreign loans have enabled Americans to have more guns without skimping on the butter. Economists would normally expect the expansion of such essentially nonproductive activity to have a harmful effect on overall economic efficiency. That hasn't happened. It turns out that average productivity growth over the past five years has actually been greater than during the 1990s." But, "there may still be some future costs to bear. The drop in skilled immigration and foreign students that followed could affect long-term growth prospects. As the war in Iraq drags on, it could well become a greater economic burden. Finally, the economic recovery was accompanied by a surge of consumer borrowing. That's left many households in the red. As the housing market slows, they will come under increasing pressure to settle their bills. Only then will a truer financial accounting for 9/11 be possible."

Democrats Continue To Insist ABC Cancel 9/11 Mini-Series. The New York Times (9/9, Mckinley, 1.21M) reports, "Despite word of small last-minute cuts meant to soften the film's depiction of President Bill Clinton and his aides, members of his administration and Democratic officials yesterday stepped up their campaign to force ABC to cancel its disputed mini-series, 'The Path to 9/11.' The Democratic National Committee delivered to the network a petition with more than 200,000 names that demanded withdrawal of the film, which the petition called 'right-wing propaganda.'" Sen. John Kerry and former vice president Al Gore "also released statements castigating ABC." The Times notes, Sen. Hillary Clinton "was somewhat more guarded in remarks at an event at Columbia University. 'My bottom-line view,' Ms. Clinton said, 'is that when it comes to something as serious and historically significant as 9/11, the truth is enough and we ought to stick to the facts.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Collins, Duant, 918K) reports, "Walt Disney Co.'s ABC is forging ahead with plans to air a miniseries starting Sunday despite controversy over its efforts to dramatize — and some say unfairly politicize — the events leading up to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. … The movie is also threatening the bipartisan work of the Sept. 11 commission, whose Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas H. Kean, served as a paid consultant on the project and has played a key role in ABC's public-relations campaign. At least two other commission members — former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste and Jamie S. Gorelick, a former deputy attorney general under President Clinton — have vehemently criticized the miniseries project."

Bush's Monday Night Speech Interferes With ABC's Schedule. The Washington Post (9/9, A4, Kurtz, 748K) reports, "An ABC spokeswoman said yesterday that changes are being made to a number of scenes in the film. … ABC plans to air the film tomorrow and Monday -- despite another letter from the Clinton camp yesterday asking that it be pulled -- although it is trying to figure out how to accommodate President Bush's prime-time speech Monday and a planned panel discussion after the movie." The Kansas City Star (9/9, Bauder, 278K) reports similar details.

Dowd Claims Clinton And Bush Share Blame For 9/11. The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (9/9) writes, "Sandy Berger is lucky they didn't show him stuffing government documents into his bra. After all, cinematic license is cinematic license. Regarding ABC's tarted-up 9/11 movie that sparked a furor among Clintonites who felt they were unfairly blamed for the rise of Osama, I hate to be so quaint as to defend reality. … The argument over which president is to blame for 9/11 is tiresome. Both obviously bear some blame."

"Irony" Of Clinton's Complaints Noted. Newsweek's Marc Peyser (9/9) writes, "Former president Bill Clinton is blasting the ABC 9/11 docudrama 'The Path to 9/11' for being inaccurate and unfair. You've got to love the irony of that. Wasn't he the guy who hired Hollywood filmmakers to create a campaign biopic of his life? Sure, 'The Path to 9/11' makes up dialogue, invents scenes and creates a composite character or two, but sometimes you have to craft the facts in a certain way to tell a complicated story. Just like sometimes you have to reconsider what the definition of "is" is when you don't want people to know you've had an affair with a White House intern.

Whitman Defends EPA Response To WTC Health Risks. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 3, , Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tens of thousands of rescue and recovery workers at ground zero, hailed as heroes at the time, are now suffering from debilitating respiratory problems." Dr. Robin Herbert, Mount Sinai Medical Center: "This is a disaster of, unfortunately, historic proportions in many ways, and I think that the epidemic of disease we're seeing is also going to turn out to be a disaster of historic proportion." Couric: "And another person who has little doubt there is a connection between the dust at ground zero and the health problems today is the woman who was the head of the EPA at the time, Christine Todd Whitman." Christine Todd

Whitman: "I know there are ongoing scientific studies being done to make the cause and effect, but you know what? We were there saying that this stuff wasn't good to breathe. We were there saying they should take some protection. Now they're getting sick. You see a correlation. You see a connection there." Couric: "But Whitman is the person many first responders hold responsible."

Lawmakers Accuse Administration Of Ignoring Health Problems Stemming From Ground Zero Recovery. The New York Times (9/9, Depalma, 1.21M) reports a bipartisan group of lawmakers including Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles Schumer "accused the Bush administration of ignoring the health problems that arose among workers who toiled at ground zero and the claims of downtown residents who say they were also sickened by the dust. The administration has done little to prepare for a similar disaster in the future, they said." Rep. Christopher shays said, "Today it appears the public health approach to lingering environmental hazards remains unfocused and halting. … The unquestionable need for long-term monitoring has been met with only short term commitments." And GOP Rep. Vito Fossella "criticized the government for not having done even basic work to record how many people participated in the cleanup and recovery operations." The AP (9/9, Barrett) reports similar details.

More Commentary. The New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) editorializes, "As we pay homage on Monday to those who died on Sept. 11, 2001, it is worth remembering what happened on May 28, 2002. That evening -- a scant 37 weeks after the attack -- workers took down the last column from that smoldering mound and officially cleared the site. … They came when the nation was attacked. Taking care of them now is a national obligation."

US Public Has Mixed Reaction Five Years After 9/11 Attacks. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 8, 2:15, Hartman, 7.66M) returned to Shanksville, PA the site of the crash of Flight 93 five years after the 9/11 attacks to see how the site "had changed. And what I found was this: Except for a few new stuff in the windows, the town itself is pretty much the same, but the people aren't. They're all coping with the tragedy in such different ways." That's because "the people of Shanksville have very mixed emotions…like the rest of us between moving on and never forgetting."

The New York Times (9/9, A1, Clemetson, 1.21M) in a front page article reports, 'As President Bush prepares to mark the fifth anniversary with high-profile remembrances at the three crash sites, the" Madeleine V. Leckie Elementary School in Virginia "will mark the day with a low-key ceremony. And the families of the school's four victims will cling to the bonds between them." The Times adds, "The families may have scattered, but the school and its garden remain a center of gravity, a place to steal away to and remember the last times their families were whole."

The New York Times (9/9, Barry, 1.21M) in an article titled "He Bears The Mark Of His Loss Sadly" and the New York Times (9/9, Nocera, 1.21M) in an article titled "After 5 Years, His Voice Can Still Crack" describe the personal losses of some family members of 9/11 attack victims.

Some 9/11 Widows Reach Out To Bereaved Women Worldwide. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 10, 2:55, Fratangelo, 9.87M) reported on the efforts of two 9/11 widows, Susan Retik and Patti Quigley, who started a charity to help bereaved women worldwide. They "started raising money with bicycle rides from ground zero to their homes near Boston to help other widows like them. Not here -- but in Afghanistan, where some lost husbands in the US led bombings." Retik: "A woman in Afghanistan, when she's widowed, their status is automatically lowered a couple of notches. It is an extremely difficult, extremely difficult life." Fratangelo: "Their foundation is called, 'Beyond the 11th.'"

Artist Travels US Painting Patriotic Images. ABC World News (9/8, story 11, 2:50, Gibson) reported on Scott Lobaido's "pilgrimage" to every US state to paint patriotic flags on the roofs of buildings. Lobaido: "It's not pro-war, anti-war. It's about these men and women who step up to the plate. I'm just trying it's about patriotic glue. This glue that keeps us all together regardless of our ideology.

Noonan Sees Message Of Strength In Last 9/11 Calls. Peggy Noonan in her column in the Wall Street Journal (9/9, 2.03M) recalls the last messages the victims of the 9/11 attacks left over their phones and says, "This is what I get from the last messages. People are often stronger than they know, bigger, more gallant than they'd guess. And this: We're all lucky to be here today and able to say what deserves saying, and if you say it a lot, it won't make it common and so unheard, but known and absorbed."

Funding May Run Out For WTC Tribute In Light. The New York Times (9/9, Dunlap, 1.21M) reports, "As twilight falls on Monday, the skies over Lower Manhattan will once again be pierced by the twin beams of the Tribute in Light." It "has become something of a civic tradition" but "the project may run out of money after 2008." And " it may lose its current staging area atop the Battery Garage, six blocks south of ground zero; a rare expanse of secure open space downtown."

Some Listed On Memorial Were Not Victims Of 9/11 Attacks. The AP (9/9, Frankston) reports, "A 100-foot-tall sculpture being unveiled on Monday's fifth anniversary of 9-11 honors thousands of terrorist attack victims, and then some: Carved into the granite base are the names of more than 40 people who weren't killed on Sept. 11 after all." The AP notes, "The majestic sculpture across the Hudson River from ground zero will feature 3,024 names of people once believed to have died in the 1993 and Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center. The problem is that the Russian artist who created the work used an outdated list of names of those missing at the trade center."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Maintains Iraq Is Key To Mideast Reform.

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he "is most emphatic when he links Iraq to the larger struggle for Mideast reform. 'In the long run, the United States is going to have to make a decision as to whether or not it will support moderates against extremists, reformers against tyrants. And Iraq is the first real test of the nation's commitment to this ideological struggle. … I believe it strongly. One way for the American people to understand the stakes is to envision what happens if America withdraws.' He has been hitting that last point hard in his recent speeches, and it is the linchpin of the argument Mr. Bush will make through November against the Democrats who insist on pulling out immediately."

Khatami Opposes Partitioning Of Iraq. Former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami in an interview with Time Magazine (9/9, Zagorin) calls the partitioning of Iraq "definitely a bad idea," adding, "Iraq should remain unified. The solution is a democratic state." Any "breakup of Iraq is very dangerous. A democratic state can prevent from this from taking place." Later, he adds, "Any aggression against Iran would have costs, serious costs for the U.S., more than for Iran. Public opinion in the world, and a great majority of the American public, would not support a military engagement."

Senate Report Contradicts Claims That Saddam And Al Qaeda Cooperated.

Coverage indicated that the Senate report was a blow to the Bush administration's allegations. Last night NBC and ABC aired lengthy segments on the report regarding Saddam Hussein's government and al Qaeda. NBC opened its broadcast with the story, while ABC ran its second. CBS made no mention of the report during its broadcast. According to ABC correspondent Martha Raddatz, the report "is a stinging rebuke to those assertions made by the White House leading up to the war…and long afterwards." NBC anchor Brian Williams contended that "the notion of any link between the two has been shredded by a big new report issued by the Republican-controlled US Senate Intelligence Committee." Williams added that the report "will be seen as proof that there was a whole lot of bad intelligence floating around. Some of which was used to launch a war."

NBC Nightly News (9/8, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "According to an opinion poll just released this week, 43% of Americans believe Saddam Hussein was personally involved in the 9/11 attacks. That is almost half the country. Linking Iraq and al Qaeda has been a tricky business. Some in the Administration have made the tie. Tonight, the notion of any link between the two has been shredded by a big new report issued by the Republican-controlled US Senate Intelligence Committee. It finds no link between Iraq and al Qaeda. In fact, it says the two have very little in common. There's even evidence Saddam Hussein used to criticize Osama bin Laden." NBC added, "The Senate reports finds that the Bush Administration repeatedly disregarded warnings that key intelligence might be wrong, even a warning that information had been fabricated. The Bush Administration repeatedly claimed there were ties between Saddam and al Qaeda. … But this report finds that none of that was true."

ABC World News (9/8, story 2, 2:40, Gibson) reported that in "the lead up to the war…and for a long time afterward, members of the administration, including the president, have maintained there was a link between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda. Today, a declassified Senate report said that was not true. That, in fact, Saddam Hussein mistrusted al Qaeda and thought it a threat to his power." ABC added, "The report is a stinging rebuke to those assertions made by the White House leading up to the war…and long afterwards. In four years, the administration has argued that Saddam Hussein was tied to Abu Musab Zarqawi and al Qaeda." ... The Republican chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, Pat Roberts, said today, he was pleased with the overall report but criticized his Democratic colleagues for their statements."

The AP (9/9, Abrams) reports, "Saddam Hussein regarded al-Qaida as a threat rather than a possible ally, a Senate report says, contradicting assertions President Bush has used to build support for the war in Iraq. … Democrats contended that the administration continues to use faulty intelligence, including assertions of a link between Saddam's government and the recently killed al-Zarqawi, to justify the war in Iraq." Republicans "said the document, which compares prewar intelligence with post-invasion findings on Iraq's weapons and on terrorist groups, broke little new ground. And they said Democrats were distorting it for political purposes."

The Washington Post (9/9, A12, Pincus, 748K) reports, "The two newly declassified chapters of the report fueled political accusations yesterday that the Bush administration lied to justify invading Iraq." The Post goes on to report, "Although the Senate report raises questions about the reliability of the information provided by Iraqi exiles, it notes that the information had little direct impact on the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq produced in October 2002.

Many of the Iraqi National Congress claims, however, were passed on to the White House and the office of Vice President Cheney through reports by a separate intelligence analysis group established by then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith. The Senate committee's inquiry into the Feith group's activities, another part of the prewar intelligence study, has been delayed by committee Chairman Pat Roberts, who is awaiting the completion of a Pentagon inspector general inquiry into the same matter."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Miller, 918K) reports in a 1,500-word article that the Senate committee's findings contradict "claims by the Bush administration before it invaded Iraq." The findings "are the latest in a series of high-profile studies to dispute some of the Bush administration's key arguments for invading Iraq" and will "fuel the election-season debate over the administration's foreign policy at a time when Bush is seeking to shore up support for the war in Iraq." Chairman Roberts was placed "in the awkward position of touting the work of his panel while urging the public to ignore some of its conclusions."

Bush Allegedly Repeated Unsubstantiated Claims Regarding Saddam And Zarqawi. The New York Times (9/9, A1, Mazzetti, 1.21M), in a front-page story, titled, "C.I.A. Said To Find No Hussein Link To Terror Chief," reports that the CIA "last fall repudiated the claim that there were prewar ties" between Hussein's government and Zarqawi. According to the Times, "The disclosure undercuts continuing assertions by the Bush administration that such ties existed, and that they provided evidence of links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. The Republican-controlled committee, in a second report, also sharply criticized the administration for its reliance on the Iraqi National Congress during the prelude to the war in Iraq. … The reports did not address the politically divisive question of whether the Bush administration had exaggerated or misused intelligence as part of its effort to win support for the war. But one report did contradict the administration's assertions, made before the war and since, that ties between Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Hussein's government provided evidence of a close relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda. As recently as Aug. 21, President Bush said at a news conference that Mr. Hussein 'had relations with Zarqawi.' But a C.I.A. report completed in October 2005 concluded instead that Mr. Hussein's government 'did not have a relationship, harbor or even turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates,' according to the new Senate findings." The AP, the Washington Post and the Washington Times also mention the president's August 21 speech.

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Weisman, 748K), in a front-page article titled, "Iraq's Alleged Al-Qaeda Ties Were Disputed Before War: Links Were Cited to Justify U.S. Invasion, Report Says," reports, "U.S. intelligence analysts were strongly disputing the alleged links between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda while senior Bush administration officials were publicly asserting those links to justify invading Iraq. Far from aligning himself with al-Qaeda…Hussein repeatedly rebuffed al-Qaeda's overtures and tried to capture Zarqawi, the report said. Tariq Aziz, the detained former deputy prime minister, has told the FBI that Hussein 'only expressed negative sentiments about [Osama] bin Laden.'"

Bloomberg (9/9) reports Bush "has consistently linked Iraq, where more than 2,600 U.S. military personnel have died and the U.S. is mired in a violent conflict between Shiites and Sunnis, to the larger war on terror and fundamentalist Islamic militants such as al-Qaeda. Bush displayed 'gross negligence' by citing faulty intelligence in speeches and statements to connect Saddam Hussein to al-Qaeda," said Senator Jay Rockefeller.

Snow Responds To Allegations Against Bush. The Washington Times (9/9, A1, Scarborough, Hurt, 88K), in a front-page article titled, "Report Finds No Saddam, Zarqawi Ties," reports Sen. Carl Levin said, 'To this day, these statements haven't stopped. Just two weeks ago, the president said in a press conference that Saddam Hussein had relations with Zarqawi. The intelligence committee's report demonstrates that statement to be false. ... The president's statement, made just two weeks ago, is flat out false.' White House spokesman Tony Snow told The Washington Times last night that Mr. Bush was referring to the fact that Zarqawi was in Iraq receiving medical care and lodging during Saddam's rule. 'The president knows there was no operational relationship and he did not assert there was an operational relationship,' Mr. Snow said. The Senate report also said there is no evidence that Saddam's regime participated in or aided the September 11 attacks. Mr. Snow said the president has never asserted otherwise. 'There have been repeated insinuations that the president had somehow said Saddam was involved in September 11,' Mr. Snow said. 'He has never said that. He has taken great pains from the very beginning to assure people that was not the case.'"

Hagel And Snowe Joined Democrats' Criticism Of US Reliance On INC. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) followed-up its lead story on the Senate report with "analysis" from Washington bureau chief Tim Russert. According to Russert, "two Republican Senators, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine joined with the Democrats to toughen this report. That's very, very significant." Russert said that when he interviews Vice President Cheney this Sunday he will inquire, "Exactly about this subject."

The New York Times (9/9, A1, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports, "A set of conclusions that included criticism of the administration's ties with the Iraqi National Congress was opposed by several Republicans on the panel, including Mr. Roberts, but was approved with the support of" Hagel and

Snowe, "along with all seven Democrats. Senator Roberts even took the unusual step of disavowing the conclusions about the role played by the Iraqi National Congress, saying that they were 'misleading and are not supported by the facts.'

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Republican attempts to paint the findings as a partisan rehash were undercut by intelligence committee members from the GOP."

McClatchy (9/9, Strobel, Talev) reports, "The reports are part of a five-report study that the Senate Intelligence Committee has undertaken into the Bush administration's use of intelligence before the invasion of Iraq. The study has left the committee badly divided. Three reports remain classified, including one comparing prewar statements by Bush administration officials to intelligence available at the time. Democrats have accused Republicans of delaying the reports until after the November congressional elections."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch/Cox (9/9, Deans) reports Sen. Kit Bond "criticized Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee for attempting to spin the report released Friday, calling their comments that the administration manipulated pre-war intelligence about Iraq deceptive. 'Democrats continue to make partisan attacks even though the facts do not support those conclusions,' Bond said."

Bush Seen As Unlikely To Admit Making Mistakes. The Washington Post's Linton Weeks, in a piece on past presidents' refusal to apologize for their mistakes (9/9, C1), writes, "Being president apparently means never being able to say you're sorry. Or wrong. President Bush said that the Central Intelligence Agency did secretly detain certain people suspected of working for al-Qaeda, and that CIA interrogators have used 'an alternative set of procedures' designed to pry information from prisoners. Given the opportunity to say he was wrong or that he was sorry, he did what presidents do: neither. … It is a tack that the president may take again in light of reports from the Senate Intelligence Committee that Saddam Hussein was not linked to Osama bin Laden at the time Bush was mounting a war against Iraq."

NYTimes Claims Report's Conclusions Are Already Widely Accepted. The New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) in an editorial writes, "We were certainly relieved that the Senate Intelligence Committee finally made official yesterday what pretty much everyone but President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney had already acknowledged: There never was any connection between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda, not even between Mr. Hussein and the self-styled Qaeda leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. Iraq also was not busily trying to build a nuclear weapon before the war, nor did it have a biological weapons program. … Unfortunately, the documents…are beside the big point of this inquiry: Did Mr. Bush and his aides knowingly hype the intelligence on Iraq and deliberately mislead Americans into war?"

General Says Rumsfeld Refused To Plan For Postwar Iraq. McClatchy (9/9, Heinatz) reports, "Long before the United States invaded Iraq in 2003, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld forbade military strategists to develop plans for securing a post-war Iraq, the retiring commander of the Army Transportation Corps said Thursday. In fact, said Brig. Gen. Mark Scheid, Rumsfeld said 'he would fire the next person' who talked about the need for a post-war plan." Scheid, who is retiring in "about three weeks," said that Rumsfeld feared "the American public will not back us if they think we are going over there for a long war." His comments further confirm "the version of events reported in 'Cobra II: The Inside Story of the Invasion and Occupation of Iraq.'" Despite his criticism, Scheid "doesn't go so far as calling for Rumsfeld to resign." This article appeared in about 16 sites.

Iranians Arrest Five Members Of Iraqi Security Forces. The New York Times (9/9, Wong, 1.21M) reports, "Five members of the Iraqi security forces and their interpreter were arrested by Iranian troops as the Iraqis were patrolling the Iraq-Iran border this week. ... The Iraqis were on a joint patrol run by the Interior and Defense ministries ... near the town of Mandali, in Diyala Province. The area has been rife with sectarian violence. It was unclear which side of the border the Iraqis were on." The arrests "come at a time of growing tension between the United States and Iran," the latter of which "detained eight [UK] sailors in June 2004" near the Iranian border. Iraq and Iran fought a war in the 1980s; "though Iraqi Shiite political parties are close to some Iranian officials, many Iraqis distrust the Iranians, who have been the traditional rivals of Arabs for influence in the region." The Times also briefly reports several bombings, a sheik's assassination, and deaths of one British and one American soldier.

The Washington Post (9/9, A12, Paley, 748K) reports the arrests occurred "after a cross-border skirmish Thursday." The captured Iraqis "were part of a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol that trekked on Thursday afternoon to a border post near Mandali ... to investigate reports that a large number of Iranians were crossing into Iraq there."

Iraqi Forces Protect Karbala. The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Quinn) reports, "Iraqi police and army troops fanned out around Karbala yesterday to safeguard the Shi'ite holy city as a mortar attack killed three pilgrims heading there for a religious festival." Officials expect up to 3 million pilgrims.

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, McDonnell, 918K) reports, "No major attacks were reported against the multitudes destined for Karbala, where today they celebrate the birthday of a revered imam who disappeared a millennium ago. But even on a relatively quiet day in the capital, authorities reported finding 14 unidentified bodies in various neighborhoods." Authorities "sealed off Karbala, about 50 miles south of Baghdad, to try to prevent a repeat of previous attacks on masses of Shiite pilgrims, whose boisterous marches are often viewed as a provocation by the rival Sunni Arab community."

Iraqi Death Count Excludes Car Bombs, Mortar Attacks. McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Brunswick, Obeid) reports, "U.S. officials, seeking a way to measure the results of a program aimed at decreasing violence in Baghdad, aren't counting scores of dead killed in car bombings and mortar attacks as victims of the country's sectarian violence. In a distinction previously undisclosed, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said Friday that the United States is including in its tabulations of sectarian violence only deaths of individuals killed in drive-by shootings or by torture and execution." The accounting method "allowed U.S. officials to boast that the number of deaths from sectarian violence in Baghdad declined by more than 52 percent in August over July." McClatchy calls the dispute "important" and reports that many Iraqis "say [civil war] has already begun."

New Army Interrogation Manual Recalls Abuses. The Washington Post (9/9, White, 748K) reports, "The chief architect of the new Army field manual on interrogations said yesterday that the document aims to preserve the memory of the detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere so future generations of U.S. soldiers do not repeat the same mistakes." The manual prohibits "abuse alleged at various facilities and some that appear to come directly from Abu Ghraib photographs: forcing a detainee to be naked, perform sexual acts, or pose in a sexual manner," etc. A Human Rights First official expressed concern "that the Army field manual and a new Pentagon directive on detainee treatment designate the CIA as the agency that will do the nation's dirty work under a set of secret guidelines."

US Forces Find Torture Chambers. The AP (9/9) reports, "The senior commander of U.S. and Iraqi forces in northern Iraq said Friday that a small number of 'torture chambers' apparently used for sectarian violence were discovered along the Diyala River. Maj. Gen. Thomas R. Turner II ... told reporters at the Pentagon that two or three small rooms were found in May or June. He mentioned them as examples of sectarian strife that has spread from Baghdad to other parts of Iraq." A Pentagon report had "expressed concern that sectarian violence was spreading beyond the Iraqi capital," which Gen. Turner acknowledged by saying, "We do see that migration."

Ex-Marine Warns Against "Rush To Judgment" Of Murder Suspects. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Perry, 918K) reports on ex-Marine Ilario Pantano, who "was charged with killing two unarmed Iraqi prisoners but was exonerated last year in a high-profile preliminary hearing at Camp Lejeune, N.C." His Marine career "destroyed," he now expresses concern "that decisions about bringing criminal charges are often made by investigators and officers without direct combat experience. The line between acceptable and unacceptable violence in Iraq is hard to discern, he said." Pantano's "aggressive and media-smart" legal strategy has become a model for other GIs facing "similar charges," such as the Pendleton 8. His accuser remains convinced of Pantano's guilt.

Car Bombing Near US Embassy In Kabul Kills Two US Soldiers. The Kabul suicide bombing resulted in coverage pointing out the increasing boldness of Taliban insurgents in attacking the capital. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Constable, Hamdard, 748K) reports, "A suicide bomber rammed a Toyota sedan into a U.S. military convoy Friday morning on a busy Kabul street, triggering a blast that killed 14 Afghan civilians and two U.S. soldiers." Seventeen people including a US soldier were wounded in an attack that "tore one U.S. military vehicle in half and scattered chunks of charred metal and human limbs across the pavement." The "attack, carried out on the same block as the heavily guarded U.S. Embassy, was the latest of half a dozen bombings that in recent months have brought what was an almost exclusively rural insurgency onto the streets of the Afghan capital." The Post calls the explosion "the deadliest attack in the capital since September 2002." At the same time, the Post notes, "Taliban militiamen are battling NATO troops in southern Afghanistan with unexpected aggressiveness and occupying rural districts there."

The New York Times (9/9, Gall, Wafa, 1.21M) adds, "A suicide bomber smashed his car into an American military vehicle just yards from the United States Embassy in downtown Kabul on Friday morning, killing as many as 16 people and wounding 29." The attack "came amid a sharp escalation of violence in Afghanistan, where NATO and American military commanders are waging an offensive to crush a Taliban insurgency that has revived with unexpected strength this year." The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Garwood) calls it "the most brazen attack yet on Kabul's heavily guarded center." The Financial Times (9/9, Morarjee, Dombey) calls it "an indication that Taliban insurgents are becoming bold enough to strike outside their traditional southern strongholds."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Rubin, 918K) reports that the bombing has "raised fears here about a growing ability of anti-government extremists to strike with apparent impunity, even in the capital." Kabul residents "blamed the incident on the Musharraf government, which they said had allowed the Taliban to take refuge, train and rearm in Pakistan. But they said the United States was responsible too because it has influence with Musharraf yet has failed to compel him to halt support for Taliban guerrillas or prevent their crossing into Afghanistan."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Landay) reports, "Intelligence officials told McClatchy Newspapers earlier this year that much of the violence in Afghanistan has come from tactics - such as car bombings, suicide attacks and homemade bombs - that were brought to Afghanistan by militants trained in their use in Iraq." The bombing may be linked to "the fifth anniversary Saturday of the assassination of a fabled guerrilla leader and Taliban opponent, Ahmad Shah Massoud, who was killed by suspected al-Qaida operatives posing as television journalists."

Jones Calls For More NATO Troops. The Financial Times (9/9, Morarjee, Dombey) reports that NATO supreme commander Gen. James Jones "made clear that he was looking for a reserve battalion of 800-1000 soldiers, plus air support that could involve additional personnel of up to 1,500 people." He called the reinforcements "more important than ever." However, his "request represents one of Nato's toughest challenges yet, since the alliance has long-standing difficulties in providing speedy troop deployments, air support and forces that can be moved around with ease."

The AP (9/9, Scislowska) reports, "Calls by NATO's top commander for 2,000 more troops in Afghanistan could be running up against donor fatigue from key members of the alliance. The NATO campaign has been draining: In one of the world's harshest environments, it has failed to ensnare top al-Qaida leaders and the insurgency is at its fiercest since the fall of the Taliban — raising the specter of an Iraq-style quagmire." In addition, NATO countries have already contributed troops to Lebanon. The AP says the Afghan military situation has "grim parallels" to Iraq, even though Gen. Jones called such comparisons "a cheap shot." According to the AP, "U.S. and NATO commanders have repeatedly underestimated the ability of the Taliban to regroup after heavy losses, and there are signs that militants in Afghanistan are adopting tactics used in Iraq."

Karzai Says To Expect More Challenges. Time magazine (9/8) reports that the bombing "rocked the floor of the presidential palace a mile away, where President Karzai was sitting down for an interview with TIME." Karzai, "struggling to maintain his composure in the minutes following the blast, condemned the attack and lamented the loss of life, but adamantly rejected any suggestion that the security situation in Afghanistan was deteriorating." He warned, "The enemy is defeated, but it is not eliminated." Time comments, "Events over the past week suggest [the Taliban] are far from being defeated."

Mullah Omar Reportedly In Pakistan. CNN (9/9, Bergen, Cooper, Moore) reports, "The one-eyed Taliban leader Mullah Omar, who heads the religious militia fighting U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan, is living in Pakistan, though not in the same area where al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden is thought to be, according to a U.S. intelligence source. ... The elusive Taliban leader is believed to be in Quetta or its environs." The added "that bin Laden is likely in Bajuar, a sparsely populated remote tribal region on the northern Afghan-Pakistan border, bordering Chitral."

"Kidnapped" Major Turns Up In Kyrgyzstan. The AP (9/9, Saralayeva) reports USAF Maj. Jill Metzger, "who disappeared earlier this week in Kyrgyzstan, was found alive late Friday, reportedly telling people who helped her that she had been kidnapped." Kyrgyz police "informed authorities at the U.S. air base at the airport in Bishkek" that she had been located. Deputy Interior Minister Omurbek Suvanaliyev "said Metzger, 33, knocked on the door of a house on the outskirts of the capital shortly before midnight and told its residents that she had been kidnapped." The AP notes, "The shopping center where Metzger disappeared, located about 35 miles from the base, is not a particularly dangerous area, said" a US military officer. "Still, the military had instituted a new policy barring all off-duty personnel from leaving the base until Metzger was found." The New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) runs a slightly modified version of the AP article.

NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 5, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is late word tonight that an Air Force major who vanished on Tuesday in the Central Asian nation of Kyrgyzstan has been found. We've learned Major Jill Metzger was found in Bishkek. Wandering near a police station. Her hair had been cut and dyed but it's unclear whether she had been abducted. Air Force doctors are now examining her."

Army Touts Recruiting Increase. The Washington Post (9/9, Tyson, 748K) reports, "The Army will meet its goal of recruiting 80,000 new active-duty soldiers this fiscal year but will fall short in the percentage of high school graduates as the education level of enlistees dips below the norm of the past decade, according to senior Pentagon officials." The recruiting success is a "significant rebound" from last year's failure to meet "the active-duty target" for the first time since 1999. Officials attributed the gains "to a beefed-up active-duty recruiting force" and to incentives for both recruits and recruiters. However, "the proportion of recruits holding a high school diploma was 81.2 percent as of August, falling below the Pentagon benchmark of 90 percent for the second year in a row," to the lowest figure since 1981.

The AP (9/8, Burns) reports the story as well, quoting Maj. Gen. Sean Byrne, who concedes that "the Iraq war continues to be a drag on recruiting, and he said unpublished Army research surveys show people of enlistment age are increasingly disinclined to join. Similarly, adults who influence the choices of potential recruits — like parents, teachers and coaches — are less inclined to recommend military service." As it is, "even now, after increasing the active-duty Army by about 10,000 soldiers this year, to about 501,000, soldiers generally get less than two years at home between one-year tours in Iraq."

Journalist Accused Of Assisting Hussein Government Released From Prison. The New York Times (9/9, Hartocollis, 1.21M) reports Susan Lindauer, "a former journalist and Congressional aide accused of working with Iraqi intelligence before the war was released from prison yesterday after a federal judge ruled that she could not be forced to take antipsychotic medication in an effort to make her competent to stand trial. The judge, Michael Mukasey of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was not convinced that even if she took the medication…Lindauer, 43, would improve enough to be capable of standing trial. Judge Mukasey also criticized the strength of the government's case, saying that the legal standard for forcibly administering medication requires a strong government interest in prosecution, and that the government has not been able to establish that standard in this case."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Probe Of Stock Options Timing Expands. The AP (9/9, Gordon) reports, "As shareholders are finding out how costly the stock-options backdating scandal might be, a widening cast of characters is being targeted." The AP continues, "In the latest development Friday, Broadcom Corp., a supplier of chips used in communications devices, said it may need to boost a charge it takes to $1.5 billion or more for stock-option accounting flaws -- double what it estimated in July." The AP adds, "Government officials said this week they want to know what roles corporate directors as well as outside attorneys, auditors and compensation consultants might have played in helping executives manipulate the timing of option grants to enrich themselves and their colleagues. … More than 100 public companies, many of them in the technology sector, are under scrutiny by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible rigging of stock-option grants to boost their value to the recipients. The Justice Department is investigating scores of companies for possible criminal violations. … California-based Broadcom, for example, uncovered grants awarded between June 2000 and 2002 in which the measurement dates differed from grant dates. … And the Internal Revenue Service is looking at possible tax-law violations in option grants by some companies."

Broadcom Finds More Options Problems. The San Jose Mercury News (9/9, Schwanhausser) reports, "Broadcom warned investors Friday that its internal review of misdated stock options had uncovered deeper problems that will force it to recognize at least $1.5 billion in expenses -- double the Irvine company's original estimate in July." The News continues, "Meanwhile, a Silicon Valley company said its internal investigation had come to the opposite conclusion: Linear Technology found 'no evidence of fraud or misconduct of any kind.' Still, the Milpitas chip maker apparently became the first valley company to disclose that the Internal Revenue Service is looking into possible option abuses." The News adds, "So far, about 120 U.S. companies face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews, with about one-fourth of them based in Silicon Valley. Many of those have warned they will need to restate past financial reports because option abuses led them to overstate their profits. … Broadcom stands apart, however, because the size and breadth of its errors have grown dramatically. The semiconductor maker said in July that it had understated its option expenses by an estimated $750 million and would restate records dating to 2000. … Now it says it will restate financial reports back to 1998 -- covering its entire history as a public company. The accounting charge 'will be at least twice the amount previously estimated and could be substantially more' if investigators find more tainted options, Broadcom said."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Granelli) reports, "As an optimistic symbol of the technology industry's future, Broadcom Corp. in the late 1990s was hard to beat. … Stock options turned average workers into millionaires, and the founders established themselves at the top of Orange County's corporate and philanthropic elite as the Irvine chip maker's share price soared. … But eight years after its frothy debut on the public markets, Broadcom is fast epitomizing the industry's cavalier past — and more sober prospects." The Times continues, "On Friday, the company said unreported expenses related to those stock options that peppered the employee parking lot with Ferraris and Lamborghinis are likely to swell to more than $1.5 billion and ultimately could be 'substantially more.' … The revision is double an estimate of two months ago and would increase Broadcom's accumulated losses since going public in 1998 to more than $7 billion. It's also the largest restatement among any of the more than 100 public companies under scrutiny over alleged manipulation of the timing of stock option grants." The Times adds, "Although technology companies were more likely than other firms to grant stock options as incentives for rank-and-file workers as well as executives, questions about the practice are being raised at a number of companies — including Home Depot, Cheesecake Factory, Cablevision and UnitedHealth. … In many cases, experts believe, nothing illegal was done, although the Justice Department is examining more than 45 companies and the Securities and Exchange Commission is reviewing more than 100. Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. in San Jose have been charged with securities fraud."

Bloomberg (9/9, Barr) reports, "The restatement is the biggest yet among at least 120 companies facing federal probes or conducting internal reviews into whether they manipulated dates to inflate the value of options. In July, Broadcom said it would take a $750 million charge after an audit committee found options backdating from 2000 to 2002. That review continues. … 'More serious than effect on share price is what it says for the culture of the company,' said Michael Cohen, an analyst for San Diego-based Pacific American Securities. 'In addition to straightening out the accounting, these companies should find the wrongdoers and get some recovery for shareholders.'"

Ebbers Ordered To Report To Prison September 26. The AP (9/9, Neumeister) reports, "Former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers was ordered to report to prison Sept. 26 to begin serving a 25-year sentence for an $11 billion accounting fraud." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones, in a ruling made public Thursday, ordered Ebbers to surrender to an institution designated by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons to begin serving a sentence that was delayed for the last year while an appeals court considered it." The AP adds, "Ebbers was sentenced in July of last year after he was convicted of fraud and conspiracy in the massive fraud that drove WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002. … The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month upheld his conviction and sentence, finding he was motivated primarily by personal financial circumstances."

Former Enron Executive Delainey Seeks Probation. Bloomberg (9/9, Calkins) reports, "Former Enron Corp. executive David Delainey, who pleaded guilty to insider trading, asked a judge to sentence him to probation or house arrest because he cooperated with prosecutors in their investigation." Bloomberg continues, "Delainey, a Canadian citizen and former head of Enron's energy trading and retail energy services divisions, said he deserves less than the 10-year term he agreed to serve, according to court papers filed Aug. 28. He asked to serve any sentence in Canada, near his job and family in Calgary. … 'Mr. Delainey has provided the government with extraordinary insight and education, and has given powerful, credible testimony,' John Dowd, his lawyer, wrote in court papers filed with U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt in Houston. 'His testimony at the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay was critical to achieving the convictions.'" Bloomberg adds, "Skilling, 52, and Lay, who died in July at age 64, were convicted in May of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the world's largest energy trader. More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions vanished when Enron plunged into bankruptcy in December 2001. … Delainey, 40, pleaded guilty to selling more than $4.26 million in Enron stock between January 2000 and October 2001 based on non-public knowledge of numerous management schemes that were artificially boosting Enron's bottom line. These included realigning business units to hide losses and improperly using reserves to make up shortfalls in earnings expectations. … As part of his plea agreement, Delainey also agreed to forfeit almost $8 million in illicit profits and cooperate with prosecutors when he pleaded guilty to a single count of insider trading in October 2003. In a Sept. 5 response to his sentencing request, prosecutors told Hoyt they will seek an unspecified reduction in Delainey's sentence."

Dunn Denounces Pretexting Tactics In H-P Board Probe. The AP (9/9, Liedtke) reports, "Battling to keep her job, Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn tried Friday to defuse the uproar over a company-ordered investigation that relied on a potentially illegal ruse to obtain the personal phone records of her fellow directors and at least nine reporters." The AP continues, "In an interview, Dunn described the tactics as 'absolutely appalling' and 'embarrassing' while defending the need to pursue the investigation to plug a leak on HP's board. … 'I serve at the pleasure of the board,' Dunn said. 'I totally trust their judgment. If they think it would be better for me to step aside, I would do that. But a number of directors have urged me to hang in there.' She declined to say how many of HP's other nine directors support her." The AP adds, "The board plans to hold an emergency meeting by phone during the weekend to discuss the concerns about the company's investigation as well as Dunn's job status. … California Attorney General Bill Lockyer already has concluded the HP investigation broke state law by obtaining people's private phone records under false pretenses -- a charade known as 'pretexting.' … HP's investigators masqueraded as the directors and reporters targeted in the probe, using their Social Security numbers in some instances to dupe phone companies into turning over lists of personal phone calls."

DOJ_NMG_0060917

The San Francisco Chronicle (9/9, Page A - 1, Kopytoff, Guynn) reports, "California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has called the techniques used by Hewlett-Packard's investigators illegal and has opened an inquiry to determine who was responsible. To gain access to the phone records, Hewlett-Packard's investigators obtained Social Security numbers of their targets and then impersonated them online or during phone calls with AT&T. … Dunn stopped short of saying the practice of faking someone's identity to obtain information, called 'pretexting,' was illegal, citing her lack of a legal background. But she said of the tactic, 'I just don't think it's right.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Businessman Sentenced To Prison For Bribing Jefferson. The New York Times (9/9, Drew, 1.21M) reports Judge T.S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., "sentenced Vernon L. Jackson, the chief executive of a Kentucky technology company, to 7 years 3 months in jail for paying more than $400,000 to Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana. In May, Mr. Jackson pleaded guilty to charges that he made the payments to a consulting firm run by Mr. Jefferson's wife in return for the congressman's help on business deals in Africa. Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing and has not been charged. Prosecutors said Mr. Jackson had been cooperating with a federal investigation of the congressman."

The Washington Post (9/9, A8, Lengel, 748K) reports Jackson "said nothing during the proceeding. His attorney, Michael S. Nachmanoff, said he was pleased the judge gave a sentence that was at the low end of the federal guideline." Jefferson "has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing, but sources have said an indictment appears assured."

The AP (9/9, Barakat) reports, "A former congressional aide of Jefferson was sentenced to eight years in prison after admitting that he helped broker some of the bribes paid to Jefferson."

The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (9/9, Cheves) reports, "U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria, Va., noted that Jackson is a self-made entrepreneur with strong ties to his community and church. But Ellis said the punishment must reflect the damage that bribery inflicts on the credibility of government. … Ellis ruled that Jackson won't have to report to prison until at least January, as prosecutors said they want to continue to consult him in their investigation."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/9, Walsh) reports, "Kentucky businessman Vernon Jackson, the son of a school custodian who had built himself into a high-tech multimillionaire only to lose it all, was trying to claw his way back into the game six years ago when he met Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans." The Times-Picayune adds, "Jackson, whose fortune was once estimated at $32 million, saw the congressman as his ticket back to financial success and respectability. Jefferson's connections in Washington and West Africa held the promise of finally finding a market for Jackson's patented telecommunications invention that could make both of them rich. … Instead, according to FBI wiretap transcripts and court pleadings, Jefferson hit up Jackson for nearly $400,000 in bribes and eventually sought to seize control of his fledgling telecommunications company, iGate Inc."

More Firms Linked In Jefferson Probe. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/9, Alpert) reports, "Documents released this week by Nigerian investigators indicate that the ongoing U.S. probe of Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, includes an examination of his links to some previously unreported companies." The Times-Picayune continues, "Nigeria's Economic and Financial Crimes Commission said it had been asked by the U.S. Justice Department to examine the congressman's role not only in promoting a Nigerian project proposed by the Kentucky firm iGate Inc., but also his links to" three firms, including "Life Technology Holdings, now known as Global Environmental Energy Corp., which at one time had offices in New Orleans and filed for bankruptcy protection after its efforts to build garbage incinerators failed to catch on. Along with iGate, it helped finance Jefferson's trip to Western Africa, including Nigeria, in 2004. … TDC Overseas of Baton Rouge, which was looking to build a sugar refinery in Nigeria. George Knost, the company's chief executive officer, said TDC is 'cooperating fully' with the Justice Department probe of Jefferson. The company has 'had no improper dealings with Jefferson or anyone else,' Knost said. … Jefferson Interest Inc., which matches the name of a company registered with the Louisiana secretary of state's office in 1983 that lists Jefferson as president and his brothers Bennie and Mose as vice president and secretary-treasurer, respectively." The Times-Picayune notes, "The Justice Department probe of Jefferson centers on allegations that Vernon Jackson, chief executive officer of iGate Inc., funneled more than $360,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help in getting contracts in Nigeria and Ghana for iGate's copper wire broadband technology. Jackson has pleaded guilty and was sentenced Friday to seven years and three months in jail."

Libby's Backers Renew Criticism Of Fitzgerald After Armitage Admission. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Hamburger, Cooper, 918K) reports that "almost three years ago," special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald learned that Richard Armitage had leaked Valerie Plame's identity to

Robert Novak. The Times asks, "So if the mystery was already solved, why did Fitzgerald's investigation continue for almost 36 more months? Why does I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, still face criminal charges in connection with the Plame leak? And why were other senior officials left twisting in the wind, facing possible indictment? Did the special counsel, operating behind the veil of secrecy of all such inquiries, abuse his authority in a witch hunt?" The Times goes on to report, "The discovery of Armitage's role — and the fact that it had been known to investigators so early — is stirring administration defenders to fury. After all, they say, the inquiry left the White House under a cloud of suspicion for months and created a costly distraction for senior officials, including political strategist Karl Rove and even Cheney. 'It's as if a giant hoax were perpetrated on the country — by the media, by partisan opponents of the Bush administration, even by several Bush subordinates who betrayed the president and their White House colleagues,' conservative commentator Fred Barnes wrote this week in a Weekly Standard Magazine column that listed Fitzgerald, the news media and others as the culprits."

The AP (9/9, Apuzzo) quotes several supporters of Lewis "Scooter" Libby's, including former Sen. Fred Thompson, "who…said Fitzgerald had a duty to set the record straight yet continued to urge Armitage's silence. Thompson said the case shows the worst side effects of appointing a special prosecutor." Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, "said Friday she believes Fitzgerald knew that no crime had been committed with the leak of Plame's identity, yet he forced reporters to disclose their confidential sources and even sent" the NYTimes' Judy Miller "to jail."

Federal Investigators Interview Harris' Former Campaign Manager. The St. Petersburg Times (9/9, Kumar) reports, "Federal investigators interviewed U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' former campaign manager as part of an ongoing federal inquiry into her relationship with a convicted defense contractor." The Times continues, "Jim Dornan, who left Harris' Senate campaign in November, spoke to investigators from the FBI and the Defense Department in Washington for about 90 minutes Thursday. … The Justice and Defense departments are examining Harris' dealings with Mitchell Wade, who made illegal campaign contributions to Harris and later asked her to help secure $10-million in federal money for a company project. … They have subpoenaed records from Harris' campaign office and have interviewed at least three former staffers: senior campaign consultant Ed Rollins, congressional chief of staff Fred Asbell and Mona Tate Yost, a congressional aide who later went to work for Wade. … A fourth employee, Kara Borie, Harris' former congressional spokeswoman, was contacted by investigators last month but it is unclear whether she was interviewed." The Times notes, "Wade, who pleaded guilty to bribing another member of Congress, and Harris shared at least two dinners - each costing about $3,000 - at a tony Georgetown restaurant. … Dornan was not working for Harris when she received the donations or requested the money for the project."

US Increases Pressure On Online Gaming Firms. The AP (9/9, Douglas) reports, "Gambling industry experts agree: If you operate an offshore gaming Web site, stay out of the U.S." The AP continues, "Moments after setting foot in the U.S. Thursday, Sportingbet PLC chairman Peter Dicks became the second U.K. offshore sports betting executive arrested in recent months for running an online gambling operation. Former BetOnSports PLC chief executive David Carruthers was arrested on federal charges in July. … It's still unclear if the arrest is a coincidence or part of a government crackdown, but some experts suspect the latter. … And as millions of dollars in bets for the NFL's opening weekend roll into thousands of Web sites, the pressure on the Internet gaming industry has intensified. … 'You don't need legal expertise to know if you are running an offshore gambling site, don't come to America right now. You stand a good chance of being arrested,' Internet gambling expert and lawyer Nelson Rose said." The AP adds, "Dicks, 64, was arrested at Kennedy International Airport in New York after flying from London, where his Web sites operate legally and are traded on the London Stock Exchange. More than $1.5 billion shares in the company were suspended by the LSE at Sportingbet's request Thursday. … Dicks was detained on a Louisiana state warrant from May for gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years year in prison and a $25,000 fine. Similar warrants have been issued for other Sportingbet associates, but authorities would not release information on who or how many of them are wanted. … Seven states have laws prohibiting Internet gambling. The arrest of Dicks marked the first time one of those states has taken action against one of thousands of big-time online gambling operations. Million of American players bet an estimated $6 billion per year online, according to industry figures. … While the Justice Department has said it is being more vigilant in prosecuting illegal offshore betting, the department said Thursday's arrest was not a coordinated effort with state authorities."

US Seeks Death Penalty In Hawaii Child-Beating Death. The Honolulu Advertiser (9/9, Lum) reports, "The U.S. attorney's office in Hawai'i will seek the death penalty in the case of a Schofield Barracks soldier accused of beating to death his 5-year-old daughter last year. … It is only the second time the U.S. Justice Department has approved capital punishment in a Hawai'i case since the federal death penalty law was enacted in 1994." The Advertiser continues, "Army Spc. Naeem Williams was indicted by a federal grand jury in February 2006 on one count of first-degree murder. He is accused of the beating death of his daughter, Talia Williams, at the Williams' Wheeler Army Airfield apartment on July 16, 2005. … Last night, Tarshia Williams, Talia's mother, said from her South Carolina home that it was a 'blessing' that the death penalty was approved for her former husband. Naeem Williams was granted custody of Talia in December 2004."

The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (9/9) reports, "The decision to seek the death penalty was made by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, according to U.S. Attorney Edward Kubo Jr. … The death penalty won't be sought against Delilah Williams, U.S. Attorney Marshall H. Silverberg said. Both are being held in Honolulu, he said." The Star-Bulletin adds, "Hawaii has no death penalty, but Williams will be tried in the state under the federal death penalty law, Silverberg said. … The case is being prosecuted in U.S. District Court because the crime allegedly occurred on a military base, he said."

Former DOD Analyst Sentenced For Giving China Secrets. The AP (9/9) reports, "A former Pentagon intelligence analyst who disclosed classified information to Chinese spies was sentenced Friday to three months in jail." The AP continues, "Ronald N. Montaperto, 67, pleaded guilty earlier this year in federal court to unlawful retention of classified documents. He admitted that he had contacts with two intelligence officers from China as early as 1983 and as recently as 2001. … At his sentencing, Montaperto said he had wanted to boost his status in the intelligence community and obtain useful intelligence for the United States. 'I never meant to hurt my country in any way,' he said." The AP adds, "Montaperto's lawyer, Stephen Anthony, said Montaperto was an academic and was untrained in dealing with Chinese spies, and that they essentially wheedled him into making illegal disclosures. … In rejecting prosecutors' request for a term of about two years, U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that there was no evidence that Montaperto sought to profit financially from his disclosures, and that the government would not have had a case had he not admitted his misconduct."

The Washington Times (9/9, Gertz, 88K) reports, "A former Pentagon analyst [Ronald Montaperto] who passed highly classified intelligence to two Chinese military officers was sentenced to three months in prison yesterday -- far shy of four to five years called for in sentencing guidelines." Federal Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said he was "swayed" by "letters of support from current and former intelligence and military officials." The Times contrasts the sentence "with the 12-year prison term given in January to another former Pentagon official, Larry Franklin, who was convicted of providing classified information to [officials from AIPAC]." The AP (9/9) also reports the story.

Fugitive Wanted In New York Troopers' Shooting Captured. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/9, Thompson) reported, on Friday in western New York, Ralph "Bucky" Phillips "couldn't shake his pursuers. The cordon around one of America's most wanted criminals tightened throughout the afternoon and into the evening. At 8 p.m., an exhausted and gaunt Phillips, with helicopters above and SWAT teams and U.S. Marshals closing in, threw up his hands and surrendered." The AP noted, "On Thursday, the FBI put Phillips on its 10 Most Wanted list. Friday's search started shortly before 2 a.m. in Pennsylvania when a police officer tried to pull over a stolen car. After a short chase, the car crashed and the driver, identified by police as Phillips, fled into the woods." The New York Times (99, Wilson, Staba) added, "After the capture, residents clapped and shouted along the dark roads. … By the end of the manhunt, the reward for information leading to Mr. Phillips's capture had grown to $425,000, and he had been added to the F.B.I.'s 10 Most Wanted List, just three names down from Osama bin Laden."

The Albany Times-Union (9/9, Carleo-Evangelist) and Washington Times (9/9) also reported the story, and all three network news broadcasts on Friday reported on the five-month search for Phillips, including his addition last week to the FBI Most Wanted List. At air time, he had been surrounded but not apprehended. The CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 1:40, Pitts) reported that "Phillips stole his first bike in grade school, his first car in middle school, and today, the alleged cop killer made the FBI's 10 most wanted. At this hour, some 300 heavily armed Federal, state, and local law enforcement officers believe they've cornered Phillips near a golf course in upstate New York." ABC World News (9/8, story 8, 2:35, Donovan) noted, "The reward offered for information leading to the capture of Bucky Phillips has now reached $425,000. He's a national figure." NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 8, 2:35, Williams) also reported, "He is one of the most wanted men in this country." In addition to Friday's network news coverage, virtually every cable news program on CNN, MSNBC and Fox News on Friday evening and throughout the day Saturday reported on Phillips' arrest.

CIVIL LAW:

Contractor Fraud In Iraq Is Alleged. The New York Times (9/9, Glanz, 1.21M) reports, "A former employee of a Halliburton subsidiary claims that she was fired for revealing to her managers that the company was charging the government fraudulently inflated costs for military facilities it ran in Iraq, according to court papers unsealed yesterday." She charged that KBR "employees faked head counts to inflate its charges for operating recreational and dining facilities, and led a relatively lavish lifestyle by appropriating food and equipment meant for the troops." Julie McBride's allegations against KBR represent "the second corporate whistleblower case to emerge from Iraq. In the first, a jury found the security company Custer Battles guilty of inflating invoices by $3 million, but the case is now going to appeal after a judge held up the settlement.

The AP (9/9, Hastings) reports the same story, observing, "Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg, Brown & Root charged millions to the government for recreational services never provided to U.S. troops in Iraq, including giant tubs of chicken wings and tacos, a widescreen TV, and cheese sticks meant for a military Super Bowl party, according to a federal whistle-blower suit unsealed Friday. Instead, the suit alleges, KBR used the military's supplies for its own football party." McBride "alleges that KBR deliberately overstated the number of military personnel using its services by counting the same person several times." The AP quotes two other KBR employees who blamed the company for defrauding the government, including instances of serving "spoiled food" to troops.

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Miller, 918K) also reports the story, writing, "The accusations in the lawsuit are the latest involving Halliburton's controversial multibillion-dollar contract to feed and house American soldiers in Iraq. Democrats have been quick to criticize the company, which was run by Vice President Dick Cheney from 1995 to 2000." Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), "the leader in Congress in attacking Halliburton, said that the charges were further proof of war profiteering by the oil services giant."

The Houston Chronicle/Bloomberg (9/9, O'Reilly) reports, "On June 27, the U.S. declined to take part in the case, according to court records. The False Claims Act allows individual whistle-blowers to sue on behalf of the government and recover part of any settlement or verdict. The Justice Department then decides whether to take part, and while plaintiffs may continue to pursue a case if the U.S. declines to join, they must do so at their own expense. … Cynthia Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the complaint but said the agency 'diligently investigates all allegations before determining whether or not to intervene.'"

Red Cross Fined For Violating Blood Safety Laws. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 9, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Food and Drug Administration has fined the Red Cross $4.2 million for violating blood-safety laws. The violations include failing to ask donors the right questions, not following test procedures. But officials say there's no evidence anyone suffered health problems from these violations."

Judge Dismisses Whistleblower Suit By Former Pfizer Official. Bloomberg (9/9, O'Reilly, Pettypiece) reports, "Pfizer Inc., the world's largest drugmaker, won dismissal of a 'whistleblower' lawsuit by a former executive who accused the company of promoting unapproved uses for Genotropin, a growth hormone." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. District Judge Joseph Tauro in Boston dismissed the suit by Peter Rost, who was a vice president of marketing at Pfizer until he was fired in December 2005. Rost said in a telephone interview that he plans to appeal. … Rost sued Pfizer in 2003 under the False Claims Act, alleging the New York-based company illegally promoted Genotropin for so-called off-label uses and gained sales of $50 million in 2002 as a result. Rost has criticized the drug industry, including Pfizer, for positions such as opposing legislation that would allow Americans to buy drugs abroad. He is also suing Pfizer for wrongful termination in a separate case." Bloomberg adds, "Rost's suit 'fails to identify one actual false claim that was submitted to the government for the reimbursement of an off- label prescription of Genotropin,' Tauro said in his Aug. 30 order. 'No matter how likely the existence of false claims, this court cannot speculate that such claims inevitably flowed from defendants' activities.'" Bloomberg adds, "The Justice Department in December said it wouldn't join Rost's suit. He was fired the same day."

ANTITRUST:

Michaels Gets Antitrust Nod For Buyout. Bloomberg (9/9) reports, "The $6 billion sale of Michaels Stores Inc. to Bain Capital LLC and Blackstone Group LP won U.S. antitrust clearance, according to a list of terminated merger reviews published by the government." Bloomberg continues, "The sale of the biggest U.S. arts and craft retailer to the two private-equity firms was on the list published by the Federal Trade Commission. Bain Capital and Blackstone agreed June 30 to purchase equal shares of Michaels Stores, based in Irving. … Under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, transactions of more than $56 million must be reported to the Justice Department and FTC to give the agencies an opportunity to determine if they might violate antitrust laws. The agencies have 30 days to decide whether to open an investigation or terminate the merger review." Bloomberg adds, "The Justice Department is investigating Michaels' granting of stock options since 1996. A company spokesman said yesterday that an internal review conducted by an independent legal counsel found no evidence to support a conclusion that there was intentional misconduct."

The Dallas Business Journal (9/9) reports, "The move was published on the Federal Trade Commissions list of early termination notices. An early termination is granted only when the FTC and the Department of Justice Antitrust Division have completed their review of the deal and determined not to take any action. … The deal is expected to close late during the third quarter or early in the fourth quarter."

Alltel To Sell Minnesota Operations In Antitrust Deal With DOJ. RCR Wireless News (9/8, Silva) reports, "The Justice Department said Alltel Corp. agreed to sell wireless assets in several rural Minnesota markets as a condition to antitrust approval of its $1 billion purchase of regional operator Midwest Wireless. … 'The department's action ensures that wireless telephone consumers will continue to obtain the benefits of competition—lower prices and higher quality,' said Thomas Barnett, chief of the department's antitrust division. 'The required divestitures preserve competition in rural areas where consumers often have fewer choices for wireless telephone services.'" RCR continues, "The state of Minnesota supports the divestiture, in which Alltel will get rid of mobile phone systems in four rural markets where Midwest also offers service, and the issue is now headed to a federal judge for consideration. The Federal Communications Commission too is expected to rule on the Alltel-Midwest Wireless deal by month's end. … U.S. Cellular Corp. previously warned the FCC that an Alltel-Midwest tie-up would hurt competition in southern Minnesota." RCR adds, "Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., is the nation's fifth-largest mobile phone operator, serving around 11 million customers. Alltel also provides roaming and other wireless services in 35 states to other mobile wireless providers who use CDMA, TDMA and GSM technologies. Alltel had wireless revenues of approximately $6.6 billion last year."

US Pressures Realtors Over Listings Service. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (9/9, Derus) reports, "America's online home shoppers might get a broader view of their choices, because of the Federal Trade Commission. … Regulators want Multiple Listing Service operations to publicly market all 'for sale' listings - not just the ones that guarantee Realtors full sales commissions. Realtors, a trademarked group, created and run the nation's estimated 900 MLS databanks, which showcase all houses for sale listed by Realtors. .. 'We say people should be free to choose,' said Patrick J. Roach, deputy assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Competition. … 'Upwards of three-quarters of people who buy homes use the Internet, and most of what's out there are sites fed by MLS,' Roach said. 'If its rule says that, if you vary from the traditional form of listing agreement, this house is not going to be visible to the general public - well, from an antitrust perspective, that means a bunch of competitors are dictating terms for all agreements.'" The Sentinel adds, "Roach said his Washington, D.C., agency is challenging such rules where it finds them. In the past week, it logged its first two victories. .. .The Austin, Texas, Board of Realtors signed a consent order agreeing to treat all listings equally, and the Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin said it would begin sending exclusive agency listings to www.realtor .com, the biggest public-access site, and the Internet Data Exchange clearinghouse for brokers' sites."

FTC Gives Antitrust Approval To GE's Purchase Of Kinder Morgan Unit. Market Watch (9/9) reports, "General Electric Co. has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the natural gas unit of Kinder Morgan Inc." MarketWatch continues, "The FTC said Friday that it granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. … General Electric's energy unit will buy Kinder Morgan's U.S. natural gas retail operation for $710 million." MarketWatch adds, "The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires under certain circumstances that prospective acquirers of voting securities or assets apply for clearance from regulators. Requests for early termination or clearance are granted when the Federal Trade Commission and the antitrust division of the Department of Justice have determined that they won't take enforcement action during the waiting period."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Dept. Blocks Temporary Nuclear Waste Storage On Reservation. The New York Times (9/9, Stolz, Wald, 1.21M) reports the Interior Department "has moved to block a huge 'interim' nuclear waste storage plant on an Indian reservation here [Skull Valley, UT], citing a lack of confidence that it would truly be temporary because there is so much doubt about completion of a permanent repository, at Yucca Mountain, Nev. But sponsors of the project, which was granted a license by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in February, said that the Interior Department decision had numerous errors and that they were considering an appeal." The Interior Department "said that acting as a 'prudent' trustee of Indian lands, it could 'derive no confidence from the public record' that there would be someplace for the fuel ultimately to go."

Delaware Refinery To Begin Pollution Curbs. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (9/9, Montgomery) reports, "A multi-million dollar system that will tame one of Delaware's largest single air-pollution sources is expected to start up next week at the Valero refinery near Delaware City." The Journal continues, "The new sulfur dioxide 'scrubber' on Valero's petroleum 'coking' unit will demote its smokestack from one of the nation's top refinery sources of acid rain, smog and dust-forming emissions to something more typical of other nearby crude oil processors. … Valero planned to notify by letter thousands of residents who live within 5 miles of the development. … 'It's going to take out 19,000 tons a year of sulfur dioxide -- it's a huge amount, absolutely,' said Ravi Rangan, an environmental program manager for the Department of Natural Resources and Environmental Control." The Journal adds, "Rangan was one of the DNREC officials who helped pursue the refinery's various owners for years over uncontrolled sulfur dioxide emissions and other pollution offenses. The effort eventually wound up in federal and state courts, producing corporate agreements to install two sulfur scrubbers now slated to start up before the end of the year. .. .The Environmental Protection Agency, DNREC and state and federal justice departments collaborated on the settlements and related penalties -- approved in early 2001 and later amended. Recent estimates of the scrubber costs to the refinery have ranged as high as $400 million."

Judge Orders Halt To Petroleum Lease Sales. The AP (9/9, Lee) reports, "Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne expressed confidence in an upcoming oil lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska when he visited the North Slope last week. 'We're set to go forward,' Kempthorne said after taking a helicopter ride over a section of the vast reserve. But that sale will likely have to wait." The AP continues, "A judge on Thursday temporarily halted lease sales of more than 1 million acres in the NPR-A that environmentalists say are essential feeding and breeding grounds for caribou and migratory birds. … Nearly 13 million acres of the reserve in northern Alaska are available for lease sale or have been sold to oil companies, most notably ConocoPhillips. The company hopes to augment waning crude stocks in the Prudhoe Bay fields east of the NPR-A." The AP adds, "Environmentalists filed the lawsuit against the Department of the Interior, the state of Alaska and oil companies in hopes of cordoning off about 600,000 acres of the 23-million acre reserve from more exploratory drilling. The government had planned to open bids on Sept. 27 for about 1.7 million acres, which encompass the area targeted by environmentalists. … ConocoPhillips has its eye on the contested area, which holds a potential 2 billion barrels of oil beneath the permafrost near Lake Teshekpuk. … The order, filed in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, said the government had not adequately considered the cumulative environmental effects of the lease sales in the eastern and western sections of the reserve." The AP notes, "Environmental impact statements addressed the effects of leasing individual parcels, but those reports were too narrow in scope because they did not consider how leasing in the northeastern part of the reserve would affect land and wildlife in the northwestern section, according to the order. … U.S. District Judge James Singleton chastised the defendants for the oversight, writing that they 'violated the National Environmental Protection Act.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Predicts Border Fence Spending Will Limit Fallout Over Immigration Impasse. The Washington Post (9/9, A5, Babington, 748K) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said that although "Congress will not address major immigration revisions before the Nov. 7 election…he and his allies hope to limit political damage to their party by telling voters they have poured millions of dollars into one component of the controversy: tightening the border with Mexico." Frist "acknowledged that a broad-based immigration bill, backed by President Bush and passed by the Senate, is dead for now. But Republican leaders have added money for border fences and patrol agents to recent spending measures dealing with the Pentagon and homeland security. Frist said he thinks that step may lessen public anger over the porous border and the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country. 'We need to message very well the fact that we have increased over the last two years…the level of funding for immigration and border control fourfold, the fact that by the time we finish here in four weeks we will have 375 miles of fence being built and being funded…and the fact that stopping people at the border coming across has increased…by 25 to 30 percent in the last eight months,' Frist told reporters."

Stalled Legislation Blamed For Weak Turnout At Immigration Rallies. The Washington Post (9/9, B4, Aizenman, Klein, 748K) reports, "In April, Jose Martinez was among the giddiest participants in a pro-immigration rally that attracted more than 100,000 demonstrators to the Mall. … But Thursday afternoon, while immigrants and their supporters were convening on the Mall for a reprise of the April 10 rally, Martinez, 43, was back in the auto shop. … 'No, I'm not going. I'm not motivated this time,' said Martinez." According to the Post, "It was a refrain repeated across the Washington region as immigrants sought to explain how a demonstration that organizers had predicted would mobilize hundreds of thousands fizzled into a gathering of less than 5,000 demonstrators, most from out of town. Rallies in other cities this week drew similar numbers. Many locals who did participate Thursday appeared to be union members bused in by their leaders." One marcher "speculated that fewer people might have shown up because a restrictive immigration bill that loomed large in the spring had stalled after winning House approval. … Meanwhile, a Senate bill that would permit illegal immigrants to legalize their status after paying a fine also stalled, causing some immigrants to lose faith in rallies as engines of change."

System Linking Fingerprint Checks With Immigration Violations Tested. The New York Times (9/9, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "Immigration officials will automatically be notified anytime the local or state police do a federal fingerprint check on a suspect who also happens to be wanted for serious immigration violations, under a new system being tested in Boston. The automated notification is part of a Department of Homeland Security program that could expand the role that the local and state police nationwide play in the immigration enforcement effort. To federal officials, it is a natural next step as police forces have hundreds of thousands of officers who routinely come into contact with illegal immigrants, while Immigration and Customs Enforcement has a squad of only about 6,000 criminal investigators."

Hazelton, Pennsylvania Approves Revisions To Law Aimed Meant To Curb Illegals. The AP (9/9, Rubinkam) reports the City Council of Hazelton, PA "gave tentative approval Friday to an overhaul of an anti-illegal-immigration law considered to be one of the nation's toughest, hoping to put the measure on sounder legal footing. Like the version it will replace if granted final approval Tuesday, the new ordinance punishes businesses that employ illegal immigrants and landlords who rent to them. The revisions, however, remove much of the burden that had been placed on businesses. They soften penalties, give landlords and businesses time to correct violations and leaving it to city officials to verify workers' immigration status with the federal government." The AP notes, "Since the council adopted the original law in July, many municipalities around the nation have approved or considered similar measures."

TAX:

Telecom Official Pleads Guilty To $200 Million Tax Fraud Scheme. The Financial Times (9/9, Grant) reports, "Walter Anderson, a US telecommunications businessman, on Friday pleaded guilty to evading over $100m in taxes in biggest criminal tax fraud in US history." The Times continues, "Mr Anderson was indicted last year on charges that he evaded over $200m in federal income taxes over five years, partly by hiding $450m in earnings at Barclays Bank in the Channel Islands and other offshore accounts. … Prosecutors alleged he concealed his identity as owner of two telecommunications companies in the 1990s through an elaborate web of private mail boxes, including one in the Netherlands." The Times adds, "A search of his home in Washington, DC revealed he had created seven aliases. Officials seized manuals showing how to disguise identities, including one entitled: 'Poof! How to Disappear and Create a New Identity.'"

The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports, "Mr. Anderson started a long-distance telecommunications business in the 1980's as the industry was being deregulated. When his first company, Mid-Atlantic Telecom, merged with another company in 1992, Mr. Anderson formed corporations in the British Virgin Islands to hide the income, prosecutors said. … Authorities said Mr. Anderson used other offshore corporations to disguise his ownership in other telecommunications companies that earned more than $450 million from 1995 to 1999." The AP adds, "Mr. Anderson, who prosecutors said did not file federal income tax returns from 1987 to 1993, has been held without bail since his arrest. Prosecutors say he owes $170 million in federal taxes and $40 million in Washington income taxes."

The Washington Post (9/9, B1, Weiss) reports, "Anderson pleaded guilty at the federal courthouse in Washington to three felony charges -- two for evading federal taxes and one for defrauding the D.C. government with a phony tax return. Among other things, Anderson admitted earning more than $126 million in 1998, a year that he claimed an income of $67,939 on his federal tax return. He paid $495 in taxes that year, authorities said. … 'This case sends a strong signal to anyone thinking about going offshore to avoid taxes,' IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a statement. 'We have stepped up our efforts to pursue high-income tax cheating, whether it takes place in the United States or overseas.'" The Post notes, "In return for his guilty plea, prosecutors dropped nine felony charges. According to the agreement, Anderson and prosecutors have settled on a maximum sentence of 10 years. In court yesterday, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman indicated that he will go along with the agreement at sentencing Jan. 16. … His attorneys -- including a federal public defender -- have repeatedly sought to have Anderson released on bond. They urged the judge yesterday to cut him loose until sentencing, saying Anderson needed the time to, among other tasks, clean up his aging parents' garage and file his taxes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Asserts GOP Will Maintain Majorities In Congress. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he rejected the notion of a Democratic takeover of the House saying, "That's not going to happen." Bush "had been saying that he hoped to revisit Social Security reform next year, when he 'will be able to drain the politics out of the issue,' and I rudely interrupted by noting the polls predicting Ms. Pelosi's ascension." Bush adds, "I believe the Republicans will end up being -- running the House and the Senate. And the reason why I believe it is because when our candidates go out and talk about the strength of this economy, people will say their tax cuts worked, their plan worked. … And secondly, that this is a group of people that understand the stakes of the world in which we live and are willing to help this unity government in Iraq succeed for the sake of our children and grandchildren, and that we are steadfast in our belief in the capacity of liberty to bring peace."

Bush To Focus On Social Security In 2007. In its coverage of President Bush's commemoration of the 9/11 attacks the Washington Post (9/9, A4, Asthana, Fletcher, 748K) notes, "Bush said this week he would like to revisit Social Security reform next year." He "failed last year to persuade Congress to overhaul the New Deal-era program, including the creation of private investment accounts and a reduction of guaranteed benefits for future retirees. His staff has said he is exploring the issue, but his comments to" the Wall Street Journal "were the most definitive that he wanted to try something again -- although he did not say exactly what."

Bush Delays Meeting With US Automakers, But Talks With Ford. The AP (9/9, Riechmann) reports President Bush "delayed a summit with the Big Three automakers, but he called a Ford Motor Co. executive as he flew here to raise funds for a Republican facing a tough Senate race. … Democrats — and Dick DeVos, the Republican gubernatorial candidate in Michigan — say the delay in scheduling the meeting shows Bush is not taking seriously the concerns of a major manufacturing sector and its employees.

The New York Times (9/9, Maynard, 1.21M) reports, "Although he has put off a meeting with Detroit automotive leaders until after the November elections, President Bush called the chairman of Ford Motor on Friday, only days after the struggling automaker named a new chief executive. … Bush's call to the Ford chairman, William Clay Ford Jr., came as the President flew to the Detroit area, where he attended a fund-raising event north of Detroit for Mike Bouchard, the Republican candidate for the United States Senate. Mr. Bouchard is challenging Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Democrat who is completing her first term. During the call, Mr. Bush discussed the changes taking place at Ford, which is struggling to hang on to second place in the American car market. As soon as next week, Ford will announce new steps under its restructuring plan, called the Way Forward, which are expected to include more plant closings, job cuts, and buyout offers." The Times notes, "White House officials said Mr. Bush phoned Mr. Ford because the two are friends."

The Detroit Free Press (9/9, Hyde, 346K) reports, "Raising money for a Senate candidate may have been President George W. Bush's motivation for visiting Michigan on Friday, but he spent at least a few minutes discussing Detroit's auto industry. Bush called Ford…to personally deliver a pledge to meet with the heads of the Detroit automakers after Election Day, aiming yet again to calm the tempest stirred by Michigan Democrats over the lack of a date for the meeting.

Democrats Blast Bush For Failure To Schedule Meeting. The Detroit News (9/9, Cain, Shepardson) reports Bush "made the call amid mounting criticism that he has refused to schedule a meeting with executives from the Big Three to discuss domestic carmakers' problems. White House spokesman Alex Conant said the president called Ford because the two men are friends. 'He looks forward to meeting with the Big Three CEOs after the election,' Conant said. Bush and Ford also talked about the recent hiring of Alan Mulally as the new CEO and president of Ford." Rep. John Dingell, "who has repeatedly criticized the president for his dealings with domestic automakers, was not impressed by the phone call. 'The auto industry wonders who's he working for: us or the foreign automakers,' Dingell said." Sen. Debbie Stabenow "was also critical of the president. 'This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need,' Stabenow said."

New Isikoff And Corn Book Details Cheney's Attempt To Influence Armey. Newsweek (9/9, 3.12M) publishes an excerpt from "Hubris," the new Michael Isikoff and David Corn book "about how the Bush administration sold the Iraq war to its supporters," detailing "the previously untold story of how Dick Armey, who was then House majority leader and a silent skeptic about Iraq, succumbed to Vice President Dick Cheney's pressure—much to Armey's later regret."

Higher-Income Seniors Will Pay More For Medicare Starting Next Year. McClatchy (9/9, Pugh) reports, "After 41 years of charging most older Americans the same price for the same care, Medicare will require affluent seniors to pay higher monthly premiums for coverage of doctors' visits, diagnostic tests and outpatient hospital care beginning in 2007. A little-known provision of the 2003 Medicare Modernization Act calls for an estimated 1.5 million seniors to face premium hikes ranging from 10 to 55 percent over the next three years if they earn at least $80,000 a year, or $160,000 for married couples. Seniors who earn more than $200,000 and couples with incomes over $400,000 will see their so-called 'Part B' premiums rise the most. The move, designed to help shore up Medicare's shaky finances, has enraged many because it was adopted without public debate. A Republican-led conference committee added the measure to the Medicare bill even though neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate version contained it."

Atlantis Teams Prepping For Last Launch Attempt. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It was no-go again today for space shuttle Atlantis, when a fuel tank sensor failed. NASA has been trying for two weeks to send the shuttle and its crew to the International Space Station. And they're going to try again tomorrow. And ABC News will carry the shuttle launch live tomorrow, if NASA goes through with it, at 11:15 a.m. Eastern Time."

The New York Times (9/9, Leary, 1.21M) notes, "The effort on Saturday, scheduled for 11:14 a.m., will be the shuttle's last chance before the end of the month to lift off for an 11-day mission to resume construction of the International Space Station. Weather forecasters said conditions at the Kennedy Space Center here should be very good on Saturday morning, with only a slight chance of showers."

In an article titled, "Last-Ditch Launch Attempt," the Los Angeles Times (9/9, Johnson, 918K) reports inside its "A" section, "If the space agency can't get the shuttle off the pad, the launch will have to be put off for weeks, increasing the scheduling pressure on NASA as it works to finish construction of the International Space Station before the shuttle is retired in 2010. The launch window closes after today because a later launch would conflict with the arrival at the space station of a Russian Soyuz craft, which is carrying a new crew. Even if Atlantis launches on schedule, it will be undocking from the space station only 12 hours or so before the arrival of the Soyuz flight."

USA Today (9/9, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "The hatch already had been sealed on Atlantis' crew compartment in preparation for a 11:41 a.m. ET blastoff when launch director Michael Leinbach came onto the radio at 10:54 a.m. ET to break the news. He told the six astronauts that technicians will drain the shuttle's fuel tank and prepare for a possible launch Saturday." USA Today adds, "A Saturday launch would create a delicate job for above-the-air traffic controllers because within 21 hours three spaceships would come and go from the space station. If Atlantis launches Saturday, it would undock from the space station at 9 a.m. ET on Sept. 18, just nine hours after the Soyuz would launch. And 12 hours after the shuttle undocks an unmanned Progress resupply ship also leaves the space station.

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks End Week With Rally. In a brief story, NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 9, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "After two days of losses, Wall Street ended the week on a high note." The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Mckay, 2.03M) reports, "Stocks rallied to end an otherwise rocky week of trading, helped by a decline in crude-oil prices to a five-month low and comments by the president of the Cleveland Federal Reserve." The Journal notes, "n particular, traders celebrated the fact that, as the weekend approached, no major storms were threatening offshore drilling facilities in the Gulf of Mexico. On many Fridays in the past, traders have bought futures in order not to be "caught short" in the event of a crisis while markets were closed over the weekend."

Bloomberg (9/9) notes, "The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 4.90, or 0.4 percent, to 1298.92. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 60.67, or 0.5 percent, to 11,392.11. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 10.50, or 0.5 percent, to 2165.79." But "The S&P 500 dropped 0.9 percent since last Friday, the biggest decline since the period ended Aug. 11. The Dow average lost 0.6 percent and the Nasdaq retreated 1.3 percent."

The New York Times/AP (9/9) in an article titled "A Brief Rebound But Losses For The Week" reports similar details.

Rising Wages Spurs Decrease In Consumer Borrowing. The New York Times/Bloomberg (9/9) reports, "Consumer borrowing increased less than expected in July as higher incomes allowed Americans to reduce their credit card use." Bloomberg adds, "Rising wages gave Americans more cash to spend as they went to shopping malls and auto dealerships in July. Consumer borrowing and spending may slow in coming months as the cooling housing market dents confidence and household wealth."

The AP (9/9, Crutsinger) adds, "The Federal Reserve reported Friday that consumer borrowing rose at an annual rate of 2.8 percent in July, down from an increase of 7.3 percent in June." It "was led by a sharp deceleration in credit card debt, which rose by just 3.4 percent in July after gains of 13.2 percent in June and 13 percent in May."

States Must Find Jobs For Welfare Recipients To Meet Federal Requirements. The AP (9/9, Freking) reports, "The welfare rolls aren't dropping as fast as they used to, and that could pose a big money problem for states from coast to coast after a new federal law takes effect next month. The states' task: find jobs for tens of thousands of people on welfare or risk losing millions in federal money. More than two dozen states have work to do, including Pennsylvania, California and Michigan. The law requires states to place into job training, community service or other work activities 50 percent of their households that get welfare aid — and 90 percent of two-parent households that receive assistance." Wade Horn, assistant secretary at the Department of Health and Human Services, is quoted as saying, "About a quarter of the states are really going to have to work hard."

Bush Attends Fundraisers For Bouchard And Talent. The AP (9/9, Riechmann) reports President Bush Bush "was in Michigan for a luncheon fundraiser for Mike Bouchard, the sheriff of Oakland County in suburban Detroit, who is running against" Sen. Debbie Stabenow. The fundraiser "raised $1.5 million for the Michigan Republican Party and Bouchard, who greeted Bush at the airport and rode in the motorcade. … Later, Bush traveled to Kansas City, Mo., where he raised $600,000 at another private event for Sen. Jim Talent, who is facing a difficult re-election challenge from Democratic state Auditor Claire McCaskill. The fundraiser drew hundreds of protesters — some carrying signs that said 'Bring 'em home' and 'No Iran War'."

The Detroit Free Press (9/9, Lam, 346K), in an article titled, "Bush's Speech Called Uplifting And Warm," reports President Bush "swooped in Friday afternoon for a fund-raiser at a palatial house in Clarkston, pleasing listeners with a casual, upbeat speech." Rep Mike Rogers "described Bush's remarks as relaxed, uplifting and warm. 'He talked a little about terrorism and the economy but spent more time talking about the trials and tribulations of being a wartime president,' Rogers said.

The Detroit News (9/9, Cain, Shepardson) reports, "On the drive from Flint's Bishop International Airport to Clarkston, the president's motorcade passed by supporters and protesters who lined the streets. Some applauded, some faced the other way showing the president their backs."

The Kansas City Star (9/9, Helling, Kraske, Canon, 278K) reports, "Air Force One landed uneventfully at Kansas City International Airport about 3:40 p.m. Friday and took off the same way at 6:31. In between, hands were shaken, politics were discussed, large checks were discreetly handled. On Ward Parkway, protesters protested. Across the street, reporters and photographers cooled their heels in a mansion under rehab. … Nothing for the public, nor any impromptu news conferences. He didn't stop at a barbecue pit, either. (He never does. What's up with that, anyway?) So no national ripples; don't go surfing CNN or FOX. Of course, it was pretty exciting if you were one of the 450 folks who were shuttled to the Scott Ward home at 1217 W. 55th St. and got to grip and grin with the big dog, the leader of the free world." The Star adds, "People who attended said Bush spoke about 45 minutes, mixing politics with policy, although he did not take questions. He told the gathering that Talent and Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, who also was there, would provide the help he needs to pass legislation expanding his authority to prosecute the war on terror." Former U.S. Rep. Wendell Bailey "said Bush talked about his 'commitment to the presidency rather than being the president. He's just hard to beat in that venue.'"

Romney Fails To Appear In Public With Cheney In Boston. The Boston Globe (9/9, Mishra, Levenson, 425K) reports, "Avoided in public by the state's leading Republicans, Vice President Dick Cheney arrived in Boston yesterday and was greeted by a boisterous protest and a well-heeled GOP crowd in the Back Bay. When Cheney's plane touched down at Logan International Airport, he was greeted by a little-known state representative from Shrewsbury and a small band of local officials. Governor Mitt Romney and Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey were nowhere in sight, and the vice president, whose poll numbers make him among the least popular political figures in the country, was whisked away in a black limousine." The Globe adds, "Cheney's visit created traffic snarls, and for a few afternoon hours, Back Bay became a congested circus. Sign-waving protesters chanted into bullhorns. A massive retinue of police officers and Secret Service agents lined the streets. … Inside the Harvard Club, Cheney spoke for about 20 minutes to nearly 300 guests, giving a public service award to Richard J. Egan , the founder of the Hopkinton-based EMC Corp. and a stalwart Bush supporter. He also spoke about the war on terrorism." The Globe notes, "In attendance yesterday were Romney , Healey , former governor Paul Cellucci and the new Turnpike Authority head, John Cogliano."

Lamont Praised Lieberman's Rebuke Of Clinton In 1998. The New York Times (9/9, Medina, 1.21M) reports Ned Lamont, "who this week chastised Senator Joseph I. Lieberman for his public rebuke of President Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal, wrote to Mr. Lieberman at the time praising the eloquence of his speech on the Senate floor. 'I supported your statement because Clinton's behavior was outrageous: a Democrat had to stand up and state as much, and I hoped that your statement was the beginning of the end,' Mr. Lamont, then a cable television executive, wrote in an e-mail message to the senator's Washington office on Sept. 16, 1998, two weeks after Mr. Lieberman's speech. … At the time, Mr. Lamont wrote that he had 'supported the moral outrage' Mr. Lieberman expressed reluctantly because he 'thought it might make matters worse,' adding that 'unfortunately, the statement was the beginning of a process that has turned more political and morally offensive.' He urged Mr. Lieberman to 'stand up and use your moral authority to put an end to this snowballing mess,' and suggested that 'It's time for you to make up your mind and speak your mind as you did so eloquently last Thursday.'" Lamont, "who declined to discuss the 1998 speech when an Associated Press reporter asked about it on Friday, was unavailable to explain the apparent discrepancy between his recent remarks and his e-mail at the time."

The AP (9/9, Christoffersen) reports Lieberman "defended his reprimand of former President Clinton for his involvement with a White House intern, dismissing rival Ned Lamont's claim that he turned the 1998 rebuke into a spectacle. 'It was important for someone who was a Democrat to stand up and call on him publicly to accept more responsibility for what he had done,' Lieberman said Friday. 'In that case, I stood up and did what I believed was right for our country.'"

Lieberman Must Build His GOTV Operation From The Ground Up. The New York Times (9/9, Medina, Healy, 1.21M) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman "has begun a complicated, occasionally clumsy tango as he tries to woo Democrats, Republicans and unaffiliated voters without the backing of any party." Lieberman "has been seeking Democrats while appealing to Republicans with tough talk about terrorism that is similar to President Bush's. He is mulling creating nonpartisan 'citizen town committees' because he must build a new voter-turnout operation from scratch. And he is calibrating his language to try to appeal across party lines without seeming inconsistent or awkward — though, at times, he does. No longer the Democratic nominee, he has lost a handful of union endorsements, and his allies in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. may stay neutral. His campaign must replace and train hundreds of field workers that the state party usually deploys to help turn out voters."

Nancy Reagan Asks Webb Campaign To Pull Ad Featuring President Reagan. The Washington Post (9/9, B1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports former first lady Nancy Reagan asked Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb "to not use a television commercial that shows former president Ronald Reagan praising Webb, his former Navy secretary. In a letter faxed to Webb at 5 p.m., the chief of staff of the Reagan Library in California urged him to not use footage from a speech by the former president at the Naval Academy in 1985. … 'Using the president's name, image or likeness implies endorsement which is neither fair nor respectful of any candidate, certainly not after President Reagan's death,' wrote Joanne Drake. 'At the direction of Mrs. Reagan, please refrain.'" Webb's campaign "immediately rejected the criticism and said it intended to proceed as planned by running the commercial in Norfolk, Roanoke and Northern Virginia."

The AP (9/9, Lewis) reports, "In a telephone interview, Edwin Meese, attorney general under Reagan, called use of the footage 'improper, unethical and very possibly illegal. ... For him to use video of Ronald Reagan to appear in a campaign ad to favor him is fraud.' The ad debuts days after Allen mailed campaign brochures that include a photo of a boyish looking Allen standing beside Reagan. The same photo and a Reagan quote appear on Allen's campaign Web site." Sen. George Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, "called the ads 'disingenuous and terribly hypocritical' and cited Webb's 1988 resignation, saying he 'quit on Ronald Reagan after he did not get his way as Navy secretary.'"

Many Voters In "Bellwether" Virginia Town Said To Be Undecided. The Washington Times (9/9, McLaughlin, 88K) reports on Bedford, VA which "has picked the Republican winners -- President Bush and Sens. George Allen and John W. Warner -- and Democratic winners Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner in Virginia's presidential, congressional and gubernatorial races since 2000."

Menendez's Ethnicity And Background Said To Hamper His Campaign. McClatchy (9/9, Clark) reports Sen. Robert Menendez "is staking his campaign to keep his Senate seat on staunch opposition to the war, lacing his speeches with the body count and price tag of the conflict. It's a strategy that Democrats hope to use to oust Republican incumbents. And it strikes a chord in this heavily Democratic state, where polls suggest that the war is increasingly unpopular. But Menendez's race…has turned into an unexpectedly close and increasingly contentious contest, to the puzzlement of strategists, who wonder whether his ethnicity is a factor." Menendez "voted against the war in Iraq, and he's outdone his opponent 3-to-1 in fundraising. Still, he finds himself neck and neck with Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr., a state senator with a brief record but an outsized name. … Some question whether Menendez's Hispanic roots - and surname - are playing a role in dampening the polls. 'Sad to say, but I do think the Latino surname may be hurting him on the margins,' said David Rebovich, a political science professor at New Jersey's Rider University Institute for New Jersey Politics. 'And there's a lot of skepticism about the Hudson County ties.' The campaign in many ways has revolved around Hudson County, a gritty collection of cities hard by the New York skyline that for years has welcomed newly arrived immigrants - and earned a reputation for political corruption."

Prosecutors Probe Nonprofit That Paid Menendez $300,000 In Rent. The New York Times (9/9, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "Federal prosecutors are reportedly examining the records of a nonprofit community agency in Hudson County that paid more than $300,000 in rent to…Menendez while also getting millions of dollars in federal grants with Mr. Menendez's help. WNBC-TV and The Star-Ledger of Newark reported on Thursday that the United States attorney's office had issued subpoenas to the agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, in Union City, this week. A spokesman for the United States attorney declined to confirm or deny those reports on Friday, and repeated attempts to reach the North Hudson Community Action Corporation were unsuccessful." Menendez "criticized the timing of the subpoenas as being politically motivated, and repeated his earlier assertions that he did nothing either illegal or unethical."

Debate Highlights Cardin And Mfume's Similarities. The Washington Times (9/9, Ward, 88K) reports, "One question remained after the two leading Democrats in Maryland's U.S. Senate primary debated for more than an hour in front of an audience of black pastors in Prince George's County yesterday. 'How do the two of you differ?' the moderator asked. 'A lot of times we seem to be very similar,' Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin said. 'I think we're different.' 'We get this question all the time,' said former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman. Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume, whose contest will be decided in Tuesday's primary, emphasized that they have avoided negative attacks and have focused on issues. … But after opening statements and 10 rounds of questions on issues ranging from the war in Iraq and genocide in Sudan to mandatory minimum sentencing and same-sex 'marriage,' their responses provided little to separate the two candidates."

Suburban Philadelphia's Three Close House Races Noted. McClatchy (9/9, Thomma) reports, "There are 435 elections for House seats this fall, but only a few dozen are competitive, and they're almost all in the Northeast and Midwest. Many of them are held by moderate Republicans in places, such as suburban Philadelphia, that went for Democratic presidential candidates Al Gore and John Kerry, as well as local Democrats such as Gov. Ed Rendell. Now, thanks in part to voters' anger at the war in Iraq and disapproval of President Bush, Democrats have an opportunity in these districts to take advantage of a shift away from the national Republican Party that was already occurring."

Wynn Faces Surprising Challenge From Liberal Activists. The Washington Post (9/9, B2, Wiggins, 748K) reports Rep. Albert R. Wynn "has not faced formidable opposition since he was elected in 1992. He has trounced challengers, returning to office with no less than 80 percent of the vote in a primary or general election. But Wynn is facing the political challenge of his career in Tuesday's Democratic primary against Donna Edwards, a lawyer and community activist who has mounted a vigorous and well-organized campaign to represent Maryland's 4th Congressional District. Edwards drew little attention when she filed campaign papers in April to run against Wynn, but she has raised her profile in part with the help of Internet bloggers, who support her positions on the environment, campaign finance reform and Iraq. Edwards opposes the war; Wynn voted for the resolution authorizing it." Wynn "has spent little time campaigning in past elections but has increased his number of public appearances in his district, which includes parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties."

Schwarzenegger Apologizes For Commenting On Legislator's Ethnic Background. ABC World News (9/8, story 7, 0:25, Gibson) reported Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "has found his way into a new controversy, recording remarks he made. The comments came during a closed-door meeting with his advisers in March. And today, he apologized and said the recording made him cringe." 'She's Puerto Rican or same thing or Cuban. I mean they all are very hot. They have the Black blood in them and part Latina blood in them.' Governor Schwarzenegger was speaking about California assembly woman Bonnie Garcia, who is Puerto Rican. She said she was not offended."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Salladay, Finnegan, 918K) reports, "Garcia, who has been campaigning for Schwarzenegger as one of his highest profile Latina supporters, said there was no need for apologies, because she refers to herself as hotblooded. The governor attended a fundraiser for Garcia's reelection campaign Thursday."

The New York Times (9/9, Steinhauer, 1.21M) reports Schwarzenegger's Democratic opponent, Phil Angelides, "released a statement chastising the governor. 'Once again, Governor Schwarzenegger has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state,' Mr. Angelides said. But Ms. Garcia, a Republican and an ally of Mr. Schwarzenegger, responded in kind. 'The only embarrassment in California today is Phil Angelides's sad and predictably partisan statement,' she said in a statement distributed by the Schwarzenegger campaign."

The Washington Post (9/9, A2, Pomfret, 748K) reports, "The action hero-turned-governor acknowledged that the tape-recorded comments made him 'cringe' when he read them in yesterday's editions of the Los Angeles Times."

The AP (9/9, Blood) notes Schwarzenegger, "in a tight re-election race, has displayed a more restrained, statesmanlike demeanor while all but retiring his trademark Hollywood swagger. But the newly disclosed remarks challenge that carefully managed image and provide a reminder of his history of off-the-cuff — and sometimes off-color — remarks."

Bush Focused On Diplomatic Solutions To Dilemma Posed By Iran. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he acknowledged he allowed former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami to visit the US because, "I'm interested in learning more about the Iranian government, how they think, what people think within the government. My hope is that diplomacy will work in convincing the Iranians to give up their nuclear weapons ambitions. And in order for diplomacy to work, it's important to hear voices other than [current President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's." The Journal notes, "The impression Mr. Bush leaves is of a man deeply engaged on the Iran problem and, like several presidents before him, trying to understand what kind of diplomatic or economic pressure short of military means will change the regime's behavior. One way or another, Iran will be the major dilemma of the rest of his presidency, and Mr. Bush knows it."

Khatami Warns US Against Strike On Iran. Time Magazine (9/9, Zagorin) interviews Khatami about the Iran-US relations, the Iraq war and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. By way of introduction, Times says, "As the most prominent of his nation's reformers, he repeatedly distanced himself from many of the hardline views of Iran's current leadership, but strongly critized the U.S. for what he suggested is 'arrogance' in Iraq. He also cited human-rights violations at both Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib, and warned of the 'costs' of a U.S. or Israeli military strike on his country. But he endorsed a 'two-state solution' to achieve peace between Israel and the Palestinians, and called the Holocaust a 'historical fact.'" Khatami says, "My opposition to Israel is moral. The peaceful solution to the problem of Palestine is to recognize Palestinian rights. This is the only way there could be sustained peace in the region." Khatami later says he believes "the Holocaust, which is an absolute fact, a historical fact, would be misused. The Holocaust should not be, in any way, an excuse for the suppression of Palestinian rights."

Treasury Blocks Key Iranian Bank From US Financial System. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Solomon, 2.03M) reports remarks by Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey that his staff "has blocked a major Iranian bank's access to the U.S. financial system, the latest step in Washington's growing attempt to isolate Iran." Bank Saderat, "one of Iran's largest state-owned banks, no longer will be able to use the U.S. financial system." Levey said the bank "had helped transfer hundreds of millions of dollars to terrorist organizations, including Hezbollah and Hamas." The Journal says the "quest to cut off Iran's support to Hezbollah gained urgency this summer when" the Israel-Hezbollah conflict broke out, and "the U.S. is eager to show that Iran can be cut off economically in the run-up to United Nations Security Council debates this fall that will focus on ways to impose economic sanctions for Tehran's refusal to" suspend uranium enrichment. The Journal calls yesterday's action "part of a broader Bush administration effort to hamper Iran's efforts to aid terrorism and acquire sophisticated weapons, by convincing other governments and financial institutions world-wide to stop doing business with Iranian-controlled companies."

The Washington Post (9/9, A11, Kessler, 748K) notes the Administration "has stepped up a broad effort to choke off Iran's ability to finance militant groups and acquire weapons technology by cutting off suspect banks and firms from the international banking system." That effort "has gathered steam in recent weeks" because of the uranium enrichment issue and the Israel-Hezbollah conflict. The Treasury Department is "accusing Bank Saderat of funneling $50 million to a Hezbollah-controlled firm since 2001."

The AP (9/9, Aversa) says the Administration is "stepping up the pressure on Tehran" with the Bank Saderat move." The AP explains, "While Iranian financial institutions are barred from directly accessing the U.S. financial system, they are permitted to do so indirectly through a bank in another country. The United States is closing down that avenue for Bank Saderat," but the move "doesn't apply to other Iranian banks." The action "marked the administration's latest effort to turn up the heat on Iran," and "is the latest step to financially clamp down on Hezbollah, which the United States says is bankrolled in large part by Iran."

Burns Holds Talks On Iran, Says US Pushing For Sanctions. The New York Times (9/9, Dempsey, 1.21M) reports Undersecretary Burns said publicly yesterday that Washington "wants the major powers to begin talks next week on a draft United Nations resolution against Iran if it does not halt its enrichment of uranium." He is quoted saying, "We are heading toward the U.N. Security Council to consider a sanctions regime." He further said that [his] meeting with the European diplomats, held Thursday, was 'the first time we sat together to discuss what type of sanctions' to impose on Iran. He said talks with them and the diplomats from Russia and China would resume Monday by conference call, and then shift to the United Nations." The AP (9/9, Jahn) says Burns "also dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-power coalition pushing Tehran to give up enrichment." The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Jahn) runs the AP report this morning.

Khatami Decries Terrorism "Masked" In Islam. The AP (9/9, Mann) details a speech last night by visiting former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami in which he "decried a wave of 'Islamophobia' that he said is being spread in the United States by fear and hatred of Islam in response to terror perpetrated by Muslims." Khatami is quoted, "In the crime of 9/11, two crimes were committed. One was killing innocent people. The second crime was masking this crime in the name of Islam." Khatami also told American Muslims that they "should show their countrymen by example that they, not terrorists, represent Islam." The AP notes, "The talk broke no new ground for Khatami, considered a reformist during his two terms as president that ended last year. He was among the first foreign leaders to condemn the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. His visit to the United States drew criticism from some politicians and others because of the bitter contention now under way between Iran and the United States over actions of his successor, Mahmoud Ahmedinejad."

Khamenei Said To Sideline Other Authorities To Solidify His Dominance. In an 1,841-word piece on its front page, the New York Times (9/9, A1, Slackman, 1.21M) profiles Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme spiritual leader and the "primary architect" of its "combative" foreign policy. "Cloaked in religious robes, with a black turban signaling that he is a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad, Ayatollah Khamenei delivers the same blistering anti-American, anti-British, anti-Israeli message as the president. His political evolution charts his own rise to power." Although he once "questioned the absolute power of Iran's supreme leader, saying Islamic law and the Constitution must come first," he "has emerged as an aggressive defender of his own right to have the final say in all matters of state and religion — a power he has not been afraid to exercise." Analysts believe Khamenei has sought "a more confrontational approach with the West because he grew disillusioned with the so-called confidence-building policy pursued by the reformist government of Mohammad Khatami." Khamenei has built "a political base among Iran's more fundamentalist circles, which are suspicious of the West. Along the way, he succeeded in sidelining most of those with independent authority, such as the former two-term president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, who pushed to select Ayatollah Khamenei as supreme leader."

Bush Remains Steadfast In Support Of Spreading Democracy In Mideast. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he dismissed critics who "are saying the Bush Doctrine of spreading democracy in the Middle East is dead." He "concedes that Hamas's 'militant wing,' as he calls it, is 'unacceptable.' But he says he sees a virtue in 'creating a sense where people have to compete for people's votes. They have to listen to the concerns of the street.' The answer is for other Palestinian leaders to out-compete Hamas to respond to those concerns. 'Elections are not the end. They're only the beginning. And, no question, elections sometimes create victors that may not conform to everything we want. … On the other hand, it is the beginning of a more hopeful Middle East."

Israel Lifts Naval Blockade Of Lebanon. The New York Times (9/9, Smith, 1.21M) reports Tel Aviv "lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon on Friday, releasing its last major chokehold on the country since war broke out in July." Critically "important for the Lebanese economy, ships loaded with cars, food and oil steamed toward Beirut." Tel Aviv "said it had turned over responsibility for patrolling the Lebanese coast to Italian warships, which would help the Lebanese Navy enforce a United Nations-mandated arms embargo against Hezbollah." The Times says Hezbollah likely "still has plenty of weapons, and they doubt that it would try to import more arms now in any case. Few Lebanese, meanwhile, believe the multinational naval presence can do much to stop any banned shipments that do come."

The Washington Post (9/9, A10, Cody, 748K) notes Tel Aviv "Israel lifted its eight-week-old maritime blockade of Lebanon on Friday, the United Nations announced, and within hours a gleaming white ship pulled into Beirut harbor carrying a load of appliances." Yesterday's shipping "lineup reflected Beirut's role as a regional hub for imports and exports, a major component of the Lebanese economy that withered under restrictions even after fighting ended."

The Financial Times (9/9, England, Morris) notes, prior to the lifting, "Lebanon said the blockade was costing the nation tens of millions of dollars a day and restricted the import of goods - many of which would come through the port - hampering efforts to reconstruct the country following Israel's bombardment. … The loss of business has been huge." The AP (9/9, Dakroub) says the lifting of the naval blockade ends "the country's two months of isolation as the task of preventing the entry of Hezbollah weapons falls to international warships patrolling offshore." It has also removed "a barrier that has stifled Lebanon and cost the country tens of millions of dollars as it tries to rebuild from the devastating 34-day war." The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Dakroub) runs the AP story this morning.

Siniora Said To Struggle To Hold Divided Lebanon Together. In an analysis piece, the Financial Times (9/9, Khalaf) notes Lebanese Primes Minister Fouad Siniora "focused on averting sectarian conflict and keeping a fractious government (in which Hizbollah is a minority partner) together. He balanced all concerned parties' demands but managed to win concessions, not least Hizbollah's consent to the deployment of the Lebanese army and an expanded UN" border force. "The work was hard, but managing the postwar period could prove more daunting. After projecting a common front during the war, Lebanon has emerged politically divided, socially polarised and with an economy in tatters."

Indian Mosque Bombing Kills 31, Wounds 100. The New York Times (9/9, Sengupta, Kumar, 1.21M) reports, "A series of explosions struck in and near the largest mosque in a flashpoint textile town in western India on Friday, killing more than two dozen people, wounding more than 100 and raising the specter of renewed sectarian clashes." The Times says the city of Malegaon has "a history of Hindu-Muslim violence," and notes the targeted mosque is "home to one of the largest Muslim cemeteries in the area." The three explosions "were unusual in that they seemed to target a heavily Muslim area," and "came three days after what now sounds like a prophetic warning from" Prime Minister Manmohan Singh "about the many-headed specter of violence threatening his country." India "has suffered a spate of terrorist attacks in recent years, including the July 7 commuter train bombings in Mumbai, which the authorities have blamed on Islamist militants setting up so-called sleeper cells across the country."

The Washington Post (9/9, A14, Naqvi, 748K) adds, "At least two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded Friday in the town of Malegaon in the western Indian state of Maharashtra, killing 31 people and injuring 125 more, most of them Muslim worshipers leaving a mosque after Friday afternoon prayers." TV "footage on Friday showed chaos as hundreds of people, mostly men in white skullcaps, rushed around in panic after the explosions. There were scenes of people carrying the bodies of the dead and injured. Doctors worked on bloodied survivors brought in on stretchers. People seeking loved ones viewed bodies laid out on the ground, covered by white shrouds."

The AP (9/9, Khan) reports, "Two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded in throngs of Muslims as they left Friday prayers at a mosque in this western Indian city, killing 31 people and wounding 100." Maharashtra Chief Minister Vilasrao Deshmukh "called the blasts 'a terrorist act,' and authorities — fearing revenge attacks across the country's fragile religious divides — clamped a curfew on Malegaon and put security forces on alert." The AP also noted the city "has long been the scene of violence between Hindus and Muslims. The city of about 500,000 people is 75 percent Muslim."

Saudi Muttawa Crack Down On Pet Sales. The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Abu-Nasr) reports Riyadh "religious police, normally tasked with chiding women to cover themselves and ensuring men attend mosque prayers, are turning to a new target: cats and dogs. The police have issued a decree banning the sale of the pets, seen as a sign of Western influence," within Jidda and Mecca. "The prohibition on dogs may be less of a surprise because conservative Muslims despise dogs as unclean. But the cat ban befuddled many, since Islamic tradition holds that the Prophet Muhammad loved cats." While "pet owning is not common in the Arab world," pet ownership has "become a fashion statement among Saudis" in recent years.

Beijing Appoints Polished, Knowledgeable Envoy To Pyongyang. The Washington Post (9/9, A11, Fan, 748K) reports Beijing "has appointed an outspoken career diplomat with extensive knowledge of the United States as its new ambassador to North Korea." Asian security experts "said the appointment of Liu Xiaoming, 50, suggests officials in Beijing are reassessing their relationship with Pyongyang and trying to find a new way to press discussions among China, North Korea and the United States." One analyst is quoted saying Liu "is young and capable, a new-generation diplomat who is outspoken and sees things with a sharp eye. One of his biggest advantages is his knowledge of the United States." Another expert said Liu's selection "is unlikely to affect the current deadlock in six-party talks over North Korea's nuclear program, but it shows that China is thinking about its relations with North Korea in a more comprehensive manner."

Russia Begins Destroying Nerve-Agent Chemical Weapons. The AP (9/9, Ingram) reports, "Engineers covered in head-to-toe protective gear inserted a neutralizing solution Friday into bombs filled with a nerve agent, officially starting the work of Russia's first plant for destroying the deadly chemicals. The opening of the Maradykovsky plant accelerates Russia's campaign to eliminate the world's largest arsenal of the toxins." The AP says the facility "will become a focal point of the push to meet an April 2007 target for Russia to destroy 20 percent of its stockpile." Russia has destroyed three percent of that stockpile, while the US has destroyed 39 percent of its chemical weapons. "Besides the Maradykovsky plant, Russia has two other chemical weapon destruction facilities, both built with generous foreign funding. The Maradykovsky plant is the only one for destroying nerve agents as opposed to blister agents."

Understaffed And Outmaneuvered, African Union Force Struggles To Keep Darfur Peace. The New York Times (9/9, Polgreen, 1.21M) reports, "The missing fuel and the struggle over who controls the main military airstrip in Darfur lays bare just how little autonomy the African Union force actually has as it struggles to keep a fragile peace in" Darfur. The AU force, "with its poor equipment and tiny contingent of 7,000 troops, had hoped to turn over command to a larger, better-equipped United Nations-led force at the end of the month. The Security Council has approved the step." Khartoum, however, "has refused, as it continues to press an offensive against some rebel factions. It has instead proposed keeping the African Union force in place, and from [the limitations put on that force by Khartoum], it is easy to see why." AU soldiers told the Times about "what has become an impossible mission — to oversee a peace deal most of the militants in this brutal conflict have signed and to monitor a cease-fire that hardly anyone respects." The Times adds, "But as weak as the African Union force is, nearly all agree it is better than none at all. Frantic diplomatic negotiations are now taking place to make sure some kind of peacekeeping force remains in Darfur, where hundreds of thousands of people have died and 2.5 million have been pushed from their homes in the fighting."

A Washington Post (9/9, A10, Timberg, 748K) piece this morning details the government's use of helicopter gunships against villagers and rebel forces. "Thousands of villagers have been victimized by government troops and proxy militiamen who killed, raped and looted. Now the government is intensifying an air war featuring Soviet-era Antonov planes jury-rigged into bombers and Mi-24 helicopter gunships turned against mud-and-thatch huts. New waves of shellshocked villagers have left their homes and trekked for days to bulging relief camps." The Post calls the 7,000-member AU force "a limited but crucial buffer against the government forces."

Bill Richardson Secures Salopek's Release. The Washington Post (9/9, A10, Timberg, 748K) reports Chicago Tribune Pulitzer-Prize winning journalist Paul Salopek "said from a Sudanese prison Friday night that the government would soon release him and two Chadian colleagues after a 34-day confinement." President Omar Hassan al-Bashir "agreed to release Salopek after meeting with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in Khartoum." Richardson announced that "the three men are expected to be freed" today. Salopek "will return to the United States with Richardson, though the details of their trip have not yet been finalized." He "said he hoped his experience would not prevent other journalists from coming to Sudan to cover Darfur." The New York Times (9/9, Polgreen, 1.21M) adds Khartoum said the releases would be done "on 'humanitarian grounds.'"

Blair Tells Brown He Will Step Down On May 4. The Financial Times (9/9, Blitz) reports UK Prime Minister Tony Blair and Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown "have reached an understanding that the prime minister will resign on May 4, paving the way for a new Labour leader to take office in mid-June." Gordon allies "said there was now a broad understanding between the two men that Mr Blair will announce next February that he intends to quit as party leader on May 4, 2007 -- one day after the Scottish and Welsh regional elections." Blair's Thursday announcement "amounted to a major victory for Mr Brown." Yesterday, former Home Secretary Charles Clarke "weighed into the leadership row saying Mr Brown's behaviour had been 'absolutely stupid.'" The Times notes Blair's resignation will begin a six-week Labor leadership campaign, "which will see Mr Blair's successor -- almost certain to be Mr Brown -- installed by mid-June."

The New York Times (9/9, Cowell, 1.21M) adds "a rancorous new debate erupted in the Labor Party" Friday, "threatening to upend the uneasy truce that followed a week of feuding between the men over the timing of Mr. Blair's departure. In the new uproar," Clarke "called Mr. Brown's recent behavior stupid." The Times adds, "The signs of restlessness suggested that some legislators were not satisfied with Mr. Blair's refusal to be pinned down on a firm departure date. Some people in Mr. Brown's camp now expect that to be early next May." Notably, the Times says, "some legislators said the duel had damaged Mr. Brown's prospects as an unchallenged successor."

The AP (9/9, Gardiner) adds, "Bitter infighting flared in Tony Blair's Labour Party on Friday as" Clarke "criticized the prime minister's likely successor." Blair and Brown "appeared to have reached a private understanding on the handover of power. But a sharp attack on Brown by Clarke — a Blair ally until the prime minister fired him in May — made clear the peaceful interval that party bigwigs had hoped for was unlikely to materialize." Clarke "harshly chastised Brown for the way he handled this week's party turmoil and said his succession as prime minister was not guaranteed. He said the grin on Brown's face as he emerged from Blair's 10 Downing St. office after handover talks with the prime minister had been provocative and poorly judged." The AP adds, "It was not clear what motivated Clarke's attack. Although he was long seen as a Blair ally, that relationship has grown chilly since his firing so his comments may not have been sanctioned by the prime minister's camp."

The Financial Times (9/9, Ben Hall, Blitz) reports, "Downing Street officials on Friday expressed private delight over a broadside fired at" Brown "by" Clarke, "saying the attack had rightly exposed features of the chancellor's character." The Times adds, "In a sign that Mr. Clarke's attack has emboldened the Blair camp, other figures close to the prime minister expressed pleasure that questions were being raised about Mr. Brown's behaviour. The private view reflects tensions between the camps in spite of the understanding on Mr. Blair's departure date." One source says "relations between the two men remain sore after a serious stand-off at a meeting in Number 10 on Wednesday.

Mr. Blair, in the presence of officials from both camps, accused the chancellor of plotting a coup against him."

An analysis piece in the Financial Times (9/9, Blitz) entitled, "Britain's Political Enigma," reports Brown "has taken a critical step to becoming Britain's prime minister." He "has never disguised his burning desire to succeed" Blair, and this week Brown "finally got something he long sought: a public assurance from Mr. Blair that he will quit Downing Street by next May." The Times calls the past several days "one of the most tumultuous weeks in recent British politics," and one "that has badly – probably fatally – damaged Mr. Blair." The Times continues, "Perhaps more remarkably, the week's events have also damaged Mr. Brown." For his part, Blair "remains one of the most arresting figures on the international stage," and in the US, "he enjoys mythical status as the sole sure ally of President George W. Bush in the war on terror. In Europe, Mr. Blair is regarded as the one person who has firmly shifted a party of the left to the centre ground." While Brown "enjoys none of this allure," but such an outlook "is to underestimate Gordon Brown. He deserves no less credit than Mr Blair for founding New Labour and making it a powerful electoral machine." He is also "the architect of the government's economic success – implementing reforms that have brought a decade of uninterrupted growth, low unemployment and interest rates. This, above all, is why his bid to succeed Mr. Blair is unstoppable."

LAT Says "Poodle" Label Ignores Blair's Accomplishments. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/9, 918K) says Blair is "wrongly caricaturized as Bush's poodle." While many UK political analysts "identify Blair's fatal affliction as his support for President Bush's foreign policy," the Times says, "It's not that simple." While "critics deride him as 'Bush's poodle,'" that is "a doubly unfair epitaph for Blair's tenure at 10 Downing Street." His "hawkish position on Iraq involves more than parroting Bush." Blair believes in intervening overseas when necessary, but, "quite unlike Bush, [he] considers these missions to go hand in hand with leadership on global warming, debt reduction in the Third World and aggressively reducing poverty worldwide. Blair has been the most articulate spokesman for what appears to be a political breed in retreat — the liberal internationalist."

Anti-Castro Journalists Fired For Taking Payments From The Bush Administration. The New York Times (9/9, Goodnough, 1.21M) reports, "The Bush administration's Office of Cuba Broadcasting paid 10 journalists…to provide commentary on Radio and TV Martí, which transmit to Cuba government broadcasts critical of Fidel Castro, a spokesman for the office said Friday. The group included three journalists at El Nuevo Herald, the Spanish-language sister newspaper of The Miami Herald, which fired them Thursday after learning of the relationship. Pablo Alfonso, who reports on Cuba for El Nuevo Herald, received the largest payment, almost $175,000 since 2001." The Times notes that "while the Castro regime has long alleged that some Cuban-American reporters in Miami were paid by the government, the revelation on Friday, reported in The Miami Herald, was the first evidence of that. In addition to Mr. Alfonso, the journalists who received payment include Wilfredo Cancio Isla, who writes for El Nuevo Herald and received about $15,000 since 2001; Olga Connor, a freelance reporter for the newspaper who received about $71,000; and Juan Manuel Cao, a reporter for Channel 41 who got $11,000 this year from TV Martí, according to The Miami Herald, which learned of the payments through a Freedom of Information Request."

Ailing Castro Overshadows Havana Summit. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, De Córdoba, 2.03M) reports, "When delegates from 116 countries gather for next week's Nonaligned Movement summit in Havana, the question uppermost in their minds will be whether their ailing host, Fidel Castro, is making his final bow on the world's stage. … Some U.S. officials surmise that Mr. Castro is suffering from a fatal stomach cancer, although they won't say so publicly. Earlier this week, Havana, which denies Mr. Castro has cancer, released a letter written by Mr. Castro that said he had lost 41 pounds in 37 days but was now recuperating at a 'satisfactory rhythm.' Mr. Castro has said he will receive dignitaries at the conference although there is no word on whether he will actually attend." According to the Journal, "If the event does amount to Mr. Castro's unofficial farewell from the global stage, Venezuela's fiery president, Hugo Chávez, stands ready to claim the title of heir apparent to his revolutionary mantle. He will be a visible presence at the conference."

Mexican Electoral Commission's Secrecy Stokes Fraud Suspicions. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Tobar, 918K) reports, "Top electoral officials and judges are feeding doubts about the outcome of Mexico's presidential vote by declining to release details about a recount of 4 million ballots and by moving quickly to destroy all 41 million ballots." While "the seven judges of the Federal Electoral Tribunal declared conservative candidate Felipe Calderon president-elect on Tuesday," its "300-page ruling on the vote left some experts shaking their heads." One academic "said that although the election was flawed, it was mostly a success. On election day, he said, all of the political parties praised the way the IFE conducted the vote." He "said he opposed granting public access to the ballots because there was no guarantee a 'citizen recount' would follow established standards. But he said the election had shown the need for new reforms, including improved regulation of the media and private financing of campaigns."

Colombian Drug Cartel Leader Captured. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "And police in Mexico have captured a top drug kingpin. A leader of a Colombian cartel responsible for nearly half the cocaine smuggled into this country. A US official tells CBS News Duran is now in Federal custody in New York City."

The AP (9/9, Watson) reports an Immigration and Customs Enforcement announcement that Mexican police "have arrested a reputed major figure in one of Colombia's largest and most feared drug cartels responsible for nearly half of the cocaine smuggled into the United States." Jaime Maya Duran "was arrested Wednesday by agents of Mexico's attorney general's office in Mexico City and flown immediately to New York, where he is under indictment on drug trafficking and money laundering charges." US Ambassador to Mexico Tony Garza said the "arrest 'shows the determination of U.S. and Mexican law enforcement authorities to pursue the most dangerous criminals, including those who thought they were untouchable.'" Maya Duran "and three other key lieutenants allegedly took over the Norte Valle cartel, based in Cartago, Colombia, after the ring's suspected leader, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante, was jailed in Cuba for attempting to enter the country with a false passport two years ago."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Seeks To Boost Support For War Against Terrorism With 9/11 Commemorative Events.

President Bush's efforts to boost pubic support for the global war against terrorism as the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks approach were analyzed in a number of prominent national newspapers Saturday morning. While the White House has signaled the 9/11 commemorative events will be non-partisan, Bush's efforts were framed in political terms.

The New York Times (9/9, A1 Sanger, Stolberg, 1.21M) in a front page story describes it as a "carefully calibrated strategy" and quotes presidential counselor Dan Bartlett saying, "You can never turn back the clock. … But we knew that news organizations and everyone else would be using this moment to define where we were five years later, and the president wanted to articulate his view, too." While the White House has downplayed the politics of Bush's 9/11 activities, "it is impossible to separate remembrance and politics" and GOP strategists "say the critical question is whether Mr. Bush still holds the power to alter the course of national conversation away from the Iraq war and back to the theme that has worked for them before, countering direct threats to the United States." Yet "there is another, related question as well: whether Republicans can succeed again in convincing the nation that Democrats cannot be trusted with keeping it safe." The Times notes, "The White House has signaled its intentions on that score and appears to be pivoting to a more openly political phase of its strategy, in which the administration and its allies will try to undermine the Democrats."

Similarly focusing on the political angle, the Washington Times (9/9, Dinan, 88K) in an article titled "Bush Resets Political Debate With Demands For Action" notes Bush garnered "top headlines three days in a row as he dropped several political hot potatoes into Congress' lap and demanded action this month." He "has honed in on one overriding message: Democrats can either join Republicans to pass bipartisan bills or they can try to block them and see how that plays in November." Bush " tried to put a face on the terrorists, asked Congress to approve his terrorist wiretapping program and announced he has transferred 14 top terrorists from CIA custody to the Defense Department. He called on Congress to authorize military commissions to try them." White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "That is the No. 1 priority right now."

And the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Dreazen, 2.03M) in an article titled "Bush 9/11 Tour Aims To Bolster Republicans" reports the Administration hopes Bush's trip to the 9/11 sites "can once more lift Republicans to victory." The Journal states, "With the Republican majorities in Congress endangered by economic uncertainty and public fury over the war in Iraq, the White House is striving to remind voters of its response to Sept. 11 -- part of a broader assertion that Republicans take the terrorist threat more seriously than Democrats do and are better prepared to defend against it." While the White House says Bush "will make the Sept. 11 commemorations as apolitical as possible by not giving prepared remarks, Bush's aides "believe terrorism remains a winning political issue for Republicans In recent meetings with lobbyists and political operatives, White House strategist Karl Rove and White House political director Sara Taylor said that Mr. Bush and other top administration officials would make regular reference to Mr. bin Laden and the threat posed by Islamic extremists in the eight weeks that remain until the elections, according to several of those in attendance."

Taking a more neutral tone in its coverage of President Bush's commemoration of the 9/11 attacks the Washington Post (9/9, A4, Asthana, Fletcher, 748K) notes, "The anniversary of the deadliest terrorist attack in the nation's history also will inspire a brief moment of bipartisan comity. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) will be among those joining Bush at the Pentagon ceremony. That evening congressional leaders from both parties will lead a commemoration of the national tragedy with speeches, a moment of silence and patriotic songs from the steps of the Capitol."

Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (9/9, Gerstenzang, 918K) notes, "The speech Monday evening will be the fifth address in 12 days Bush will have delivered on terrorism and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The previous speeches have delineated his policies, setting out markers that differentiate them from those of Democrats, without naming the opposition party." But "Snow said the speech Monday 'is not something where we're trying to draw bright lines to separate Democrats from Republicans.'" Snow said, "Bush would try to draw on the way the country responded to the attacks, which Snow said was 'nothing short of sensational, and it's something that could only have happened in this country.'"

And the AP (9/9) briefly notes White House press secretary Tony Snow's characterization of Bush's 9/11 activities. He "said Bush's address would not be a political speech or a charge to Congress for action. Rather, he said, it would be reflective of what Sept. 11 has meant and 'how we move ahead as a country in making use of the lessons of Sept. 11.. … It will have a note of optimism as well as sobriety about what we've been through."

Bush Confident US Public United In Support Of Winning War. Describing President Bush as confident and resolute the Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush on Iraq he "is a bit reflective, if also insistent about the costs of failure. 'I'm not surprised that this war has created consternation amongst the American people,' he concedes. 'The enemy has got the capacity to take -- got the willingness to take innocent life and the capacity to do so, knowing full well that those deaths and that carnage will end up on our TV screens. So the American people are now having to adjust to a new kind of bloody war. … Now, my view of the country is this: Most people want us to win. There are a good number who say, get out now. But most Americans are united in the concept -- of the idea of winning.'" Asked why "both Iraq and his larger antiterror policies have become so politically polarized. 'Well, first of all, I do believe there's a difference between the political rhetoric out of Washington and what the citizens feel. … But this is a different kind of war. In the past, there was troop movements, or, you know, people could report the sinking of a ship. This is a war that requires intelligence and interrogation within the law from people who know what's happening. … Victories you can't see. But the enemy is able to create death and carnage that tends to define the action."

Bush Losing Support Among "Security Moms". NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 6, 2:55, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, Among suburban voters, what a difference two years makes. In the summer of 2004, according to one poll, the President's job approval rating among married women with children, security moms, stood at 52%. Now it's fallen 12 points, just 40% approval. The concern that the President's plunging popularity will hurt Republicans this fall."

Poll Shows US Public Remains Concerned About Terrorist Attacks. ABC World News (9/8, story 3, 0:25, Gibson) reported, "With the fifth anniversary of 9/11 approaching, we have a new poll tonight, which shows the attacks are still having a profound effect on Americans. According to the ABC News survey, seven in ten Americans still think about the attacks regularly. And nearly eight in ten say the attacks changed their outlook in a lasting way. Giving many a sense of insecurity and vulnerability. Two other numbers to mention -- 55% believe the US is safer now than before 9/11. But only 38% say the government is doing all it can to prevent another attack."

Chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos on ABC World News (9/8, story 4,1:40, Gibson) said the poll shows concerns about a terrorist attack are "number five right now" on the list of top issues after "the economy, behind health care, behind rising gas prices. But this shows it has a deep cultural impact. Almost everyone, 95% of Americans know where they were at the moment of attack." Stephanopoulos added, "Women tend to think more about 9/11. And to worry more that it's going to happen again. And as you said, 55% of Americans think we're safer right now. But that masks a deep partisan divide. Almost 40 points, 76% of Republicans think we're safer. Only 39% of Democrats."

Bush's Focus On War On Terror Said To Risk Reminding Voters Of "Failures." In an analysis piece for the AP (9/9) Tom Raum writes, "President Bush is casting the war on global terrorism as the central issue of the midterm elections. But it's a risky political strategy. The approach carries reminders of failures in Iraq, prisoner treatment at Guantanamo Bay, warrantless wiretapping at home and Osama bin Laden's endurance abroad. … Democrats were quick to portray the president's recent statements — including his acknowledgment Wednesday of a secret CIA prison system and the movement of 14 high-profile detainees to Guantanamo — as an admission of failure."

Democrats Attack Bush Counter Terrorism Policies. The Washington Times (9/9, Bellantoni, 88K) notes the conflicting message some Democrats are offering reporting, "Democrats are challenging Republicans to put politics aside as they craft a resolution commemorating the anniversary of September 11, but also are accusing the majority party of making the country less safe in the five years since the terrorist attacks." Rep. Ed Markey said, "Today, we are still living in a state of homeland insecurity. … That is really what the Bush administration has as a legacy five years after 9/11." And House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer said, "September 11th is not a time for politics," but then proceeded "to outline his view of Republican security failures."

Lawmakers Split Over 9/11 Resolution. McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Talev) reports, "Republicans and Democrats can't agree on how to honor the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks five years after the tragedy pulled the nation together." In addition to non-controversial sections mourning the victims and condemning terrorism, "it also lauds several Republican-led legislative moves that Democrats opposed or sought to modify." The "Democrats want Republicans to strike those and other references to legislation. But, as of Friday, Republicans were holding firm."

Global Terrorism Seen As On The Rise. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, A6, Etter, 2.03M) in its "Hot Topics" column notes "Bush has made uprooting terrorists the focus of his presidency. Abroad, the president has tried to disrupt terror networks by sending U.S. forces into Afghanistan and Iraq." The Journal notes, "To the surprise of many analysts, there hasn't been another major terror incident in the U.S. since 9/11. Still, global terrorism is on the rise. In 2005 there were 4,960 terrorist incidents, up from 1,150 in 2000, according to the Terrorism Knowledge Base. Critics say the war in Iraq has helped create terrorists. The State Department said this year that terrorists are becoming more sophisticated."

Threat Of Terrorist Attack On US Seen As "Overblown". John Tierney in his column in the New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) highlights the opinions of Ohio State University professor John Mueller who downplays the threat of terrorism. Tierney says, "The Bush administration likes to take credit for stopping domestic plots, but it's hard to gauge whether these are much more than the fantasies of a few klutzes. Bush also claims that the war in Iraq has diverted terrorists' attention there, but why wouldn't global jihadists want the added publicity from attacking America at home, too?" Mueller concludes "that there just aren't that many terrorists out there with the zeal and the competence to attack the United States. In his forthcoming book, 'Overblown,' he argues that the risk of terrorism didn't increase after Sept. 11 -- if anything, it declined because of a backlash against Al Qaeda, making it a smaller and less capable threat than before. But the terrorism industry has been too busy hyping Sept. 11 and several other attacks to notice." Tierney states, "Compared with past threats -- like Communist sociopaths with nuclear arsenals -- Al Qaeda's terrorists are a minor problem."

WSJ Applauds Administration Efforts To Prevent Terrorist Attacks. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, 2.03M) in an editorial reviewing progress made in the years after the 9/11 attacks says lack of any new attack on US soil "should temper the criticism of those who claim that the U.S. policy of aggressively interrogating suspects has yielded no credible information, a point President Bush finally got round to making this week. And it is a strong rebuttal to the argument that, by invading Iraq, the Administration lost focus on the terrorist threat and made America less safe." The Journal applauds Bush's recent efforts to boost support for the war against terrorism "because the great challenge for this presidency is to remind Americans that the threat they face is undimmed even as the events of September 11 recede in memory. The costs of responding to 9/11 have been many, and the temptation is strong to think we can withdraw from Iraq, or from the larger Middle East without consequence to our own security. The abiding lesson of that day five years ago is that this is a dangerous illusion."

Thatcher Will Visit Washington, Meet Rice To Commemorate 9/11. AFP (9/9) reports former UK Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher "will attend events in Washington to mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, her office said." She is slated to accompany Vice President Cheney to a church service and commemorative ceremony Monday. Later, Thatcher "will attend a ceremony at the State Department, where she will meet" Secretary Rice.

Rice Will Meet MacKay, Visit His Nova Scotia Constituency To Commemorate 9/11. AFP (9/9) reports Secretary Rice "will mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001 attacks in Halifax, Canada, the State Department said." Assistant Secretary McCormack is quoted saying, "Secretary Rice wanted to go to Canada on September 11th as a way of thanking Canada and the Canadian people for all that they did on that day." Canadian willingness to host stranded American passengers "was just an extraordinary act of trust, generosity and kindness in a moment of need, and Secretary Rice wanted to travel to Canada to thank the Canadian government and the Canadian people for those extraordinary act."

DOJ_NMG_0060941

More Commentary. Michael Hirsh in a Newsweek (9/9, 3.12M) web exclusive faults Bush's rhetoric on the war against terrorism, contrasting it with former Presidents Harry Truman and Dwight Eisenhower who according to professor of defense analysis at the Naval Postgraduate School John Arquilla, "crafted grand strategy that everybody in America, right and left, accepted for decades. They knew they needed broad support. We don't have that now. We're trying to wage the war on terror with the support of only part of the American people." Hirsh adds, "Perhaps the only thing that is clear any longer is that the war on terror will continue for a long time to come. And so will the war of words over the war on terror."

Bush Defends Rendition Policy. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 3, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "NBC's Matt Lauer sat down today with President Bush, one of the topics they discussed -- the President's confirmation this past week of those secret CIA prisons. He asked if the President, if such facilities passed legal muster." NBC (Lauer) added, "You admitted that there were these CIA secret facilities." President Bush: "So why is that not within the law?" Lauer: "The Amnesty International say that secret sites are against international law." President Bush: "We disagree with them. My job is to protect you. Most American people, if I said we have who we think is the mastermind of 9/11, they'd say, why can't you get information out of him without torturing, which is what we did."

Judge Rejects Padilla Motion To Throw Out Evidence. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Blum, 918K) reports, "A federal judge has refused to throw out evidence related to the 2002 arrest of alleged Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport." The Times notes, "Rejecting defense lawyers' requests, U.S. Magistrate Stephen Brown said in a pair of rulings that jurors should be allowed to consider the terror suspect's statements prior to his arrest in May 2002, as well as items in his possession at the time including about $10,000 in cash, a cellphone and a phone book containing numbers for alleged Al Qaeda contacts. Brown's rulings, signed Tuesday, became public Friday."

Senators Work On Tribunal Formation. The New York Times (9/9, Zernike, 1.21M) reports, "The main Senate Republican in talks with the White House over bills to establish tribunals for terror suspects said Friday that a small set of problems divided the two sides and that they would negotiate through the weekend in an effort to reach a compromise. The senator, John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said '90 percent' of the proposal that the White House submitted this week reflected a proposal that he and other Republican senators who have taken the lead on the question had drafted over the summer." The disputes "include whether suspects can be excluded from their trials and what types of evidence would be admissible." Senator Lindsey Graham (R-SC) said that the administration's plan to "deny the accused the right to see and therefore respond to classified evidence" would be struck down by a court "in 30 seconds."

The Washington Post (9/9, 748K) editorializes, "President Bush appears to be hoping that, with an election just around the corner, Congress will not have the stomach to deny him the latitude he demands both on the trials themselves and on larger questions of the treatment of detainees. But quietly, over the past few weeks, a trio of Republican senators -- Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (Va.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John McCain (Ariz.) -- has put together a remarkably good alternative bill." The Post finds the alternative bill "superior to the president's proposal."

Graham Insists On Defendants' Right To See Evidence. McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Rosen) reports, "Sen. Lindsey Graham said Friday that he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them." Graham remarked, "I don't feel good about telling someone - no matter who they are - `We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why." He "said that every general and admiral at the top of the country's military justice system agrees that classified information can be shared with accused terrorists without jeopardizing national security."

Time magazine (9/8) also reports on Graham's misgivings that Bush built "a bridge too far." As the "only serving judge advocate general in the armed forces" in the Senate, Graham has "authority" on the issue of allowing detainees to see evidence used against them. Time observes that, while generally a reliable conservative vote for the administration, Graham has "trumped" his own party's leadership on the issue.

Bush Has "Raised His Game." In the New York Times (9/9, 1.21M), columnist Roger Cohen writes, "A lot of words have been expended on President George W. Bush these past years, many of them harsh, and in the cacophony a single thought has perhaps been overlooked: He's a pure political animal." By hammering on "the theme that brought Bush his victory in 2004: terrorism and the supposed resolve of Republicans and wobbliness of Democrats before this mortal threat to America," he has "raised his game when it mattered." Cohen warns Democrats, "A perception of Democratic obstinacy in delaying military tribunals for the likes of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed could carry a heavy political price."

Rivkin And Casey Favor Abbreviating Rights of Gitmo Detainees. In the Wall Street Journal (9/9, 2.03M), former DOJ attorneys David Rivkin and Lee Casey argue, "As it enacts new rules for military commissions, Congress -- as well as the public -- should keep two overriding principles in mind. One: While the jihadists detained at Guantanamo Bay must have due process of law before they can be criminally punished, they are not ... entitled, under the U.S. Constitution or relevant international law, to the same level of procedural protections enjoyed by the lawful soldiers of sovereign states. Two: The methods of warfare employed by unlawful combatants in the war on terror fully justify extraordinary trial rules." President Bush's military commissions bill "should be promptly enacted."

Bin Laden Has A "Blueprint." In a commentary for the Washington Times (9/9, 88K), UPI international editor Claude Salhani writes, "In order to better grasp bin Laden's long-term thinking you will need to look at a map of Central Asia." Salhani sees possible expansion by bin Laden into Pakistan, "Tajikistan, to the northeast, Uzbekistan to the immediate north and Turkmenistan to the northwest." He adds, "The new Muslim empire, or Caliphate, governed by bin Laden or the Taliban would encircle Iran, itself a Muslim nation, also rich in oil and other natural resources. Look at the map again and see the implications for the rest of the oil-rich Arabian Gulf. Iraq, Kuwait, Bahrain, the Emirates, Saudi Arabia and Oman are only a small step and a revolution away. ... Now look at the map again; we are back in the Middle East. Palestine, Israel, Jordan, Egypt, North Africa and sub-Saharan Africa are the natural extension for bin Laden's Caliphate."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Urges Congress To Address Gaps In Security. The AP (9/8, Jordan) reports today "The nation's homeland security chief urged Congress on Friday to approve plans to better protect seaports and chemical plants from terrorists or risk another attack on the scale of 9/11." In his speech, Chertoff discussed the many advances in Security that have been made since September 11th. He "also rebuked critics who have resisted stepped-up safeguards that might be costly or inconvenient. 'That kind of backsliding runs directly contrary to the lessons of 9/11,' Chertoff told an audience of hundreds at Georgetown University." He also urged if the US had done these changes years ago 9/11 may not have occurred.

Critics Question Administration Dedication To Improving Airport Security. The AP (9/8, Lindlaw) reports that September 11th has led to an "accelerated" effort "to develop better screening technology, research that has advanced with each thwarted terrorism plot." Today "'some things are imminently deployable. Some things are further off,' said Steve Hill, spokesman for GE Security, the unit of General Electric Co. that makes transportation security equipment. "We are not light years off.'" Many critics question if the "Bush Administration is investing enough, even as it spent nearly $1 billion in fiscal 2006 on explosive-detection equipment for checked luggage and checkpoint screening." Currently "TSA and the Department of Homeland Security have repeatedly failed to spend tens of millions of dollars that Congress earmarked for new airport security equipment." At the same time a British Terrorist plot unfolding, Homeland Security quietly tried to take away $6 million that was supposed to be spent this year developing new technology for detecting explosives."

Utah Logs 96 Terrorism Cases In 2005, Tops In Nation. The Deseret Morning News (9/9, Davidson, Fattah) reports, "Federal data on criminal cases show Utah tops the nation in terrorist-related activity. But does it really? … The U.S. Department of Justice reported 96 terrorism-related prosecutions in the Beehive state in 2005. That represents one out of every eight such cases nationwide, well ahead of the second-place 80 filed in the Eastern District of Virginia (in the suburbs of Washington), and the third-place 67 in the Southern District of Texas. … But Utah has not turned suddenly into a stronghold for al-Qaida." The News continues, "A Deseret Morning News review of the cases shows that most of them likely would not be considered terrorism-related by people outside of the Justice Department. In fact, 87 of the 96 were identity-theft cases. None of the cases reviewed had any apparent ties to organized crime or terrorist groups listed in court documents. … The Justice Department provided only vague, general reasons why such cases were coded as terrorism-related for national databases. Officials say that terrorists use crimes like identity theft to fund their efforts, making those crimes a potential threat to national security. … 'Since our goal is to charge defendants before they can put their plans into action, this very often leads to the use of non-terrorism statutes such as fraud or false statement charges, immigration violations, identity theft and other offenses that often carry lesser penalties than offenses associated with completed terrorist acts or conspiracies,' Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. He added that smaller offenses allow officials to disrupt and prevent more serious attacks." The News notes,

"Perhaps the reason for the high number of terrorist-related cases in Utah has to do in part with the way the Utah office classifies some cases. Because the Utah Identity Theft Task Force is a component of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force, identity-theft cases often are termed as terrorist-related. … While some of those those cases are not directly linked to a terrorist plot, others are considered 'domestic terrorism' because they have been linked to groups, such as white supremacists, who use identity theft to fund their efforts."

EU Official Angry At Chertoff Allegations About Information Sharing. Sophie in't Veld, a Dutch member of the European Parliament and its Committee on Civil Liberties, Justice and Home Affairs, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (9/9, A17, 748K) takes issue with DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff's Aug. 29, op-ed "A Tool We Need to Stop the Next Airliner Plot" in which he state "that the fight against terrorism is being hampered by European privacy concerns about the U.S. government's use of data collected on airline passengers. This is a very serious allegation that calls for a reaction and some qualification." Veld argues, "friends and allies work together on the basis of mutual respect, trust and shared values. I ssues such as Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, illegal rendition flights and secret detention camps, the SWIFT spying scandal and the unsatisfactory implementation of the PNR agreement have done much harm to the traditional trust between the transatlantic partners. If we want to beat the terrorists, it is essential that trust be restored. That will not be achieved by tough language between the parties but through respect and willingness to seek compromises."

Police Now Watching For Terrorists With Missiles Near US Airports. The Washington Post (9/8, Wilber, 748K) reports "Police officer Steven Benner was on patrol in northern Anne Arundel County, driving his unmarked sport-utility vehicle through parking lots, climbing onto rooftops and peering down access roads that wind through wooded areas." He has been "looking for threats from shoulder-fired missiles around Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport." Currently "airport police have expanded their anti-missile networks by reaching out to other law enforcement organizations that patrol potential launch sites and "Police officials said they work closely with the Transportation Security Administration and the FBI to learn about threats" However, Scott Hugh. "former federal security directors say the community meetings have dwindled and occur at only a few airports. He said TSA officials have failed to implement policies that could effectively counter the threat.." In response TSA says "they work closely with local police and federal law enforcement on the issue of shoulder-fired missiles."

Radar Defenses Have Improved. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 4, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Another failure exposed by the 9/11 attacks was a hole in our aviation communication system. When the hijackers diverted four passenger planes, air force pilots had no way to find or stop them." CBS (Keteyian) added, "Five years ago, on a morning marked by chaos." Unidentified male voice: "It's been hijacked. We don't know where he's going." Keteyian: "Confusion." Unidentified male voice: "I don't know where I'm scrambling these guys to." Keteyian: "And cries for help from the cockpit of one of the hijacked planes. The FAA and North American Aerospace Defense Command, or NORAD, were without a direct line of communications, essentially flying blind during 109 minutes of terror." General Eric Findley: "We had no capability, really, to start looking in because all of our radars looked out." Keteyian: "I welcome to US Northern Command, or North Com, and the new world order of our nation's defense. Inside this nerve center, dozens of military officers and civilians now sit side by side, tracking all things domestic air, land, and sea directly linked to 150 other command centers involved in public safety. And none of this communication was in place five years ago. ... Since the 11th of September, the US has flown more than 44,000 missions, safeguarding the skies over US cities. Radar systems now monitor virtually every aircraft in the sky."

Explosives Lost During Logan Airport Training Exercise. ABC World News (9/8, story 9, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "In Boston, there are a lot of red faces at the Massachusetts port authority. They were using real plastic explosive during a training exercise at Logan airport. And now, they can't find it. And now they can't find it. Eight ounces of semtecks that was attached to a truck bumper. There looking for it now."

Muslims In New York Angered Over Monitoring. The Financial Times (9/9, Birchall, Chaffin) reports that "after being shaken by the widespread detentions of suspected illegal immigrants that followed the 9/11 attacks, recent events have highlighted tensions" in New York's Muslim community. Recently Shahawar Matin Siraj was found "guilty of conspiring to blow up the city's Herald Square subway station" and his "case underlined the level of monitoring of some sections of the city's Muslims. Charges were brought against Siraj after a police informer began operating in his mosque."

New Book Describes Missouri Man's Ties To Bin Laden. The Kansas City Star (9/9, Rizzo, 278K) reports, "Did a Kansas City college student help Osama bin Laden start al-Qaida? Federal law enforcement officials think he did. So do private-sector experts on international terrorism. Now, a new book that chronicles the history of al-Qaida portrays former Kansas City resident Mohammed Loay Baizid as a confidant of bin Laden in the early years of the terrorist organization. While The Looming Tower: Al-Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, by Lawrence Wright, a staff writer at The New Yorker magazine, provides Baizid's firsthand account of his association with bin Laden, the former Kansas City resident's activities already have been extensively documented in federal court transcripts and law enforcement documents."

Paulson Reviews Emergency Response Plans. The Financial Times (9/9, Wighton, Taylor) reports, "Concerns about Wall Street's ability to withstand a terrorist attack, natural disaster or flu pandemic have prompted Hank Paulson, the new US Treasury secretary, to review the financial market's disaster-planning." He "has asked the president's working group on financial markets to assess the improvements made since September 11 2001. This comes amid continued Wall Street concerns – five years after the World Trade Center attacks – about the resilience of power and telecommunications services." The Times notes, "Experts say financial services companies in New York and London have improved the resilience of their operations. But some senior Wall Street figures are concerned that the utilities, on which the financial markets depend, have made less progress. There is also greater focus on the impact of a flu pandemic."

The Financial Times (9/9, Wighton, Brewster, Taylor, Gangahar) reports, "Five years and billions of dollars of investment later, many of those flaws have been addressed and there is little doubt that financial markets in New York – and in other leading financial centres – would now be more resilient in the event of a similar disaster." Yet, "concerns remain, not least about the key utilities on which the financial services sector depends and the industry's ability to handle other sorts of threat, such as a flu pandemic." Deputy assistant Treasury secretary for critical infrastructure Scott Parsons "says the most basic lesson learned from September 11 was the need for back-up facilities far enough away from a main site."

Few Major Changes Made In Infrastructure After 9/11 Attacks. The New York Times (9/9, Chan, 1.21M) reports, "The destruction of the World Trade Center produced calls for a wholesale re-evaluation of the way tall buildings are designed and built, but five years later, the changes to New York City's building code, and others across the nation, have been few and modest." Federal recommendations "are still being debated and may yet result in modifications to a national building code that the city plans to adopt. So far, though, 9/11 has not been a turning point for code revision, in the way past disasters were — like the Triangle Shirtwaist fire of 1911."

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Powell Michelle Garcã, 748K) in a front page story reports, "Some days the hole in the heart of this city appears healed over. The braggadocio is back and the jackhammers rattle near Ground Zero. The scar that is the 16-acre hole is still there, a monument to political paralysis. But a forest of blue condominium towers rises, Hermes and Tiffany are opening shops downtown, Goldman Sachs is throwing up a 43-story office tower, and those Viking-stoved, Jacuzzi-ed lofts still attract high-roller bid-a-thons." Over "5,800 apartments have been built in Lower Manhattan since 2001, and the median residential sales price has jumped 75 percent. Big corporations -- the Bank of New York, Goldman and Moody's Investors Service -- are building millions of square feet of new office space."

Economy Thrives Despite Impact Of 9/11 Attacks. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, A1, Hilsenrath, Pleven, 2.03M) in a front page story reports that despite concerns the 9/11 attacks would continue to have a negative impact on the economy, "The number of security guards on business and government payrolls has declined, companies are holding less inventory, and the amount of freight moving though the nation's ports has soared. Not only has the economy grown, it has become more efficient. And office construction in downtown New York and Washington has continued." The Journal notes, "Several forces are behind the surprising turn. In 2001, years of heavy spending on technology had already begun paying dividends for many companies, permitting them to become more efficient even as they had to divert some resources to security. Massive government stimulus -- hastened by an economic downturn that was in place before the attacks -- helped the economy crawl out of its slump and get on a sustainable growth path. The medicine included steep interest-rate reductions, tax cuts, emergency spending increases and a federal backstop for terrorism insurance -- meaning the U.S. would front part of insurers' losses in the event of a major attack. Meanwhile, crime rates were falling, reducing security needs in some places even as fears of domestic terror rose."

The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Chancellor, Vise, Cox, 2.03M) in its EU notebook reports, "Stocks fell by 11% in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. At the time, many anticipated dire economic consequences. Fears of financial Armageddon turned out to be exaggerated. Five years later, stocks are up by a third from shortly after the markets reopened. However, it's too early to draw up a final reckoning for that terrible day." The war against terrorism "has boosted U.S. military and security expenditures. Yet foreign loans have enabled Americans to have more guns without skimping on the butter. Economists would normally expect the expansion of such essentially nonproductive activity to have a harmful effect on overall economic efficiency. That hasn't happened. It turns out that average productivity growth over the past five years has actually been greater than during the 1990s." But, "there may still be some future costs to bear. The drop in skilled immigration and foreign students that followed could affect long-term growth prospects. As the war in Iraq drags on, it could well become a greater economic burden. Finally, the economic recovery was accompanied by a surge of consumer borrowing. That's left many households in the red. As the housing market slows, they will come under increasing pressure to settle their bills. Only then will a truer financial accounting for 9/11 be possible."

Democrats Continue To Insist ABC Cancel 9/11 Mini-Series. The New York Times (9/9, Mckinley, 1.21M) reports, "Despite word of small last-minute cuts meant to soften the film's depiction of President Bill Clinton and his aides, members of his administration and Democratic officials yesterday stepped up their campaign to force ABC to cancel its disputed mini-series, 'The Path to 9/11.' The Democratic National Committee delivered to the network a petition with more than 200,000 names that demanded withdrawal of the film, which the petition called 'right-wing propaganda.'" Sen. John Kerry and former vice president Al Gore "also released statements castigating ABC." The Times notes, Sen. Hillary Clinton "was somewhat more guarded in remarks at an event at Columbia University. 'My bottom-line view,' Ms. Clinton said, 'is that when it comes to something as serious and historically significant as 9/11, the truth is enough and we ought to stick to the facts.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Collins, Duant, 918K) reports, "Walt Disney Co.'s ABC is forging ahead with plans to air a miniseries starting Sunday despite controversy over its efforts to dramatize — and some say unfairly politicize — the events leading up to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. … The movie is also threatening the bipartisan work of the Sept. 11 commission, whose Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas H. Kean, served as a paid consultant on the project and has played a key role in ABC's public-relations campaign. At least two other commission members — former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste and Jamie S. Gorelick, a former deputy attorney general under President Clinton — have vehemently criticized the miniseries project."

Bush's Monday Night Speech Interferes With ABC's Schedule. The Washington Post (9/9, A4, Kurtz, 748K) reports, "An ABC spokeswoman said yesterday that changes are being made to a number of scenes in the film. … ABC plans to air the film tomorrow and Monday -- despite another letter from the Clinton camp yesterday asking that it be pulled -- although it is trying to figure out how to accommodate President Bush's prime-time speech Monday and a planned panel discussion after the movie." The Kansas City Star (9/9, Bauder, 278K) reports similar details.

Dowd Claims Clinton And Bush Share Blame For 9/11. The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (9/9) writes, "Sandy Berger is lucky they didn't show him stuffing government documents into his bra. After all, cinematic license is cinematic license. Regarding ABC's tarted-up 9/11 movie that sparked a furor among Clintonites who felt they were unfairly blamed for the rise of Osama, I hate to be so quaint as to defend reality. … The argument over which president is to blame for 9/11 is tiresome. Both obviously bear some blame."

"Irony" Of Clinton's Complaints Noted. Newsweek's Marc Peyser (9/9) writes, "Former president Bill Clinton is blasting the ABC 9/11 docudrama 'The Path to 9/11' for being inaccurate and unfair. You've got to love the irony of that. Wasn't he the guy who hired Hollywood filmmakers to create a campaign biopic of his life? Sure, 'The Path to 9/11' makes up dialogue, invents scenes and creates a composite character or two, but sometimes you have to craft the facts in a certain way to tell a complicated story. Just like sometimes you have to reconsider what the definition of "is" is when you don't want people to know you've had an affair with a White House intern.

Whitman Defends EPA Response To WTC Health Risks. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 3, , Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tens of thousands of rescue and recovery workers at ground zero, hailed as heroes at the time, are now suffering from debilitating respiratory problems." Dr. Robin Herbert, Mount Sinai Medical Center: "This is a disaster of, unfortunately, historic proportions in many ways, and I think that the epidemic of disease we're seeing is also going to turn out to be a disaster of historic proportion." Couric: "And another person who has little doubt there is a connection between the dust at ground zero and the health problems today is the woman who was the head of the EPA at the time, Christine Todd Whitman." Christine Todd Whitman: "I know there are ongoing scientific studies being done to make the cause and effect, but you know what? We were there saying that this stuff wasn't good to breathe. We were there saying they should take some protection. Now they're getting sick. You see a correlation. You see a connection there." Couric: "But Whitman is the person many first responders hold responsible."

Lawmakers Accuse Administration Of Ignoring Health Problems Stemming From Ground Zero Recovery. The New York Times (9/9, Depalma, 1.21M) reports a bipartisan group of lawmakers including Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles Schumer "accused the Bush administration of ignoring the health problems that arose among workers who toiled at ground zero and the claims of downtown residents who say they were also sickened by the dust. The administration has done little to prepare for a similar disaster in the future, they said." Rep. Christopher shays said, "Today it appears the public health approach to lingering environmental hazards remains unfocused and halting. … The unquestionable need for long-term monitoring has been met with only short term commitments." And GOP Rep. Vito Fossella "criticized the government for not having done even basic work to record how many people participated in the cleanup and recovery operations." The AP (9/9, Barrett) reports similar details.

More Commentary. The New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) editorializes, "As we pay homage on Monday to those who died on Sept. 11, 2001, it is worth remembering what happened on May 28, 2002. That evening -- a scant 37 weeks after the attack -- workers took down the last column from that smoldering mound and officially cleared the site. … They came when the nation was attacked. Taking care of them now is a national obligation."

US Public Has Mixed Reaction Five Years After 9/11 Attacks. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 8, 2:15, Hartman, 7.66M) returned to Shanksville, PA the site of the crash of Flight 93 five years after the 9/11 attacks to see how the site "had changed. And what I found was this: Except for a few new stuff in the windows, the town itself is pretty much the same, but the people aren't. They're all coping with the tragedy in such different ways." That's because "the people of Shanksville have very mixed emotions…like the rest of us between moving on and never forgetting."

The New York Times (9/9, A1, Clemetson, 1.21M) in a front page article reports, 'As President Bush prepares to mark the fifth anniversary with high-profile remembrances at the three crash sites, the" Madeleine V. Leckie Elementary School in Virginia "will mark the day with a low-key ceremony. And the families of the school's four victims will cling to the bonds between them." The Times adds, "The families may have scattered, but the school and its garden remain a center of gravity, a place to steal away to and remember the last times their families were whole."

The New York Times (9/9, Barry, 1.21M) in an article titled "He Bears The Mark Of His Loss Sadly" and the New York Times (9/9, Nocera, 1.21M) in an article titled "After 5 Years, His Voice Can Still Crack" describe the personal losses of some family members of 9/11 attack victims.

Some 9/11 Widows Reach Out To Bereaved Women Worldwide. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 10, 2:55, Fratangelo, 9.87M) reported on the efforts of two 9/11 widows, Susan Retik and Patti Quigley, who started a charity to help bereaved women worldwide. They "started raising money with bicycle rides from ground zero to their homes near Boston to help other widows like them. Not here -- but in Afghanistan, where some lost husbands in the US led bombings." Retik: "A woman in Afghanistan, when she's widowed, their status is automatically lowered a couple of notches. It is an extremely difficult, extremely difficult life." Fratangelo: "Their foundation is called, 'Beyond the 11th.'"

Artist Travels US Painting Patriotic Images. ABC World News (9/8, story 11, 2:50, Gibson) reported on Scott Lobaido's "pilgrimage" to every US state to paint patriotic flags on the roofs of buildings. Lobaido: "It's not pro-war, anti-war. It's about these men and women who step up to the plate. I'm just trying it's about patriotic glue. This glue that keeps us all together regardless of our ideology.

Noonan Sees Message Of Strength In Last 9/11 Calls. Peggy Noonan in her column in the Wall Street Journal (9/9, 2.03M) recalls the last messages the victims of the 9/11 attacks left over their phones and says, "This is what I get from the last messages. People are often stronger than they know, bigger, more gallant than they'd guess. And this: We're all lucky to be here today and able to say what deserves saying, and if you say it a lot, it won't make it common and so unheard, but known and absorbed."

Funding May Run Out For WTC Tribute In Light. The New York Times (9/9, Dunlap, 1.21M) reports, "As twilight falls on Monday, the skies over Lower Manhattan will once again be pierced by the twin beams of the Tribute in Light." It "has become something of a civic tradition" but "the project may run out of money after 2008." And " it may lose its current staging area atop the Battery Garage, six blocks south of ground zero; a rare expanse of secure open space downtown."

Some Listed On Memorial Were Not Victims Of 9/11 Attacks. The AP (9/9, Frankston) reports, "A 100-foot-tall sculpture being unveiled on Monday's fifth anniversary of 9-11 honors thousands of terrorist attack victims, and then some: Carved into the granite base are the names of more than 40 people who weren't killed on Sept. 11 after all." The AP notes, "The majestic sculpture across the Hudson River from ground zero will feature 3,024 names of people once believed to have died in the 1993 and Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center. The problem is that the Russian artist who created the work used an outdated list of names of those missing at the trade center."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Maintains Iraq Is Key To Mideast Reform. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he "is most emphatic when he links Iraq to the larger struggle for Mideast reform. 'In the long run, the United States is going to have to make a decision as to whether or not it will support moderates against extremists, reformers against tyrants. And Iraq is the first real test of the nation's commitment to this ideological struggle. …

DOJ_NMG_0060947

I believe it strongly. One way for the American people to understand the stakes is to envision what happens if America withdraws.' He has been hitting that last point hard in his recent speeches, and it is the linchpin of the argument Mr. Bush will make through November against the Democrats who insist on pulling out immediately."

Khatami Opposes Partitioning Of Iraq. Former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami in an interview with Time Magazine (9/9, Zagorin) calls the partitioning of Iraq "definitely a bad idea," adding, "Iraq should remain unified. The solution is a democratic state." Any "breakup of Iraq is very dangerous. A democratic state can prevent from this from taking place." Later, he adds, "Any aggression against Iran would have costs, serious costs for the U.S., more than for Iran. Public opinion in the world, and a great majority of the American public, would not support a military engagement."

Senate Report Contradicts Claims That Saddam And Al Qaeda Cooperated. Coverage indicated that the Senate report was a blow to the Bush administration's allegations. Last night NBC and ABC aired lengthy segments on the report regarding Saddam Hussein's government and al Qaeda. NBC opened its broadcast with the story, while ABC ran its second. CBS made no mention of the report during its broadcast. According to ABC correspondent Martha Raddatz, the report "is a stinging rebuke to those assertions made by the White House leading up to the war…and long afterwards." NBC anchor Brian Williams contended that "the notion of any link between the two has been shredded by a big new report issued by the Republican-controlled US Senate Intelligence Committee." Williams added that the report "will be seen as proof that there was a whole lot of bad intelligence floating around. Some of which was used to launch a war."

NBC Nightly News (9/8, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "According to an opinion poll just released this week, 43% of Americans believe Saddam Hussein was personally involved in the 9/11 attacks. That is almost half the country. Linking Iraq and al Qaeda has been a tricky business. Some in the Administration have made the tie. Tonight, the notion of any link between the two has been shredded by a big new report issued by the Republican-controlled US Senate Intelligence Committee. It finds no link between Iraq and al Qaeda. In fact, it says the two have very little in common. There's even evidence Saddam Hussein used to criticize Osama bin Laden." NBC added, "The Senate reports finds that the Bush Administration repeatedly disregarded warnings that key intelligence might be wrong, even a warning that information had been fabricated. The Bush Administration repeatedly claimed there were ties between Saddam and al Qaeda. … But this report finds that none of that was true."

ABC World News (9/8, story 2, 2:40, Gibson) reported that in "the lead up to the war…and for a long time afterward, members of the administration, including the president, have maintained there was a link between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda. Today, a declassified Senate report said that was not true. That, in fact, Saddam Hussein mistrusted al Qaeda and thought it a threat to his power." ABC added, "The report is a stinging rebuke to those assertions made by the White House leading up to the war…and long afterwards. In four years, the administration has argued that Saddam Hussein was tied to Abu Musab Zarqawi and al Qaeda." ... The Republican chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, Pat Roberts, said today, he was pleased with the overall report but criticized his Democratic colleagues for their statements."

The AP (9/9, Abrams) reports, "Saddam Hussein regarded al-Qaida as a threat rather than a possible ally, a Senate report says, contradicting assertions President Bush has used to build support for the war in Iraq. … Democrats contended that the administration continues to use faulty intelligence, including assertions of a link between Saddam's government and the recently killed al-Zarqawi, to justify the war in Iraq." Republicans "said the document, which compares prewar intelligence with post-invasion findings on Iraq's weapons and on terrorist groups, broke little new ground. And they said Democrats were distorting it for political purposes."

The Washington Post (9/9, A12, Pincus, 748K) reports, "The two newly declassified chapters of the report fueled political accusations yesterday that the Bush administration lied to justify invading Iraq." The Post goes on to report, "Although the Senate report raises questions about the reliability of the information provided by Iraqi exiles, it notes that the information had little direct impact on the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq produced in October 2002. Many of the Iraqi National Congress claims, however, were passed on to the White House and the office of Vice President Cheney through reports by a separate intelligence analysis group established by then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith. The Senate committee's inquiry into the Feith group's activities, another part of the prewar intelligence study, has been delayed by committee Chairman Pat Roberts, who is awaiting the completion of a Pentagon inspector general inquiry into the same matter."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Miller, 918K) reports in a 1,500-word article that the Senate committee's findings contradict "claims by the Bush administration before it invaded Iraq." The findings "are the latest in a series of high-profile studies to dispute some of the Bush administration's key arguments for invading Iraq" and will "fuel the election-season debate over the administration's foreign policy at a time when Bush is seeking to shore up support for the war in Iraq." Chairman Roberts was placed "in the awkward position of touting the work of his panel while urging the public to ignore some of its conclusions."

Bush Allegedly Repeated Unsubstantiated Claims Regarding Saddam And Zarqawi. The New York Times (9/9, A1, Mazzetti, 1.21M), in a front-page story, titled, "C.I.A. Said To Find No Hussein Link To Terror Chief," reports that the CIA "last fall repudiated the claim that there were prewar ties" between Hussein's government and Zarqawi. According to the Times, "The disclosure undercuts continuing assertions by the Bush administration that such ties existed, and that they provided evidence of links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. The Republican-controlled committee, in a second report, also sharply criticized the administration for its reliance on the Iraqi National Congress during the prelude to the war in Iraq. … The reports did not address the politically divisive question of whether the Bush administration had exaggerated or misused intelligence as part of its effort to win support for the war. But one report did contradict the administration's assertions, made before the war and since, that ties between Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Hussein's government provided evidence of a close relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda. As recently as Aug. 21, President Bush said at a news conference that Mr. Hussein 'had relations with Zarqawi.' But a C.I.A. report completed in October 2005 concluded instead that Mr. Hussein's government 'did not have a relationship, harbor or even turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates,' according to the new Senate findings." The AP, the Washington Post and the Washington Times also mention the president's August 21 speech.

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Weisman, 748K), in a front-page article titled, "Iraq's Alleged Al-Qaeda Ties Were Disputed Before War: Links Were Cited to Justify U.S. Invasion, Report Says," reports, "U.S. intelligence analysts were strongly disputing the alleged links between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda while senior Bush administration officials were publicly asserting those links to justify invading Iraq. Far from aligning himself with al-Qaeda…Hussein repeatedly rebuffed al-Qaeda's overtures and tried to capture Zarqawi, the report said. Tariq Aziz, the detained former deputy prime minister, has told the FBI that Hussein 'only expressed negative sentiments about [Osama] bin Laden.'"

Bloomberg (9/9) reports Bush "has consistently linked Iraq, where more than 2,600 U.S. military personnel have died and the U.S. is mired in a violent conflict between Shiites and Sunnis, to the larger war on terror and fundamentalist Islamic militants such as al-Qaeda. Bush displayed 'gross negligence' by citing faulty intelligence in speeches and statements to connect Saddam Hussein to al-Qaeda," said Senator Jay Rockefeller.

Snow Responds To Allegations Against Bush. The Washington Times (9/9, A1, Scarborough, Hurt, 88K), in a front-page article titled, "Report Finds No Saddam, Zarqawi Ties," reports Sen. Carl Levin said, 'To this day, these statements haven't stopped. Just two weeks ago, the president said in a press conference that Saddam Hussein had relations with Zarqawi. The intelligence committee's report demonstrates that statement to be false. ... The president's statement, made just two weeks ago, is flat out false.' White House spokesman Tony Snow told The Washington Times last night that Mr. Bush was referring to the fact that Zarqawi was in Iraq receiving medical care and lodging during Saddam's rule. 'The president knows there was no operational relationship and he did not assert there was an operational relationship,' Mr. Snow said. The Senate report also said there is no evidence that Saddam's regime participated in or aided the September 11 attacks. Mr. Snow said the president has never asserted otherwise. 'There have been repeated insinuations that the president had somehow said Saddam was involved in September 11,' Mr. Snow said. 'He has never said that. He has taken great pains from the very beginning to assure people that was not the case.'"

Hagel And Snowe Joined Democrats' Criticism Of US Reliance On INC. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 2, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) followed-up its lead story on the Senate report with "analysis" from Washington bureau chief Tim Russert. According to Russert, "two Republican Senators, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine joined with the Democrats to toughen this report. That's very, very significant." Russert said that when he interviews Vice President Cheney this Sunday he will inquire, "Exactly about this subject."

The New York Times (9/9, A1, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports, "A set of conclusions that included criticism of the administration's ties with the Iraqi National Congress was opposed by several Republicans on the panel, including Mr. Roberts, but was approved with the support of" Hagel and Snowe, "along with all seven Democrats. Senator Roberts even took the unusual step of disavowing the conclusions about the role played by the Iraqi National Congress, saying that they were 'misleading and are not supported by the facts.'

The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Republican attempts to paint the findings as a partisan rehash were undercut by intelligence committee members from the GOP."

McClatchy (9/9, Strobel, Talev) reports, "The reports are part of a five-report study that the Senate Intelligence Committee has undertaken into the Bush administration's use of intelligence before the invasion of Iraq. The study has left the committee badly divided. Three reports remain classified, including one comparing prewar statements by Bush administration officials to intelligence available at the time. Democrats have accused Republicans of delaying the reports until after the November congressional elections."

DOJ_NMG_0060949

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch/Cox (9/9, Deans) reports Sen. Kit Bond "criticized Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee for attempting to spin the report released Friday, calling their comments that the administration manipulated pre-war intelligence about Iraq deceptive. 'Democrats continue to make partisan attacks even though the facts do not support those conclusions,' Bond said."

Bush Seen As Unlikely To Admit Making Mistakes. The Washington Post's Linton Weeks, in a piece on past presidents' refusal to apologize for their mistakes (9/9, C1), writes, "Being president apparently means never being able to say you're sorry. Or wrong. President Bush said that the Central Intelligence Agency did secretly detain certain people suspected of working for al-Qaeda, and that CIA interrogators have used 'an alternative set of procedures' designed to pry information from prisoners. Given the opportunity to say he was wrong or that he was sorry, he did what presidents do: neither. … It is a tack that the president may take again in light of reports from the Senate Intelligence Committee that Saddam Hussein was not linked to Osama bin Laden at the time Bush was mounting a war against Iraq."

NYTimes Claims Report's Conclusions Are Already Widely Accepted. The New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) in an editorial writes, "We were certainly relieved that the Senate Intelligence Committee finally made official yesterday what pretty much everyone but President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney had already acknowledged: There never was any connection between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda, not even between Mr. Hussein and the self-styled Qaeda leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. Iraq also was not busily trying to build a nuclear weapon before the war, nor did it have a biological weapons program. … Unfortunately, the documents…are beside the big point of this inquiry: Did Mr. Bush and his aides knowingly hype the intelligence on Iraq and deliberately mislead Americans into war?"

General Says Rumsfeld Refused To Plan For Postwar Iraq. McClatchy (9/9, Heinatz) reports, "Long before the United States invaded Iraq in 2003, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld forbade military strategists to develop plans for securing a post-war Iraq, the retiring commander of the Army Transportation Corps said Thursday. In fact, said Brig. Gen. Mark Scheid, Rumsfeld said 'he would fire the next person' who talked about the need for a post-war plan." Scheid, who is retiring in "about three weeks," said that Rumsfeld feared "the American public will not back us if they think we are going over there for a long war." His comments further confirm "the version of events reported in 'Cobra II: The Inside Story of the Invasion and Occupation of Iraq.'" Despite his criticism, Scheid "doesn't go so far as calling for Rumsfeld to resign." This article appeared in about 16 sites.

Iranians Arrest Five Members Of Iraqi Security Forces. The New York Times (9/9, Wong, 1.21M) reports, "Five members of the Iraqi security forces and their interpreter were arrested by Iranian troops as the Iraqis were patrolling the Iraq-Iran border this week. ... The Iraqis were on a joint patrol run by the Interior and Defense ministries ... near the town of Mandali, in Diyala Province. The area has been rife with sectarian violence. It was unclear which side of the border the Iraqis were on." The arrests "come at a time of growing tension between the United States and Iran," the latter of which "detained eight [UK] sailors in June 2004" near the Iranian border. Iraq and Iran fought a war in the 1980s; "though Iraqi Shiite political parties are close to some Iranian officials, many Iraqis distrust the Iranians, who have been the traditional rivals of Arabs for influence in the region." The Times also briefly reports several bombings, a sheik's assassination, and deaths of one British and one American soldier.

The Washington Post (9/9, A12, Paley, 748K) reports the arrests occurred "after a cross-border skirmish Thursday." The captured Iraqis "were part of a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol that trekked on Thursday afternoon to a border post near Mandali ... to investigate reports that a large number of Iranians were crossing into Iraq there."

Iraqi Forces Protect Karbala. The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Quinn) reports, "Iraqi police and army troops fanned out around Karbala yesterday to safeguard the Shi'ite holy city as a mortar attack killed three pilgrims heading there for a religious festival." Officials expect up to 3 million pilgrims.

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, McDonnell, 918K) reports, "No major attacks were reported against the multitudes destined for Karbala, where today they celebrate the birthday of a revered imam who disappeared a millennium ago. But even on a relatively quiet day in the capital, authorities reported finding 14 unidentified bodies in various neighborhoods." Authorities "sealed off Karbala, about 50 miles south of Baghdad, to try to prevent a repeat of previous attacks on masses of Shiite pilgrims, whose boisterous marches are often viewed as a provocation by the rival Sunni Arab community."

Iraqi Death Count Excludes Car Bombs, Mortar Attacks. McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Brunswick, Obeid) reports, "U.S. officials, seeking a way to measure the results of a program aimed at decreasing violence in Baghdad, aren't counting scores of dead killed in car bombings and mortar attacks as victims of the country's sectarian violence. In a distinction previously undisclosed, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said Friday that the United States is including in its tabulations of sectarian violence only deaths of individuals killed in drive-by shootings or by torture and execution." The accounting method "allowed U.S. officials to boast that the number of deaths from sectarian violence in Baghdad declined by more than 52 percent in August over July." McClatchy calls the dispute "important" and reports that many Iraqis "say [civil war] has already begun."

New Army Interrogation Manual Recalls Abuses. The Washington Post (9/9, White, 748K) reports, "The chief architect of the new Army field manual on interrogations said yesterday that the document aims to preserve the memory of the detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere so future generations of U.S. soldiers do not repeat the same mistakes." The manual prohibits "abuse alleged at various facilities and some that appear to come directly from Abu Ghraib photographs: forcing a detainee to be naked, perform sexual acts, or pose in a sexual manner," etc. A Human Rights First official expressed concern "that the Army field manual and a new Pentagon directive on detainee treatment designate the CIA as the agency that will do the nation's dirty work under a set of secret guidelines."

US Forces Find Torture Chambers. The AP (9/9) reports, "The senior commander of U.S. and Iraqi forces in northern Iraq said Friday that a small number of 'torture chambers' apparently used for sectarian violence were discovered along the Diyala River. Maj. Gen. Thomas R. Turner II ... told reporters at the Pentagon that two or three small rooms were found in May or June. He mentioned them as examples of sectarian strife that has spread from Baghdad to other parts of Iraq." A Pentagon report had "expressed concern that sectarian violence was spreading beyond the Iraqi capital," which Gen. Turner acknowledged by saying, "We do see that migration."

Ex-Marine Warns Against "Rush To Judgment" Of Murder Suspects. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Perry, 918K) reports on ex-Marine Ilario Pantano, who "was charged with killing two unarmed Iraqi prisoners but was exonerated last year in a high-profile preliminary hearing at Camp Lejeune, N.C." His Marine career "destroyed," he now expresses concern "that decisions about bringing criminal charges are often made by investigators and officers without direct combat experience. The line between acceptable and unacceptable violence in Iraq is hard to discern, he said." Pantano's "aggressive and media-smart" legal strategy has become a model for other GIs facing "similar charges," such as the Pendleton 8. His accuser remains convinced of Pantano's guilt.

Car Bombing Near US Embassy In Kabul Kills Two US Soldiers. The Kabul suicide bombing resulted in coverage pointing out the increasing boldness of Taliban insurgents in attacking the capital. The Washington Post (9/9, A1, Constable, Hamdard, 748K) reports, "A suicide bomber rammed a Toyota sedan into a U.S. military convoy Friday morning on a busy Kabul street, triggering a blast that killed 14 Afghan civilians and two U.S. soldiers." Seventeen people including a US soldier were wounded in an attack that "tore one U.S. military vehicle in half and scattered chunks of charred metal and human limbs across the pavement." The "attack, carried out on the same block as the heavily guarded U.S. Embassy, was the latest of half a dozen bombings that in recent months have brought what was an almost exclusively rural insurgency onto the streets of the Afghan capital." The Post calls the explosion "the deadliest attack in the capital since September 2002." At the same time, the Post notes, "Taliban militiamen are battling NATO troops in southern Afghanistan with unexpected aggressiveness and occupying rural districts there."

The New York Times (9/9, Gall, Wafa, 1.21M) adds, "A suicide bomber smashed his car into an American military vehicle just yards from the United States Embassy in downtown Kabul on Friday morning, killing as many as 16 people and wounding 29." The attack "came amid a sharp escalation of violence in Afghanistan, where NATO and American military commanders are waging an offensive to crush a Taliban insurgency that has revived with unexpected strength this year." The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Garwood) calls it "the most brazen attack yet on Kabul's heavily guarded center." The Financial Times (9/9, Morarjee, Dombey) calls it "an indication that Taliban insurgents are becoming bold enough to strike outside their traditional southern strongholds."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Rubin, 918K) reports that the bombing has "raised fears here about a growing ability of anti-government extremists to strike with apparent impunity, even in the capital." Kabul residents "blamed the incident on the Musharraf government, which they said had allowed the Taliban to take refuge, train and rearm in Pakistan. But they said the United States was responsible too because it has influence with Musharraf yet has failed to compel him to halt support for Taliban guerrillas or prevent their crossing into Afghanistan."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/9, Landay) reports, "Intelligence officials told McClatchy Newspapers earlier this year that much of the violence in Afghanistan has come from tactics - such as car bombings, suicide attacks and homemade bombs - that were brought to Afghanistan by militants trained in their use in Iraq." The bombing may be linked to "the fifth anniversary Saturday of the assassination of a fabled guerrilla leader and Taliban opponent, Ahmad Shah Massoud, who was killed by suspected al-Qaida operatives posing as television journalists."

Jones Calls For More NATO Troops. The Financial Times (9/9, Morarjee, Dombey) reports that NATO supreme commander Gen. James Jones "made clear that he was looking for a reserve battalion of 800-1000 soldiers, plus air support that could involve additional personnel of up to 1,500 people." He called the reinforcements "more important than ever." However, his "request represents one of Nato's toughest challenges yet, since the alliance has long-standing difficulties in providing speedy troop deployments, air support and forces that can be moved around with ease."

The AP (9/9, Scislowska) reports, "Calls by NATO's top commander for 2,000 more troops in Afghanistan could be running up against donor fatigue from key members of the alliance. The NATO campaign has been draining: In one of the world's harshest environments, it has failed to ensnare top al-Qaida leaders and the insurgency is at its fiercest since the fall of the Taliban — raising the specter of an Iraq-style quagmire." In addition, NATO countries have already contributed troops to Lebanon. The AP says the Afghan military situation has "grim parallels" to Iraq, even though Gen. Jones called such comparisons "a cheap shot." According to the AP, "U.S. and NATO commanders have repeatedly underestimated the ability of the Taliban to regroup after heavy losses, and there are signs that militants in Afghanistan are adopting tactics used in Iraq."

Karzai Says To Expect More Challenges. Time magazine (9/8) reports that the bombing "rocked the floor of the presidential palace a mile away, where President Karzai was sitting down for an interview with TIME." Karzai, "struggling to maintain his composure in the minutes following the blast, condemned the attack and lamented the loss of life, but adamantly rejected any suggestion that the security situation in Afghanistan was deteriorating." He warned, "The enemy is defeated, but it is not eliminated." Time comments, "Events over the past week suggest [the Taliban] are far from being defeated."

Mullah Omar Reportedly In Pakistan. CNN (9/9, Bergen, Cooper, Moore) reports, "The one-eyed Taliban leader Mullah Omar, who heads the religious militia fighting U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan, is living in Pakistan, though not in the same area where al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden is thought to be, according to a U.S. intelligence source. ... The elusive Taliban leader is believed to be in Quetta or its environs." The added "that bin Laden is likely in Bajuar, a sparsely populated remote tribal region on the northern Afghan-Pakistan border, bordering Chitral."

"Kidnapped" Major Turns Up In Kyrgyzstan. The AP (9/9, Saralayeva) reports USAF Maj. Jill Metzger, "who disappeared earlier this week in Kyrgyzstan, was found alive late Friday, reportedly telling people who helped her that she had been kidnapped." Kyrgyz police "informed authorities at the U.S. air base at the airport in Bishkek" that she had been located. Deputy Interior Minister Omurbek Suvanaliyev "said Metzger, 33, knocked on the door of a house on the outskirts of the capital shortly before midnight and told its residents that she had been kidnapped." The AP notes, "The shopping center where Metzger disappeared, located about 35 miles from the base, is not a particularly dangerous area, said" a US military officer. "Still, the military had instituted a new policy barring all off-duty personnel from leaving the base until Metzger was found." The New York Times (9/9, 1.21M) runs a slightly modified version of the AP article.

NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 5, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is late word tonight that an Air Force major who vanished on Tuesday in the Central Asian nation of Kyrgyzstan has been found. We've learned Major Jill Metzger was found in Bishkek. Wandering near a police station. Her hair had been cut and dyed but it's unclear whether she had been abducted. Air Force doctors are now examining her."

Army Touts Recruiting Increase. The Washington Post (9/9, Tyson, 748K) reports, "The Army will meet its goal of recruiting 80,000 new active-duty soldiers this fiscal year but will fall short in the percentage of high school graduates as the education level of enlistees dips below the norm of the past decade, according to senior Pentagon officials." The recruiting success is a "significant rebound" from last year's failure to meet "the active-duty target" for the first time since 1999. Officials attributed the gains "to a beefed-up active-duty recruiting force" and to incentives for both recruits and recruiters. However, "the proportion of recruits holding a high school diploma was 81.2 percent as of August, falling below the Pentagon benchmark of 90 percent for the second year in a row," to the lowest figure since 1981.

The AP (9/8, Burns) reports the story as well, quoting Maj. Gen. Sean Byrne, who concedes that "the Iraq war continues to be a drag on recruiting, and he said unpublished Army research surveys show people of enlistment age are increasingly disinclined to join. Similarly, adults who influence the choices of potential recruits — like parents, teachers and coaches — are less inclined to recommend military service." As it is, "even now, after increasing the active-duty Army by about 10,000 soldiers this year, to about 501,000, soldiers generally get less than two years at home between one-year tours in Iraq."

Journalist Accused Of Assisting Hussein Government Released From Prison. The New York Times (9/9, Hartocollis, 1.21M) reports Susan Lindauer, "a former journalist and Congressional aide accused of working with Iraqi intelligence before the war was released from prison yesterday after a federal judge ruled that she could not be forced to take antipsychotic medication in an effort to make her competent to stand trial. The judge, Michael Mukasey of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was not convinced that even if she took the medication…Lindauer, 43, would improve enough to be capable of standing trial. Judge Mukasey also criticized the strength of the government's case, saying that the legal standard for forcibly administering medication requires a strong government interest in prosecution, and that the government has not been able to establish that standard in this case."

DOJ_NMG_0060952

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Probe Of Stock Options Timing Expands. The AP (9/9, Gordon) reports, "As shareholders are finding out how costly the stock-options backdating scandal might be, a widening cast of characters is being targeted." The AP continues, "In the latest development Friday, Broadcom Corp., a supplier of chips used in communications devices, said it may need to boost a charge it takes to $1.5 billion or more for stock-option accounting flaws -- double what it estimated in July." The AP adds, "Government officials said this week they want to know what roles corporate directors as well as outside attorneys, auditors and compensation consultants might have played in helping executives manipulate the timing of option grants to enrich themselves and their colleagues. … More than 100 public companies, many of them in the technology sector, are under scrutiny by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible rigging of stock-option grants to boost their value to the recipients. The Justice Department is investigating scores of companies for possible criminal violations. … California-based Broadcom, for example, uncovered grants awarded between June 2000 and 2002 in which the measurement dates differed from grant dates. … And the Internal Revenue Service is looking at possible tax-law violations in option grants by some companies."

Broadcom Finds More Options Problems. The San Jose Mercury News (9/9, Schwanhausser) reports, "Broadcom warned investors Friday that its internal review of misdated stock options had uncovered deeper problems that will force it to recognize at least $1.5 billion in expenses -- double the Irvine company's original estimate in July." The News continues, "Meanwhile, a Silicon Valley company said its internal investigation had come to the opposite conclusion: Linear Technology found 'no evidence of fraud or misconduct of any kind.' Still, the Milpitas chip maker apparently became the first valley company to disclose that the Internal Revenue Service is looking into possible option abuses." The News adds, "So far, about 120 U.S. companies face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews, with about one-fourth of them based in Silicon Valley. Many of those have warned they will need to restate past financial reports because option abuses led them to overstate their profits. … Broadcom stands apart, however, because the size and breadth of its errors have grown dramatically. The semiconductor maker said in July that it had understated its option expenses by an estimated $750 million and would restate records dating to 2000. … Now it says it will restate financial reports back to 1998 -- covering its entire history as a public company. The accounting charge 'will be at least twice the amount previously estimated and could be substantially more' if investigators find more tainted options, Broadcom said."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Granelli) reports, "As an optimistic symbol of the technology industry's future, Broadcom Corp. in the late 1990s was hard to beat. … Stock options turned average workers into millionaires, and the founders established themselves at the top of Orange County's corporate and philanthropic elite as the Irvine chip maker's share price soared. … But eight years after its frothy debut on the public markets, Broadcom is fast epitomizing the industry's cavalier past — and more sober prospects." The Times continues, "On Friday, the company said unreported expenses related to those stock options that peppered the employee parking lot with Ferraris and Lamborghinis are likely to swell to more than $1.5 billion and ultimately could be 'substantially more.' … The revision is double an estimate of two months ago and would increase Broadcom's accumulated losses since going public in 1998 to more than $7 billion. It's also the largest restatement among any of the more than 100 public companies under scrutiny over alleged manipulation of the timing of stock option grants." The Times adds, "Although technology companies were more likely than other firms to grant stock options as incentives for rank-and-file workers as well as executives, questions about the practice are being raised at a number of companies — including Home Depot, Cheesecake Factory, Cablevision and UnitedHealth. … In many cases, experts believe, nothing illegal was done, although the Justice Department is examining more than 45 companies and the Securities and Exchange Commission is reviewing more than 100. Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. in San Jose have been charged with securities fraud."

Bloomberg (9/9, Barr) reports, "The restatement is the biggest yet among at least 120 companies facing federal probes or conducting internal reviews into whether they manipulated dates to inflate the value of options. In July, Broadcom said it would take a $750 million charge after an audit committee found options backdating from 2000 to 2002. That review continues. … 'More serious than effect on share price is what it says for the culture of the company,' said Michael Cohen, an analyst for San Diego-based Pacific American Securities. 'In addition to straightening out the accounting, these companies should find the wrongdoers and get some recovery for shareholders.'"

Ebbers Ordered To Report To Prison September 26. The AP (9/9, Neumeister) reports, "Former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers was ordered to report to prison Sept. 26 to begin serving a 25-year sentence for an $11 billion accounting fraud." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones, in a ruling made public Thursday, ordered Ebbers to surrender to an institution designated by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons to begin serving a sentence that was delayed for the last year while an appeals court considered it." The AP adds, "Ebbers was sentenced in July of last year after he was convicted of fraud and conspiracy in the massive fraud that drove WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002. … The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month upheld his conviction and sentence, finding he was motivated primarily by personal financial circumstances."

Former Enron Executive Delainey Seeks Probation. Bloomberg (9/9, Calkins) reports, "Former Enron Corp. executive David Delainey, who pleaded guilty to insider trading, asked a judge to sentence him to probation or house arrest because he cooperated with prosecutors in their investigation." Bloomberg continues, "Delainey, a Canadian citizen and former head of Enron's energy trading and retail energy services divisions, said he deserves less than the 10-year term he agreed to serve, according to court papers filed Aug. 28. He asked to serve any sentence in Canada, near his job and family in Calgary. … 'Mr. Delainey has provided the government with extraordinary insight and education, and has given powerful, credible testimony,' John Dowd, his lawyer, wrote in court papers filed with U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt in Houston. 'His testimony at the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay was critical to achieving the convictions.'" Bloomberg adds, "Skilling, 52, and Lay, who died in July at age 64, were convicted in May of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the world's largest energy trader. More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions vanished when Enron plunged into bankruptcy in December 2001. … Delainey, 40, pleaded guilty to selling more than $4.26 million in Enron stock between January 2000 and October 2001 based on non-public knowledge of numerous management schemes that were artificially boosting Enron's bottom line. These included realigning business units to hide losses and improperly using reserves to make up shortfalls in earnings expectations. … As part of his plea agreement, Delainey also agreed to forfeit almost $8 million in illicit profits and cooperate with prosecutors when he pleaded guilty to a single count of insider trading in October 2003. In a Sept. 5 response to his sentencing request, prosecutors told Hoyt they will seek an unspecified reduction in Delainey's sentence."

Dunn Denounces Pretexting Tactics In H-P Board Probe. The AP (9/9, Liedtke) reports, "Battling to keep her job, Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn tried Friday to defuse the uproar over a company-ordered investigation that relied on a potentially illegal ruse to obtain the personal phone records of her fellow directors and at least nine reporters." The AP continues, "In an interview, Dunn described the tactics as 'absolutely appalling' and 'embarrassing' while defending the need to pursue the investigation to plug a leak on HP's board. … 'I serve at the pleasure of the board,' Dunn said. 'I totally trust their judgment. If they think it would be better for me to step aside, I would do that. But a number of directors have urged me to hang in there.' She declined to say how many of HP's other nine directors support her." The AP adds, "The board plans to hold an emergency meeting by phone during the weekend to discuss the concerns about the company's investigation as well as Dunn's job status. … California Attorney General Bill Lockyer already has concluded the HP investigation broke state law by obtaining people's private phone records under false pretenses -- a charade known as 'pretexting.' … HP's investigators masqueraded as the directors and reporters targeted in the probe, using their Social Security numbers in some instances to dupe phone companies into turning over lists of personal phone calls."

The San Francisco Chronicle (9/9, Page A - 1, Kopytoff, Guynn) reports, "California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has called the techniques used by Hewlett-Packard's investigators illegal and has opened an inquiry to determine who was responsible. To gain access to the phone records, Hewlett-Packard's investigators obtained Social Security numbers of their targets and then impersonated them online or during phone calls with AT&T. … Dunn stopped short of saying the practice of faking someone's identity to obtain information, called 'pretexting,' was illegal, citing her lack of a legal background. But she said of the tactic, 'I just don't think it's right.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Businessman Sentenced To Prison For Bribing Jefferson. The New York Times (9/9, Drew, 1.21M) reports Judge T.S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., "sentenced Vernon L. Jackson, the chief executive of a Kentucky technology company, to 7 years 3 months in jail for paying more than $400,000 to Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana. In May, Mr. Jackson pleaded guilty to charges that he made the payments to a consulting firm run by Mr. Jefferson's wife in return for the congressman's help on business deals in Africa. Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing and has not been charged. Prosecutors said Mr. Jackson had been cooperating with a federal investigation of the congressman."

The Washington Post (9/9, A8, Lengel, 748K) reports Jackson "said nothing during the proceeding. His attorney, Michael S. Nachmanoff, said he was pleased the judge gave a sentence that was at the low end of the federal guideline." Jefferson "has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing, but sources have said an indictment appears assured."

The AP (9/9, Barakat) reports, "A former congressional aide of Jefferson was sentenced to eight years in prison after admitting that he helped broker some of the bribes paid to Jefferson."

The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (9/9, Cheves) reports, "U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria, Va., noted that Jackson is a self-made entrepreneur with strong ties to his community and church. But Ellis said the punishment must reflect the damage that bribery inflicts on the credibility of government. … Ellis ruled that Jackson won't have to report to prison until at least January, as prosecutors said they want to continue to consult him in their investigation."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/9, Walsh) reports, "Kentucky businessman Vernon Jackson, the son of a school custodian who had built himself into a high-tech multimillionaire only to lose it all, was trying to claw his way back into the game six years ago when he met Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans." The Times-Picayune adds, "Jackson, whose fortune was once estimated at $32 million, saw the congressman as his ticket back to financial success and respectability. Jefferson's connections in Washington and West Africa held the promise of finally finding a market for Jackson's patented telecommunications invention that could make both of them rich. … Instead, according to FBI wiretap transcripts and court pleadings, Jefferson hit up Jackson for nearly $400,000 in bribes and eventually sought to seize control of his fledgling telecommunications company, iGate Inc."

More Firms Linked In Jefferson Probe. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/9, Alpert) reports, "Documents released this week by Nigerian investigators indicate that the ongoing U.S. probe of Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, includes an examination of his links to some previously unreported companies." The Times-Picayune continues, "Nigeria's Economic and Financial Crimes Commission said it had been asked by the U.S. Justice Department to examine the congressman's role not only in promoting a Nigerian project proposed by the Kentucky firm iGate Inc., but also his links to" three firms, including "Life Technology Holdings, now known as Global Environmental Energy Corp., which at one time had offices in New Orleans and filed for bankruptcy protection after its efforts to build garbage incinerators failed to catch on. Along with iGate, it helped finance Jefferson's trip to Western Africa, including Nigeria, in 2004. … TDC Overseas of Baton Rouge, which was looking to build a sugar refinery in Nigeria. George Knost, the company's chief executive officer, said TDC is 'cooperating fully' with the Justice Department probe of Jefferson. The company has 'had no improper dealings with Jefferson or anyone else,' Knost said. … Jefferson Interest Inc., which matches the name of a company registered with the Louisiana secretary of state's office in 1983 that lists Jefferson as president and his brothers Bennie and Mose as vice president and secretary-treasurer, respectively." The Times-Picayune notes, "The Justice Department probe of Jefferson centers on allegations that Vernon Jackson, chief executive officer of iGate Inc., funneled more than $360,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help in getting contracts in Nigeria and Ghana for iGate's copper wire broadband technology. Jackson has pleaded guilty and was sentenced Friday to seven years and three months in jail."

Libby's Backers Renew Criticism Of Fitzgerald After Armitage Admission. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Hamburger, Cooper, 918K) reports that "almost three years ago," special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald learned that Richard Armitage had leaked Valerie Plame's identity to Robert Novak. The Times asks, "So if the mystery was already solved, why did Fitzgerald's investigation continue for almost 36 more months? Why does I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, still face criminal charges in connection with the Plame leak? And why were other senior officials left twisting in the wind, facing possible indictment? Did the special counsel, operating behind the veil of secrecy of all such inquiries, abuse his authority in a witch hunt?" The Times goes on to report, "The discovery of Armitage's role — and the fact that it had been known to investigators so early — is stirring administration defenders to fury. After all, they say, the inquiry left the White House under a cloud of suspicion for months and created a costly distraction for senior officials, including political strategist Karl Rove and even Cheney. 'It's as if a giant hoax were perpetrated on the country — by the media, by partisan opponents of the Bush administration, even by several Bush subordinates who betrayed the president and their White House colleagues,' conservative commentator Fred Barnes wrote this week in a Weekly Standard Magazine column that listed Fitzgerald, the news media and others as the culprits."

The AP (9/9, Apuzzo) quotes several supporters of Lewis "Scooter" Libby's, including former Sen. Fred Thompson, "who…said Fitzgerald had a duty to set the record straight yet continued to urge Armitage's silence. Thompson said the case shows the worst side effects of appointing a special prosecutor." Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, "said Friday she believes Fitzgerald knew that no crime had been committed with the leak of Plame's identity, yet he forced reporters to disclose their confidential sources and even sent" the NYTimes' Judy Miller "to jail."

Federal Investigators Interview Harris' Former Campaign Manager. The St. Petersburg Times (9/9, Kumar) reports, "Federal investigators interviewed U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' former campaign manager as part of an ongoing federal inquiry into her relationship with a convicted defense contractor." The Times continues, "Jim Dornan, who left Harris' Senate campaign in November, spoke to investigators from the FBI and the Defense Department in Washington for about 90 minutes Thursday. … The Justice and Defense departments are examining Harris' dealings with Mitchell Wade, who made illegal campaign contributions to Harris and later asked her to help secure $10-million in federal money for a company project. … They have subpoenaed records from Harris' campaign office and have interviewed at least three former staffers: senior campaign consultant Ed Rollins, congressional chief of staff Fred Asbell and Mona Tate Yost, a congressional aide who later went to work for Wade. … A fourth employee, Kara Borie, Harris' former congressional spokeswoman, was contacted by investigators last month but it is unclear whether she was interviewed." The Times notes, "Wade, who pleaded guilty to bribing another member of Congress, and Harris shared at least two dinners - each costing about $3,000 - at a tony Georgetown restaurant. … Dornan was not working for Harris when she received the donations or requested the money for the project."

US Increases Pressure On Online Gaming Firms. The AP (9/9, Douglas) reports, "Gambling industry experts agree: If you operate an offshore gaming Web site, stay out of the U.S." The AP continues, "Moments after setting foot in the U.S. Thursday, Sportingbet PLC chairman Peter Dicks became the second U.K. offshore sports betting executive arrested in recent months for running an online gambling operation. Former BetOnSports PLC chief executive David Carruthers was arrested on federal charges in July. … It's still unclear if the arrest is a coincidence or part of a government crackdown, but some experts suspect the latter. … And as millions of dollars in bets for the NFL's opening weekend roll into thousands of Web sites, the pressure on the Internet gaming industry has intensified. … 'You don't need legal expertise to know if you are running an offshore gambling site, don't come to America right now. You stand a good chance of being arrested,' Internet gambling expert and lawyer Nelson Rose said." The AP adds, "Dicks, 64, was arrested at Kennedy International Airport in New York after flying from London, where his Web sites operate legally and are traded on the London Stock Exchange. More than $1.5 billion shares in the company were suspended by the LSE at Sportingbet's request Thursday. … Dicks was detained on a Louisiana state warrant from May for gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years year in prison and a $25,000 fine. Similar warrants have been issued for other Sportingbet associates, but authorities would not release information on who or how many of them are wanted. … Seven states have laws prohibiting Internet gambling. The arrest of Dicks marked the first time one of those states has taken action against one of thousands of big-time online gambling operations. Million of American players bet an estimated $6 billion per year online, according to industry figures. … While the Justice Department has said it is being more vigilant in prosecuting illegal offshore betting, the department said Thursday's arrest was not a coordinated effort with state authorities."

US Seeks Death Penalty In Hawaii Child-Beating Death. The Honolulu Advertiser (9/9, Lum) reports, "The U.S. attorney's office in Hawai'i will seek the death penalty in the case of a Schofield Barracks soldier accused of beating to death his 5-year-old daughter last year. … It is only the second time the U.S. Justice Department has approved capital punishment in a Hawai'i case since the federal death penalty law was enacted in 1994." The Advertiser continues, "Army Spc. Naeem Williams was indicted by a federal grand jury in February 2006 on one count of first-degree murder. He is accused of the beating death of his daughter, Talia Williams, at the Williams' Wheeler Army Airfield apartment on July 16, 2005. … Last night, Tarshia Williams, Talia's mother, said from her South Carolina home that it was a 'blessing' that the death penalty was approved for her former husband. Naeem Williams was granted custody of Talia in December 2004."

The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (9/9) reports, "The decision to seek the death penalty was made by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, according to U.S. Attorney Edward Kubo Jr. … The death penalty won't be sought against Delilah Williams, U.S. Attorney Marshall H. Silverberg said. Both are being held in Honolulu, he said." The Star-Bulletin adds, "Hawaii has no death penalty, but Williams will be tried in the state under the federal death penalty law, Silverberg said. … The case is being prosecuted in U.S. District Court because the crime allegedly occurred on a military base, he said."

Former DOD Analyst Sentenced For Giving China Secrets. The AP (9/9) reports, "A former Pentagon intelligence analyst who disclosed classified information to Chinese spies was sentenced Friday to three months in jail."

DOJ_NMG_0060956

The AP continues, "Ronald N. Montaperto, 67, pleaded guilty earlier this year in federal court to unlawful retention of classified documents. He admitted that he had contacts with two intelligence officers from China as early as 1983 and as recently as 2001. … At his sentencing, Montaperto said he had wanted to boost his status in the intelligence community and obtain useful intelligence for the United States. 'I never meant to hurt my country in any way,' he said." The AP adds, "Montaperto's lawyer, Stephen Anthony, said Montaperto was an academic and was untrained in dealing with Chinese spies, and that they essentially wheedled him into making illegal disclosures. … In rejecting prosecutors' request for a term of about two years, U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that there was no evidence that Montaperto sought to profit financially from his disclosures, and that the government would not have had a case had he not admitted his misconduct."

The Washington Times (9/9, Gertz, 88K) reports, "A former Pentagon analyst [Ronald Montaperto] who passed highly classified intelligence to two Chinese military officers was sentenced to three months in prison yesterday -- far shy of four to five years called for in sentencing guidelines." Federal Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said he was "swayed" by "letters of support from current and former intelligence and military officials." The Times contrasts the sentence "with the 12-year prison term given in January to another former Pentagon official, Larry Franklin, who was convicted of providing classified information to [officials from AIPAC]." The AP (9/9) also reports the story.

Fugitive Wanted In New York Troopers' Shooting Captured. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/9, Thompson) reported, on Friday in western New York, Ralph "Bucky" Phillips "couldn't shake his pursuers. The cordon around one of America's most wanted criminals tightened throughout the afternoon and into the evening. At 8 p.m., an exhausted and gaunt Phillips, with helicopters above and SWAT teams and U.S. Marshals closing in, threw up his hands and surrendered." The AP noted, "On Thursday, the FBI put Phillips on its 10 Most Wanted list. Friday's search started shortly before 2 a.m. in Pennsylvania when a police officer tried to pull over a stolen car. After a short chase, the car crashed and the driver, identified by police as Phillips, fled into the woods." The New York Times (99, Wilson, Staba) added, "After the capture, residents clapped and shouted along the dark roads. … By the end of the manhunt, the reward for information leading to Mr. Phillips's capture had grown to $425,000, and he had been added to the F.B.I.'s 10 Most Wanted List, just three names down from Osama bin Laden."

The Albany Times-Union (9/9, Carleo-Evangelist) and Washington Times (9/9) also reported the story, and all three network news broadcasts on Friday reported on the five-month search for Phillips, including his addition last week to the FBI Most Wanted List. At air time, he had been surrounded but not apprehended. The CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 1:40, Pitts) reported that "Phillips stole his first bike in grade school, his first car in middle school, and today, the alleged cop killer made the FBI's 10 most wanted. At this hour, some 300 heavily armed Federal, state, and local law enforcement officers believe they've cornered Phillips near a golf course in upstate New York." ABC World News (9/8, story 8, 2:35, Donovan) noted, "The reward offered for information leading to the capture of Bucky Phillips has now reached $425,000. He's a national figure." NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 8, 2:35, Williams) also reported, "He is one of the most wanted men in this country." In addition to Friday's network news coverage, virtually every cable news program on CNN, MSNBC and Fox News on Friday evening and throughout the day Saturday reported on Phillips' arrest.

CIVIL LAW:

Contractor Fraud In Iraq Is Alleged. The New York Times (9/9, Glanz, 1.21M) reports, "A former employee of a Halliburton subsidiary claims that she was fired for revealing to her managers that the company was charging the government fraudulently inflated costs for military facilities it ran in Iraq, according to court papers unsealed yesterday." She charged that KBR "employees faked head counts to inflate its charges for operating recreational and dining facilities, and led a relatively lavish lifestyle by appropriating food and equipment meant for the troops." Julie McBride's allegations against KBR represent "the second corporate whistleblower case to emerge from Iraq. In the first, a jury found the security company Custer Battles guilty of inflating invoices by $3 million, but the case is now going to appeal after a judge held up the settlement.

The AP (9/9, Hastings) reports the same story, observing, "Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg, Brown & Root charged millions to the government for recreational services never provided to U.S. troops in Iraq, including giant tubs of chicken wings and tacos, a widescreen TV, and cheese sticks meant for a military Super Bowl party, according to a federal whistle-blower suit unsealed Friday. Instead, the suit alleges, KBR used the military's supplies for its own football party." McBride "alleges that KBR deliberately overstated the number of military personnel using its services by counting the same person several times." The AP quotes two other KBR employees who blamed the company for defrauding the government, including instances of serving "spoiled food" to troops.

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Miller, 918K) also reports the story, writing, "The accusations in the lawsuit are the latest involving Halliburton's controversial multibillion-dollar contract to feed and house American soldiers in Iraq. Democrats have been quick to criticize the company, which was run by Vice President Dick Cheney from 1995 to 2000." Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), "the leader in Congress in attacking Halliburton, said that the charges were further proof of war profiteering by the oil services giant."

The Houston Chronicle/Bloomberg (9/9, O'Reilly) reports, "On June 27, the U.S. declined to take part in the case, according to court records. The False Claims Act allows individual whistle-blowers to sue on behalf of the government and recover part of any settlement or verdict. The Justice Department then decides whether to take part, and while plaintiffs may continue to pursue a case if the U.S. declines to join, they must do so at their own expense. … Cynthia Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the complaint but said the agency 'diligently investigates all allegations before determining whether or not to intervene.'"

Red Cross Fined For Violating Blood Safety Laws. NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 9, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Food and Drug Administration has fined the Red Cross $4.2 million for violating blood-safety laws. The violations include failing to ask donors the right questions, not following test procedures. But officials say there's no evidence anyone suffered health problems from these violations."

Judge Dismisses Whistleblower Suit By Former Pfizer Official. Bloomberg (9/9, O'Reilly, Pettypiece) reports, "Pfizer Inc., the world's largest drugmaker, won dismissal of a 'whistleblower' lawsuit by a former executive who accused the company of promoting unapproved uses for Genotropin, a growth hormone." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. District Judge Joseph Tauro in Boston dismissed the suit by Peter Rost, who was a vice president of marketing at Pfizer until he was fired in December 2005. Rost said in a telephone interview that he plans to appeal. … Rost sued Pfizer in 2003 under the False Claims Act, alleging the New York-based company illegally promoted Genotropin for so-called off-label uses and gained sales of $50 million in 2002 as a result. Rost has criticized the drug industry, including Pfizer, for positions such as opposing legislation that would allow Americans to buy drugs abroad. He is also suing Pfizer for wrongful termination in a separate case." Bloomberg adds, "Rost's suit 'fails to identify one actual false claim that was submitted to the government for the reimbursement of an off- label prescription of Genotropin,' Tauro said in his Aug. 30 order. 'No matter how likely the existence of false claims, this court cannot speculate that such claims inevitably flowed from defendants' activities.'" Bloomberg adds, "The Justice Department in December said it wouldn't join Rost's suit. He was fired the same day."

ANTITRUST:

Michaels Gets Antitrust Nod For Buyout. Bloomberg (9/9) reports, "The $6 billion sale of Michaels Stores Inc. to Bain Capital LLC and Blackstone Group LP won U.S. antitrust clearance, according to a list of terminated merger reviews published by the government." Bloomberg continues, "The sale of the biggest U.S. arts and craft retailer to the two private-equity firms was on the list published by the Federal Trade Commission. Bain Capital and Blackstone agreed June 30 to purchase equal shares of Michaels Stores, based in Irving. … Under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, transactions of more than $56 million must be reported to the Justice Department and FTC to give the agencies an opportunity to determine if they might violate antitrust laws. The agencies have 30 days to decide whether to open an investigation or terminate the merger review." Bloomberg adds, "The Justice Department is investigating Michaels' granting of stock options since 1996. A company spokesman said yesterday that an internal review conducted by an independent legal counsel found no evidence to support a conclusion that there was intentional misconduct."

The Dallas Business Journal (9/9) reports, "The move was published on the Federal Trade Commissions list of early termination notices. An early termination is granted only when the FTC and the Department of Justice Antitrust Division have completed their review of the deal and determined not to take any action. … The deal is expected to close late during the third quarter or early in the fourth quarter."

Alltel To Sell Minnesota Operations In Antitrust Deal With DOJ. RCR Wireless News (9/8, Silva) reports, "The Justice Department said Alltel Corp. agreed to sell wireless assets in several rural Minnesota markets as a condition to antitrust approval of its $1 billion purchase of regional operator Midwest Wireless. … 'The department's action ensures that wireless telephone consumers will continue to obtain the benefits of competition—lower prices and higher quality,' said Thomas Barnett, chief of the department's antitrust division. 'The required divestitures preserve competition in rural areas where consumers often have fewer choices for wireless telephone services.'" RCR continues, "The state of Minnesota supports the divestiture, in which Alltel will get rid of mobile phone systems in four rural markets where Midwest also offers service, and the issue is now headed to a federal judge for consideration. The Federal Communications Commission too is expected to rule on the Alltel-Midwest Wireless deal by month's end. … U.S. Cellular Corp. previously warned the FCC that an Alltel-Midwest tie-up would hurt competition in southern Minnesota." RCR adds, "Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., is the nation's fifth-largest mobile phone operator, serving around 11 million customers. Alltel also provides roaming and other wireless services in 35 states to other mobile wireless providers who use CDMA, TDMA and GSM technologies. Alltel had wireless revenues of approximately $6.6 billion last year."

US Pressures Realtors Over Listings Service. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (9/9, Derus) reports, "America's online home shoppers might get a broader view of their choices, because of the Federal Trade Commission. … Regulators want Multiple Listing Service operations to publicly market all 'for sale' listings - not just the ones that guarantee Realtors full sales commissions. Realtors, a trademarked group, created and run the nation's estimated 900 MLS databanks, which showcase all houses for sale listed by Realtors. .. 'We say people should be free to choose,' said Patrick J. Roach, deputy assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Competition. … 'Upwards of three-quarters of people who buy homes use the Internet, and most of what's out there are sites fed by MLS,' Roach said. 'If its rule says that, if you vary from the traditional form of listing agreement, this house is not going to be visible to the general public - well, from an antitrust perspective, that means a bunch of competitors are dictating terms for all agreements.'" The Sentinel adds, "Roach said his Washington, D.C., agency is challenging such rules where it finds them. In the past week, it logged its first two victories. .. .The Austin, Texas, Board of Realtors signed a consent order agreeing to treat all listings equally, and the Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin said it would begin sending exclusive agency listings to www.realtor .com, the biggest public-access site, and the Internet Data Exchange clearinghouse for brokers' sites."

FTC Gives Antitrust Approval To GE's Purchase Of Kinder Morgan Unit. Market Watch (9/9) reports, "General Electric Co. has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the natural gas unit of Kinder Morgan Inc." MarketWatch continues, "The FTC said Friday that it granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. … General Electric's energy unit will buy Kinder Morgan's U.S. natural gas retail operation for $710 million." MarketWatch adds, "The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires under certain circumstances that prospective acquirers of voting securities or assets apply for clearance from regulators. Requests for early termination or clearance are granted when the Federal Trade Commission and the antitrust division of the Department of Justice have determined that they won't take enforcement action during the waiting period."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Dept. Blocks Temporary Nuclear Waste Storage On Reservation. The New York Times (9/9, Stolz, Wald, 1.21M) reports the Interior Department "has moved to block a huge 'interim' nuclear waste storage plant on an Indian reservation here [Skull Valley, UT], citing a lack of confidence that it would truly be temporary because there is so much doubt about completion of a permanent repository, at Yucca Mountain, Nev. But sponsors of the project, which was granted a license by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in February, said that the Interior Department decision had numerous errors and that they were considering an appeal." The Interior Department "said that acting as a 'prudent' trustee of Indian lands, it could 'derive no confidence from the public record' that there would be someplace for the fuel ultimately to go."

Delaware Refinery To Begin Pollution Curbs. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (9/9, Montgomery) reports, "A multi-million dollar system that will tame one of Delaware's largest single air-pollution sources is expected to start up next week at the Valero refinery near Delaware City." The Journal continues, "The new sulfur dioxide 'scrubber' on Valero's petroleum 'coking' unit will demote its smokestack from one of the nation's top refinery sources of acid rain, smog and dust-forming emissions to something more typical of other nearby crude oil processors. … Valero planned to notify by letter thousands of residents who live within 5 miles of the development. … 'It's going to take out 19,000 tons a year of sulfur dioxide -- it's a huge amount, absolutely,' said Ravi Rangan, an environmental program manager for the Department of Natural Resources and Environmental Control." The Journal adds, "Rangan was one of the DNREC officials who helped pursue the refinery's various owners for years over uncontrolled sulfur dioxide emissions and other pollution offenses. The effort eventually wound up in federal and state courts, producing corporate agreements to install two sulfur scrubbers now slated to start up before the end of the year. .. .The Environmental Protection Agency, DNREC and state and federal justice departments collaborated on the settlements and related penalties -- approved in early 2001 and later amended. Recent estimates of the scrubber costs to the refinery have ranged as high as $400 million."

Judge Orders Halt To Petroleum Lease Sales. The AP (9/9, Lee) reports, "Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne expressed confidence in an upcoming oil lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska when he visited the North Slope last week. 'We're set to go forward,' Kempthorne said after taking a helicopter ride over a section of the vast reserve. But that sale will likely have to wait." The

AP continues, "A judge on Thursday temporarily halted lease sales of more than 1 million acres in the NPR-A that environmentalists say are essential feeding and breeding grounds for caribou and migratory birds. … Nearly 13 million acres of the reserve in northern Alaska are available for lease sale or have been sold to oil companies, most notably ConocoPhillips. The company hopes to augment waning crude stocks in the Prudhoe Bay fields east of the NPR-A." The AP adds, "Environmentalists filed the lawsuit against the Department of the Interior, the state of Alaska and oil companies in hopes of cordoning off about 600,000 acres of the 23-million acre reserve from more exploratory drilling. The government had planned to open bids on Sept. 27 for about 1.7 million acres, which encompass the area targeted by environmentalists. … ConocoPhillips has its eye on the contested area, which holds a potential 2 billion barrels of oil beneath the permafrost near Lake Teshekpuk. … The order, filed in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, said the government had not adequately considered the cumulative environmental effects of the lease sales in the eastern and western sections of the reserve." The AP notes, "Environmental impact statements addressed the effects of leasing individual parcels, but those reports were too narrow in scope because they did not consider how leasing in the northeastern part of the reserve would affect land and wildlife in the northwestern section, according to the order. … U.S. District Judge James Singleton chastised the defendants for the oversight, writing that they 'violated the National Environmental Protection Act.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Predicts Border Fence Spending Will Limit Fallout Over Immigration Impasse. The Washington Post (9/9, A5, Babington, 748K) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said that although "Congress will not address major immigration revisions before the Nov. 7 election…he and his allies hope to limit political damage to their party by telling voters they have poured millions of dollars into one component of the controversy: tightening the border with Mexico." Frist "acknowledged that a broad-based immigration bill, backed by President Bush and passed by the Senate, is dead for now. But Republican leaders have added money for border fences and patrol agents to recent spending measures dealing with the Pentagon and homeland security. Frist said he thinks that step may lessen public anger over the porous border and the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country. 'We need to message very well the fact that we have increased over the last two years…the level of funding for immigration and border control fourfold, the fact that by the time we finish here in four weeks we will have 375 miles of fence being built and being funded…and the fact that stopping people at the border coming across has increased…by 25 to 30 percent in the last eight months,' Frist told reporters."

Stalled Legislation Blamed For Weak Turnout At Immigration Rallies. The Washington Post (9/9, B4, Aizenman, Klein, 748K) reports, "In April, Jose Martinez was among the giddiest participants in a pro-immigration rally that attracted more than 100,000 demonstrators to the Mall. … But Thursday afternoon, while immigrants and their supporters were convening on the Mall for a reprise of the April 10 rally, Martinez, 43, was back in the auto shop. … 'No, I'm not going. I'm not motivated this time,' said Martinez." According to the Post, "It was a refrain repeated across the Washington region as immigrants sought to explain how a demonstration that organizers had predicted would mobilize hundreds of thousands fizzled into a gathering of less than 5,000 demonstrators, most from out of town. Rallies in other cities this week drew similar numbers. Many locals who did participate Thursday appeared to be union members bused in by their leaders." One marcher "speculated that fewer people might have shown up because a restrictive immigration bill that loomed large in the spring had stalled after winning House approval. … Meanwhile, a Senate bill that would permit illegal immigrants to legalize their status after paying a fine also stalled, causing some immigrants to lose faith in rallies as engines of change."

System Linking Fingerprint Checks With Immigration Violations Tested. The New York Times (9/9, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "Immigration officials will automatically be notified anytime the local or state police do a federal fingerprint check on a suspect who also happens to be wanted for serious immigration violations, under a new system being tested in Boston. The automated notification is part of a Department of Homeland Security program that could expand the role that the local and state police nationwide play in the immigration enforcement effort. To federal officials, it is a natural next step as police forces have hundreds of thousands of officers who routinely come into contact with illegal immigrants, while Immigration and Customs Enforcement has a squad of only about 6,000 criminal investigators."

Hazelton, Pennsylvania Approves Revisions To Law Aimed Meant To Curb Illegals. The AP (9/9, Rubinkam) reports the City Council of Hazelton, PA "gave tentative approval Friday to an overhaul of an anti-illegal-immigration law considered to be one of the nation's toughest, hoping to put the measure on sounder legal footing. Like the version it will replace if granted final approval Tuesday, the new ordinance punishes businesses that employ illegal immigrants and landlords who rent to them. The revisions, however, remove much of the burden that had been placed on businesses. They soften penalties, give landlords and businesses time to correct violations and leaving it to city officials to verify workers' immigration status with the federal government." The AP notes, "Since the council adopted the original law in July, many municipalities around the nation have approved or considered similar measures."

TAX:

Telecom Official Pleads Guilty To $200 Million Tax Fraud Scheme. The Financial Times (9/9, Grant) reports, "Walter Anderson, a US telecommunications businessman, on Friday pleaded guilty to evading over $100m in taxes in biggest criminal tax fraud in US history." The Times continues, "Mr Anderson was indicted last year on charges that he evaded over $200m in federal income taxes over five years, partly by hiding $450m in earnings at Barclays Bank in the Channel Islands and other offshore accounts. … Prosecutors alleged he concealed his identity as owner of two telecommunications companies in the 1990s through an elaborate web of private mail boxes, including one in the Netherlands." The Times adds, "A search of his home in Washington, DC revealed he had created seven aliases. Officials seized manuals showing how to disguise identities, including one entitled: 'Poof! How to Disappear and Create a New Identity.'"

The New York Times/AP (9/9) reports, "Mr. Anderson started a long-distance telecommunications business in the 1980's as the industry was being deregulated. When his first company, Mid-Atlantic Telecom, merged with another company in 1992, Mr. Anderson formed corporations in the British Virgin Islands to hide the income, prosecutors said. … Authorities said Mr. Anderson used other offshore corporations to disguise his ownership in other telecommunications companies that earned more than $450 million from 1995 to 1999." The AP adds, "Mr. Anderson, who prosecutors said did not file federal income tax returns from 1987 to 1993, has been held without bail since his arrest. Prosecutors say he owes $170 million in federal taxes and $40 million in Washington income taxes."

The Washington Post (9/9, B1, Weiss) reports, "Anderson pleaded guilty at the federal courthouse in Washington to three felony charges -- two for evading federal taxes and one for defrauding the D.C. government with a phony tax return. Among other things, Anderson admitted earning more than $126 million in 1998, a year that he claimed an income of $67,939 on his federal tax return. He paid $495 in taxes that year, authorities said. … 'This case sends a strong signal to anyone thinking about going offshore to avoid taxes,' IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a statement. 'We have stepped up our efforts to pursue high-income tax cheating, whether it takes place in the United States or overseas.'" The Post notes, "In return for his guilty plea, prosecutors dropped nine felony charges. According to the agreement, Anderson and prosecutors have settled on a maximum sentence of 10 years. In court yesterday, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman indicated that he will go along with the agreement at sentencing Jan. 16. … His attorneys -- including a federal public defender -- have repeatedly sought to have Anderson released on bond. They urged the judge yesterday to cut him loose until sentencing, saying Anderson needed the time to, among other tasks, clean up his aging parents' garage and file his taxes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Asserts GOP Will Maintain Majorities In Congress. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he rejected the notion of a Democratic takeover of the House saying, "That's not going to happen." Bush "had been saying that he hoped to revisit Social Security reform next year, when he 'will be able to drain the politics out of the issue,' and I rudely interrupted by noting the polls predicting Ms. Pelosi's ascension." Bush adds, "I believe the Republicans will end up being -- running the House and the Senate. And the reason why I believe it is because when our candidates go out and talk about the strength of this economy, people will say their tax cuts worked, their plan worked. … And secondly, that this is a group of people that understand the stakes of the world in which we live and are willing to help this unity government in Iraq succeed for the sake of our children and grandchildren, and that we are steadfast in our belief in the capacity of liberty to bring peace."

Bush To Focus On Social Security In 2007. In its coverage of President Bush's commemoration of the 9/11 attacks the Washington Post (9/9, A4, Asthana, Fletcher, 748K) notes, "Bush said this week he would like to revisit Social Security reform next year." He "failed last year to persuade Congress to overhaul the New Deal-era program, including the creation of private investment accounts and a reduction of guaranteed benefits for future retirees. His staff has said he is exploring the issue, but his comments to" the Wall Street Journal "were the most definitive that he wanted to try something again -- although he did not say exactly what."

Bush Delays Meeting With US Automakers, But Talks With Ford. The AP (9/9, Riechmann) reports President Bush "delayed a summit with the Big Three automakers, but he called a Ford Motor Co. executive as he flew here to raise funds for a Republican facing a tough Senate race. … Democrats — and Dick DeVos, the Republican gubernatorial candidate in Michigan — say the delay in scheduling the meeting shows Bush is not taking seriously the concerns of a major manufacturing sector and its employees.

The New York Times (9/9, Maynard, 1.21M) reports, "Although he has put off a meeting with Detroit automotive leaders until after the November elections, President Bush called the chairman of Ford Motor on Friday, only days after the struggling automaker named a new chief executive. … Bush's call to the Ford chairman, William Clay Ford Jr., came as the President flew to the Detroit area, where he attended a fund-raising event north of Detroit for Mike Bouchard, the Republican candidate for the United States Senate. Mr. Bouchard is challenging Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Democrat who is completing her first term. During the call, Mr. Bush discussed the changes taking place at Ford, which is struggling to hang on to second place in the American car market. As soon as next week, Ford will announce new steps under its restructuring plan, called the Way Forward, which are expected to include more plant closings, job cuts, and buyout offers." The Times notes, "White House officials said Mr. Bush phoned Mr. Ford because the two are friends."

The Detroit Free Press (9/9, Hyde, 346K) reports, "Raising money for a Senate candidate may have been President George W. Bush's motivation for visiting Michigan on Friday, but he spent at least a few minutes discussing Detroit's auto industry. Bush called Ford…to personally deliver a pledge to meet with the heads of the Detroit automakers after Election Day, aiming yet again to calm the tempest stirred by Michigan Democrats over the lack of a date for the meeting.

Democrats Blast Bush For Failure To Schedule Meeting. The Detroit News (9/9, Cain, Shepardson) reports Bush "made the call amid mounting criticism that he has refused to schedule a meeting with executives from the Big Three to discuss domestic carmakers' problems. White House spokesman Alex Conant said the president called Ford because the two men are friends. 'He looks forward to meeting with the Big Three CEOs after the election,' Conant said. Bush and Ford also talked about the recent hiring of Alan Mulally as the new CEO and president of Ford." Rep. John Dingell, "who has repeatedly criticized the president for his dealings with domestic automakers, was not impressed by the phone call. 'The auto industry wonders who's he working for: us or the foreign automakers,' Dingell said." Sen. Debbie Stabenow "was also critical of the president. 'This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need,' Stabenow said."

New Isikoff And Corn Book Details Cheney's Attempt To Influence Armey. Newsweek (9/9, 3.12M) publishes an excerpt from "Hubris," the new Michael Isikoff and David Corn book "about how the Bush administration sold the Iraq war to its supporters," detailing "the previously untold story of how Dick Armey, who was then House majority leader and a silent skeptic about Iraq, succumbed to Vice President Dick Cheney's pressure—much to Armey's later regret."

Higher-Income Seniors Will Pay More For Medicare Starting Next Year. McClatchy (9/9, Pugh) reports, "After 41 years of charging most older Americans the same price for the same care, Medicare will require affluent seniors to pay higher monthly premiums for coverage of doctors' visits, diagnostic tests and outpatient hospital care beginning in 2007. A little-known provision of the 2003 Medicare Modernization Act calls for an estimated 1.5 million seniors to face premium hikes ranging from 10 to 55 percent over the next three years if they earn at least $80,000 a year, or $160,000 for married couples. Seniors who earn more than $200,000 and couples with incomes over $400,000 will see their so-called 'Part B' premiums rise the most. The move, designed to help shore up Medicare's shaky finances, has enraged many because it was adopted without public debate. A Republican-led conference committee added the measure to the Medicare bill even though neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate version contained it."

Atlantis Teams Prepping For Last Launch Attempt. ABC World News Tonight (9/8, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It was no-go again today for space shuttle Atlantis, when a fuel tank sensor failed. NASA has been trying for two weeks to send the shuttle and its crew to the International Space Station. And they're going to try again tomorrow. And ABC News will carry the shuttle launch live tomorrow, if NASA goes through with it, at 11:15 a.m. Eastern Time."

The New York Times (9/9, Leary, 1.21M) notes, "The effort on Saturday, scheduled for 11:14 a.m., will be the shuttle's last chance before the end of the month to lift off for an 11-day mission to resume construction of the International Space Station. Weather forecasters said conditions at the Kennedy Space Center here should be very good on Saturday morning, with only a slight chance of showers."

In an article titled, "Last-Ditch Launch Attempt," the Los Angeles Times (9/9, Johnson, 918K) reports inside its "A" section, "If the space agency can't get the shuttle off the pad, the launch will have to be put off for weeks, increasing the scheduling pressure on NASA as it works to finish construction of the International Space Station before the shuttle is retired in 2010. The launch window closes after today because a later launch would conflict with the arrival at the space station of a Russian Soyuz craft, which is carrying a new crew. Even if Atlantis launches on schedule, it will be undocking from the space station only 12 hours or so before the arrival of the Soyuz flight."

USA Today (9/9, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "The hatch already had been sealed on Atlantis' crew compartment in preparation for a 11:41 a.m. ET blastoff when launch director Michael Leinbach came onto the radio at 10:54 a.m. ET to break the news. He told the six astronauts that technicians will drain the shuttle's fuel tank and prepare for a possible launch Saturday." USA Today adds, "A Saturday launch would create a delicate job for above-the-air traffic controllers because within 21 hours three spaceships would come and go from the space station. If Atlantis launches Saturday, it would undock from the space station at 9 a.m. ET on Sept. 18, just nine hours after the Soyuz would launch. And 12 hours after the shuttle undocks an unmanned Progress resupply ship also leaves the space station.

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks End Week With Rally. In a brief story, NBC Nightly News (9/8, story 9, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "After two days of losses, Wall Street ended the week on a high note." The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Mckay, 2.03M) reports, "Stocks rallied to end an otherwise rocky week of trading, helped by a decline in crude-oil prices to a five-month low and comments by the president of the Cleveland Federal Reserve." The Journal notes, "n particular, traders celebrated the fact that, as the weekend approached, no major storms were threatening offshore drilling facilities in the Gulf of Mexico. On many Fridays in the past, traders have bought futures in order not to be "caught short" in the event of a crisis while markets were closed over the weekend."

Bloomberg (9/9) notes, "The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 4.90, or 0.4 percent, to 1298.92. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 60.67, or 0.5 percent, to 11,392.11. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 10.50, or 0.5 percent, to 2165.79." But "The S&P 500 dropped 0.9 percent since last Friday, the biggest decline since the period ended Aug. 11. The Dow average lost 0.6 percent and the Nasdaq retreated 1.3 percent."

The New York Times/AP (9/9) in an article titled "A Brief Rebound But Losses For The Week" reports similar details.

Rising Wages Spurs Decrease In Consumer Borrowing. The New York Times/Bloomberg (9/9) reports, "Consumer borrowing increased less than expected in July as higher incomes allowed Americans to reduce their credit card use." Bloomberg adds, "Rising wages gave Americans more cash to spend as they went to shopping malls and auto dealerships in July. Consumer borrowing and spending may slow in coming months as the cooling housing market dents confidence and household wealth."

The AP (9/9, Crutsinger) adds, "The Federal Reserve reported Friday that consumer borrowing rose at an annual rate of 2.8 percent in July, down from an increase of 7.3 percent in June." It "was led by a sharp deceleration in credit card debt, which rose by just 3.4 percent in July after gains of 13.2 percent in June and 13 percent in May."

States Must Find Jobs For Welfare Recipients To Meet Federal Requirements. The AP (9/9, Freking) reports, "The welfare rolls aren't dropping as fast as they used to, and that could pose a big money problem for states from coast to coast after a new federal law takes effect next month. The states' task: find jobs for tens of thousands of people on welfare or risk losing millions in federal money. More than two dozen states have work to do, including Pennsylvania, California and Michigan. The law requires states to place into job training, community service or other work activities 50 percent of their households that get welfare aid — and 90 percent of two-parent households that receive assistance." Wade Horn, assistant secretary at the Department of Health and Human Services, is quoted as saying, "About a quarter of the states are really going to have to work hard."

Bush Attends Fundraisers For Bouchard And Talent. The AP (9/9, Riechmann) reports President Bush Bush "was in Michigan for a luncheon fundraiser for Mike Bouchard, the sheriff of Oakland County in suburban Detroit, who is running against" Sen. Debbie Stabenow. The fundraiser "raised $1.5 million for the Michigan Republican Party and Bouchard, who greeted Bush at the airport and rode in the motorcade. … Later, Bush traveled to Kansas City, Mo., where he raised $600,000 at another private event for Sen. Jim Talent, who is facing a difficult re-election challenge from Democratic state Auditor Claire McCaskill. The fundraiser drew hundreds of protesters — some carrying signs that said 'Bring 'em home' and 'No Iran War'."

The Detroit Free Press (9/9, Lam, 346K), in an article titled, "Bush's Speech Called Uplifting And Warm," reports President Bush "swooped in Friday afternoon for a fund-raiser at a palatial house in Clarkston, pleasing listeners with a casual, upbeat speech." Rep Mike Rogers "described Bush's remarks as relaxed, uplifting and warm. 'He talked a little about terrorism and the economy but spent more time talking about the trials and tribulations of being a wartime president,' Rogers said.

The Detroit News (9/9, Cain, Shepardson) reports, "On the drive from Flint's Bishop International Airport to Clarkston, the president's motorcade passed by supporters and protesters who lined the streets. Some applauded, some faced the other way showing the president their backs."

DOJ_NMG_0060963

The Kansas City Star (9/9, Helling, Kraske, Canon, 278K) reports, "Air Force One landed uneventfully at Kansas City International Airport about 3:40 p.m. Friday and took off the same way at 6:31. In between, hands were shaken, politics were discussed, large checks were discreetly handled. On Ward Parkway, protesters protested. Across the street, reporters and photographers cooled their heels in a mansion under rehab. … Nothing for the public, nor any impromptu news conferences. He didn't stop at a barbecue pit, either. (He never does. What's up with that, anyway?) So no national ripples; don't go surfing CNN or FOX. Of course, it was pretty exciting if you were one of the 450 folks who were shuttled to the Scott Ward home at 1217 W. 55th St. and got to grip and grin with the big dog, the leader of the free world." The Star adds, "People who attended said Bush spoke about 45 minutes, mixing politics with policy, although he did not take questions. He told the gathering that Talent and Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, who also was there, would provide the help he needs to pass legislation expanding his authority to prosecute the war on terror." Former U.S. Rep. Wendell Bailey "said Bush talked about his 'commitment to the presidency rather than being the president. He's just hard to beat in that venue.'"

Romney Fails To Appear In Public With Cheney In Boston. The Boston Globe (9/9, Mishra, Levenson, 425K) reports, "Avoided in public by the state's leading Republicans, Vice President Dick Cheney arrived in Boston yesterday and was greeted by a boisterous protest and a well-heeled GOP crowd in the Back Bay. When Cheney's plane touched down at Logan International Airport, he was greeted by a little-known state representative from Shrewsbury and a small band of local officials. Governor Mitt Romney and Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey were nowhere in sight, and the vice president, whose poll numbers make him among the least popular political figures in the country, was whisked away in a black limousine." The Globe adds, "Cheney's visit created traffic snarls, and for a few afternoon hours, Back Bay became a congested circus. Sign-waving protesters chanted into bullhorns. A massive retinue of police officers and Secret Service agents lined the streets. … Inside the Harvard Club, Cheney spoke for about 20 minutes to nearly 300 guests, giving a public service award to Richard J. Egan , the founder of the Hopkinton-based EMC Corp. and a stalwart Bush supporter. He also spoke about the war on terrorism." The Globe notes, "In attendance yesterday were Romney , Healey , former governor Paul Cellucci and the new Turnpike Authority head, John Cogliano."

Lamont Praised Lieberman's Rebuke Of Clinton In 1998. The New York Times (9/9, Medina, 1.21M) reports Ned Lamont, "who this week chastised Senator Joseph I. Lieberman for his public rebuke of President Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal, wrote to Mr. Lieberman at the time praising the eloquence of his speech on the Senate floor. 'I supported your statement because Clinton's behavior was outrageous: a Democrat had to stand up and state as much, and I hoped that your statement was the beginning of the end,' Mr. Lamont, then a cable television executive, wrote in an e-mail message to the senator's Washington office on Sept. 16, 1998, two weeks after Mr. Lieberman's speech. … At the time, Mr. Lamont wrote that he had 'supported the moral outrage' Mr. Lieberman expressed reluctantly because he 'thought it might make matters worse,' adding that 'unfortunately, the statement was the beginning of a process that has turned more political and morally offensive.' He urged Mr. Lieberman to 'stand up and use your moral authority to put an end to this snowballing mess,' and suggested that 'It's time for you to make up your mind and speak your mind as you did so eloquently last Thursday.'" Lamont, "who declined to discuss the 1998 speech when an Associated Press reporter asked about it on Friday, was unavailable to explain the apparent discrepancy between his recent remarks and his e-mail at the time."

The AP (9/9, Christoffersen) reports Lieberman "defended his reprimand of former President Clinton for his involvement with a White House intern, dismissing rival Ned Lamont's claim that he turned the 1998 rebuke into a spectacle. 'It was important for someone who was a Democrat to stand up and call on him publicly to accept more responsibility for what he had done,' Lieberman said Friday. 'In that case, I stood up and did what I believed was right for our country.'"

Lieberman Must Build His GOTV Operation From The Ground Up. The New York Times (9/9, Medina, Healy, 1.21M) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman "has begun a complicated, occasionally clumsy tango as he tries to woo Democrats, Republicans and unaffiliated voters without the backing of any party." Lieberman "has been seeking Democrats while appealing to Republicans with tough talk about terrorism that is similar to President Bush's. He is mulling creating nonpartisan 'citizen town committees' because he must build a new voter-turnout operation from scratch. And he is calibrating his language to try to appeal across party lines without seeming inconsistent or awkward — though, at times, he does. No longer the Democratic nominee, he has lost a handful of union endorsements, and his allies in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. may stay neutral. His campaign must replace and train hundreds of field workers that the state party usually deploys to help turn out voters."

Nancy Reagan Asks Webb Campaign To Pull Ad Featuring President Reagan. The Washington

DOJ_NMG_0060964

Post (9/9, B1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports former first lady Nancy Reagan asked Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb "to not use a television commercial that shows former president Ronald Reagan praising Webb, his former Navy secretary. In a letter faxed to Webb at 5 p.m., the chief of staff of the Reagan Library in California urged him to not use footage from a speech by the former president at the Naval Academy in 1985. … 'Using the president's name, image or likeness implies endorsement which is neither fair nor respectful of any candidate, certainly not after President Reagan's death,' wrote Joanne Drake. 'At the direction of Mrs. Reagan, please refrain.'" Webb's campaign "immediately rejected the criticism and said it intended to proceed as planned by running the commercial in Norfolk, Roanoke and Northern Virginia."

The AP (9/9, Lewis) reports, "In a telephone interview, Edwin Meese, attorney general under Reagan, called use of the footage 'improper, unethical and very possibly illegal. ... For him to use video of Ronald Reagan to appear in a campaign ad to favor him is fraud.' The ad debuts days after Allen mailed campaign brochures that include a photo of a boyish looking Allen standing beside Reagan. The same photo and a Reagan quote appear on Allen's campaign Web site." Sen. George Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, "called the ads 'disingenuous and terribly hypocritical' and cited Webb's 1988 resignation, saying he 'quit on Ronald Reagan after he did not get his way as Navy secretary.'"

Many Voters In "Bellwether" Virginia Town Said To Be Undecided. The Washington Times (9/9, McLaughlin, 88K) reports on Bedford, VA which "has picked the Republican winners -- President Bush and Sens. George Allen and John W. Warner -- and Democratic winners Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner in Virginia's presidential, congressional and gubernatorial races since 2000."

Menendez's Ethnicity And Background Said To Hamper His Campaign. McClatchy (9/9, Clark) reports Sen. Robert Menendez "is staking his campaign to keep his Senate seat on staunch opposition to the war, lacing his speeches with the body count and price tag of the conflict. It's a strategy that Democrats hope to use to oust Republican incumbents. And it strikes a chord in this heavily Democratic state, where polls suggest that the war is increasingly unpopular. But Menendez's race…has turned into an unexpectedly close and increasingly contentious contest, to the puzzlement of strategists, who wonder whether his ethnicity is a factor." Menendez "voted against the war in Iraq, and he's outdone his opponent 3-to-1 in fundraising. Still, he finds himself neck and neck with Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr., a state senator with a brief record but an outsized name. … Some question whether Menendez's Hispanic roots - and surname - are playing a role in dampening the polls. 'Sad to say, but I do think the Latino surname may be hurting him on the margins,' said David Rebovich, a political science professor at New Jersey's Rider University Institute for New Jersey Politics. 'And there's a lot of skepticism about the Hudson County ties.' The campaign in many ways has revolved around Hudson County, a gritty collection of cities hard by the New York skyline that for years has welcomed newly arrived immigrants - and earned a reputation for political corruption."

Prosecutors Probe Nonprofit That Paid Menendez $300,000 In Rent. The New York Times (9/9, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "Federal prosecutors are reportedly examining the records of a nonprofit community agency in Hudson County that paid more than $300,000 in rent to…Menendez while also getting millions of dollars in federal grants with Mr. Menendez's help. WNBC-TV and The Star-Ledger of Newark reported on Thursday that the United States attorney's office had issued subpoenas to the agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, in Union City, this week. A spokesman for the United States attorney declined to confirm or deny those reports on Friday, and repeated attempts to reach the North Hudson Community Action Corporation were unsuccessful." Menendez "criticized the timing of the subpoenas as being politically motivated, and repeated his earlier assertions that he did nothing either illegal or unethical."

Debate Highlights Cardin And Mfume's Similarities. The Washington Times (9/9, Ward, 88K) reports, "One question remained after the two leading Democrats in Maryland's U.S. Senate primary debated for more than an hour in front of an audience of black pastors in Prince George's County yesterday. 'How do the two of you differ?' the moderator asked. 'A lot of times we seem to be very similar,' Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin said. 'I think we're different.' 'We get this question all the time,' said former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman. Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume, whose contest will be decided in Tuesday's primary, emphasized that they have avoided negative attacks and have focused on issues. … But after opening statements and 10 rounds of questions on issues ranging from the war in Iraq and genocide in Sudan to mandatory minimum sentencing and same-sex 'marriage,' their responses provided little to separate the two candidates."

Suburban Philadelphia's Three Close House Races Noted. McClatchy (9/9, Thomma) reports, "There are 435 elections for House seats this fall, but only a few dozen are competitive, and they're almost all in the Northeast and Midwest. Many of them are held by moderate Republicans in places, such as suburban Philadelphia, that went for Democratic presidential candidates Al Gore and John Kerry, as well as local Democrats such as Gov. Ed Rendell. Now, thanks in part to voters' anger at the war in Iraq and disapproval of President Bush, Democrats have an opportunity in these districts to take advantage of a shift away from the national Republican Party that was already occurring."

Wynn Faces Surprising Challenge From Liberal Activists. The Washington Post (9/9, B2, Wiggins, 748K) reports Rep. Albert R. Wynn "has not faced formidable opposition since he was elected in 1992. He has trounced challengers, returning to office with no less than 80 percent of the vote in a primary or general election. But Wynn is facing the political challenge of his career in Tuesday's Democratic primary against Donna Edwards, a lawyer and community activist who has mounted a vigorous and well-organized campaign to represent Maryland's 4th Congressional District. Edwards drew little attention when she filed campaign papers in April to run against Wynn, but she has raised her profile in part with the help of Internet bloggers, who support her positions on the environment, campaign finance reform and Iraq. Edwards opposes the war; Wynn voted for the resolution authorizing it." Wynn "has spent little time campaigning in past elections but has increased his number of public appearances in his district, which includes parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties."

Schwarzenegger Apologizes For Commenting On Legislator's Ethnic Background. ABC World News (9/8, story 7, 0:25, Gibson) reported Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "has found his way into a new controversy, recording remarks he made. The comments came during a closed-door meeting with his advisers in March. And today, he apologized and said the recording made him cringe." 'She's Puerto Rican or same thing or Cuban. I mean they all are very hot. They have the Black blood in them and part Latina blood in them.' Governor Schwarzenegger was speaking about California assembly woman Bonnie Garcia, who is Puerto Rican. She said she was not offended."

The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Salladay, Finnegan, 918K) reports, "Garcia, who has been campaigning for Schwarzenegger as one of his highest profile Latina supporters, said there was no need for apologies, because she refers to herself as hotblooded. The governor attended a fundraiser for Garcia's reelection campaign Thursday."

The New York Times (9/9, Steinhauer, 1.21M) reports Schwarzenegger's Democratic opponent, Phil Angelides, "released a statement chastising the governor. 'Once again, Governor Schwarzenegger has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state,' Mr. Angelides said. But Ms. Garcia, a Republican and an ally of Mr. Schwarzenegger, responded in kind. 'The only embarrassment in California today is Phil Angelides's sad and predictably partisan statement,' she said in a statement distributed by the Schwarzenegger campaign."

The Washington Post (9/9, A2, Pomfret, 748K) reports, "The action hero-turned-governor acknowledged that the tape-recorded comments made him 'cringe' when he read them in yesterday's editions of the Los Angeles Times."

The AP (9/9, Blood) notes Schwarzenegger, "in a tight re-election race, has displayed a more restrained, statesmanlike demeanor while all but retiring his trademark Hollywood swagger. But the newly disclosed remarks challenge that carefully managed image and provide a reminder of his history of off-the-cuff — and sometimes off-color — remarks."

Bush Focused On Diplomatic Solutions To Dilemma Posed By Iran. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he acknowledged he allowed former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami to visit the US because, "I'm interested in learning more about the Iranian government, how they think, what people think within the government. My hope is that diplomacy will work in convincing the Iranians to give up their nuclear weapons ambitions. And in order for diplomacy to work, it's important to hear voices other than [current President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's." The Journal notes, "The impression Mr. Bush leaves is of a man deeply engaged on the Iran problem and, like several presidents before him, trying to understand what kind of diplomatic or economic pressure short of military means will change the regime's behavior. One way or another, Iran will be the major dilemma of the rest of his presidency, and Mr. Bush knows it."

Khatami Warns US Against Strike On Iran. Time Magazine (9/9, Zagorin) interviews Khatami about the Iran-US relations, the Iraq war and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. By way of introduction, Times says, "As the most prominent of his nation's reformers, he repeatedly distanced himself from many of the hardline views of Iran's current leadership, but strongly critized the U.S. for what he suggested is 'arrogance' in Iraq. He also cited human-rights violations at both Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib, and warned of the 'costs' of a U.S. or Israeli military strike on his country. But he endorsed a 'two-state solution' to achieve peace between Israel and the Palestinians, and called the Holocaust a 'historical fact.'" Khatami says, "My opposition to Israel is moral. The peaceful solution to the problem of Palestine is to recognize Palestinian rights. This is the only way there could be sustained peace in the region." Khatami later says he believes "the Holocaust, which is an absolute fact, a historical fact, would be misused. The Holocaust should not be, in any way, an excuse for the suppression of Palestinian rights."

Treasury Blocks Key Iranian Bank From US Financial System. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Solomon, 2.03M) reports remarks by Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey that his staff "has blocked a major Iranian bank's access to the U.S. financial system, the latest step in Washington's growing attempt to isolate Iran." Bank Saderat, "one of Iran's largest state-owned banks, no longer will be able to use the U.S. financial system." Levey said the bank "had helped transfer hundreds of millions of dollars to terrorist organizations, including Hezbollah and Hamas." The Journal says the "quest to cut off Iran's support to Hezbollah gained urgency this summer when" the Israel-Hezbollah conflict broke out, and "the U.S. is eager to show that Iran can be cut off economically in the run-up to United Nations Security Council debates this fall that will focus on ways to impose economic sanctions for Tehran's refusal to" suspend uranium enrichment. The Journal calls yesterday's action "part of a broader Bush administration effort to hamper Iran's efforts to aid terrorism and acquire sophisticated weapons, by convincing other governments and financial institutions world-wide to stop doing business with Iranian-controlled companies."

The Washington Post (9/9, A11, Kessler, 748K) notes the Administration "has stepped up a broad effort to choke off Iran's ability to finance militant groups and acquire weapons technology by cutting off suspect banks and firms from the international banking system." That effort "has gathered steam in recent weeks" because of the uranium enrichment issue and the Israel-Hezbollah conflict. The Treasury Department is "accusing Bank Saderat of funneling $50 million to a Hezbollah-controlled firm since 2001."

The AP (9/9, Aversa) says the Administration is "stepping up the pressure on Tehran" with the Bank Saderat move." The AP explains, "While Iranian financial institutions are barred from directly accessing the U.S. financial system, they are permitted to do so indirectly through a bank in another country. The United States is closing down that avenue for Bank Saderat," but the move "doesn't apply to other Iranian banks." The action "marked the administration's latest effort to turn up the heat on Iran," and "is the latest step to financially clamp down on Hezbollah, which the United States says is bankrolled in large part by Iran."

Burns Holds Talks On Iran, Says US Pushing For Sanctions. The New York Times (9/9, Dempsey, 1.21M) reports Undersecretary Burns said publicly yesterday that Washington "wants the major powers to begin talks next week on a draft United Nations resolution against Iran if it does not halt its enrichment of uranium." He is quoted saying, "We are heading toward the U.N. Security Council to consider a sanctions regime." He further said that [his] meeting with the European diplomats, held Thursday, was 'the first time we sat together to discuss what type of sanctions' to impose on Iran. He said talks with them and the diplomats from Russia and China would resume Monday by conference call, and then shift to the United Nations." The AP (9/9, Jahn) says Burns "also dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-power coalition pushing Tehran to give up enrichment." The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Jahn) runs the AP report this morning.

Khatami Decries Terrorism "Masked" In Islam. The AP (9/9, Mann) details a speech last night by visiting former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami in which he "decried a wave of 'Islamophobia' that he said is being spread in the United States by fear and hatred of Islam in response to terror perpetrated by Muslims." Khatami is quoted, "In the crime of 9/11, two crimes were committed. One was killing innocent people. The second crime was masking this crime in the name of Islam." Khatami also told American Muslims that they "should show their countrymen by example that they, not terrorists, represent Islam." The AP notes, "The talk broke no new ground for Khatami, considered a reformist during his two terms as president that ended last year. He was among the first foreign leaders to condemn the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. His visit to the United States drew criticism from some politicians and others because of the bitter contention now under way between Iran and the United States over actions of his successor, Mahmoud Ahmedinejad."

Khamenei Said To Sideline Other Authorities To Solidify His Dominance. In an 1,841-word piece on its front page, the New York Times (9/9, A1, Slackman, 1.21M) profiles Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme spiritual leader and the "primary architect" of its "combative" foreign policy. "Cloaked in religious robes, with a black turban signaling that he is a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad, Ayatollah Khamenei delivers the same blistering anti-American, anti-British, anti-Israeli message as the president. His political evolution charts his own rise to power." Although he once "questioned the absolute power of Iran's supreme leader, saying Islamic law and the Constitution must come first," he "has emerged as an aggressive defender of his own right to have the final say in all matters of state and religion — a power he has not been afraid to exercise." Analysts believe Khamenei has sought "a more confrontational approach with the West because he grew disillusioned with the so-called confidence-building policy pursued by the reformist government of Mohammad Khatami." Khamenei has built "a political base among Iran's more fundamentalist circles, which are suspicious of the West. Along the way, he succeeded in sidelining most of those with independent authority, such as the former two-term president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, who pushed to select Ayatollah Khamenei as supreme leader."

Bush Remains Steadfast In Support Of Spreading Democracy In Mideast. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, Gigot, 2.03M) reports that in an interview with President George Bush he dismissed critics who "are saying the Bush Doctrine of spreading democracy in the Middle East is dead." He "concedes that Hamas's 'militant wing,' as he calls it, is 'unacceptable.' But he says he sees a virtue in 'creating a sense where people have to compete for people's votes. They have to listen to the concerns of the street.' The answer is for other Palestinian leaders to out-compete Hamas to respond to those concerns. 'Elections are not the end. They're only the beginning. And, no question, elections sometimes create victors that may not conform to everything we want. … On the other hand, it is the beginning of a more hopeful Middle East."

Israel Lifts Naval Blockade Of Lebanon. The New York Times (9/9, Smith, 1.21M) reports Tel Aviv "lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon on Friday, releasing its last major chokehold on the country since war broke out in July." Critically "important for the Lebanese economy, ships loaded with cars, food and oil steamed toward Beirut." Tel Aviv "said it had turned over responsibility for patrolling the Lebanese coast to Italian warships, which would help the Lebanese Navy enforce a United Nations-mandated arms embargo against Hezbollah." The Times says Hezbollah likely "still has plenty of weapons, and they doubt that it would try to import more arms now in any case. Few Lebanese, meanwhile, believe the multinational naval presence can do much to stop any banned shipments that do come."

The Washington Post (9/9, A10, Cody, 748K) notes Tel Aviv "Israel lifted its eight-week-old maritime blockade of Lebanon on Friday, the United Nations announced, and within hours a gleaming white ship pulled into Beirut harbor carrying a load of appliances." Yesterday's shipping "lineup reflected Beirut's role as a regional hub for imports and exports, a major component of the Lebanese economy that withered under restrictions even after fighting ended."

The Financial Times (9/9, England, Morris) notes, prior to the lifting, "Lebanon said the blockade was costing the nation tens of millions of dollars a day and restricted the import of goods - many of which would come through the port - hampering efforts to reconstruct the country following Israel's bombardment. … The loss of business has been huge." The AP (9/9, Dakroub) says the lifting of the naval blockade ends "the country's two months of isolation as the task of preventing the entry of Hezbollah weapons falls to international warships patrolling offshore." It has also removed "a barrier that has stifled Lebanon and cost the country tens of millions of dollars as it tries to rebuild from the devastating 34-day war." The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Dakroub) runs the AP story this morning.

Siniora Said To Struggle To Hold Divided Lebanon Together. In an analysis piece, the Financial Times (9/9, Khalaf) notes Lebanese Primes Minister Fouad Siniora "focused on averting sectarian conflict and keeping a fractious government (in which Hizbollah is a minority partner) together. He balanced all concerned parties' demands but managed to win concessions, not least Hizbollah's consent to the deployment of the Lebanese army and an expanded UN" border force. "The work was hard, but managing the postwar period could prove more daunting. After projecting a common front during the war, Lebanon has emerged politically divided, socially polarised and with an economy in tatters."

Indian Mosque Bombing Kills 31, Wounds 100. The New York Times (9/9, Sengupta, Kumar, 1.21M) reports, "A series of explosions struck in and near the largest mosque in a flashpoint textile town in western India on Friday, killing more than two dozen people, wounding more than 100 and raising the specter of renewed sectarian clashes." The Times says the city of Malegaon has "a history of Hindu-Muslim violence," and notes the targeted mosque is "home to one of the largest Muslim cemeteries in the area." The three explosions "were unusual in that they seemed to target a heavily Muslim area," and "came three days after what now sounds like a prophetic warning from" Prime Minister Manmohan Singh "about the many-headed specter of violence threatening his country." India "has suffered a spate of terrorist attacks in recent years, including the July 7 commuter train bombings in Mumbai, which the authorities have blamed on Islamist militants setting up so-called sleeper cells across the country."

The Washington Post (9/9, A14, Naqvi, 748K) adds, "At least two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded Friday in the town of Malegaon in the western Indian state of Maharashtra, killing 31 people and injuring 125 more, most of them Muslim worshipers leaving a mosque after Friday afternoon prayers." TV "footage on Friday showed chaos as hundreds of people, mostly men in white skullcaps, rushed around in panic after the explosions. There were scenes of people carrying the bodies of the dead and injured. Doctors worked on bloodied survivors brought in on stretchers. People seeking loved ones viewed bodies laid out on the ground, covered by white shrouds."

The AP (9/9, Khan) reports, "Two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded in throngs of Muslims as they left Friday prayers at a mosque in this western Indian city, killing 31 people and wounding 100." Maharashtra Chief Minister Vilasrao Deshmukh "called the blasts 'a terrorist act,' and authorities — fearing revenge attacks across the country's fragile religious divides — clamped a curfew on Malegaon and put security forces on alert." The AP also noted the city "has long been the scene of violence between Hindus and Muslims. The city of about 500,000 people is 75 percent Muslim."

Saudi Muttawa Crack Down On Pet Sales. The Washington Times/AP (9/9, Abu-Nasr) reports Riyadh "religious police, normally tasked with chiding women to cover themselves and ensuring men attend mosque prayers, are turning to a new target: cats and dogs. The police have issued a decree banning the sale of the pets, seen as a sign of Western influence," within Jidda and Mecca. "The prohibition on dogs may be less of a surprise because conservative Muslims despise dogs as unclean. But the cat ban befuddled many, since Islamic tradition holds that the Prophet Muhammad loved cats." While "pet owning is not common in the Arab world," pet ownership has "become a fashion statement among Saudis" in recent years.

Beijing Appoints Polished, Knowledgeable Envoy To Pyongyang. The Washington Post (9/9, A11, Fan, 748K) reports Beijing "has appointed an outspoken career diplomat with extensive knowledge of the United States as its new ambassador to North Korea." Asian security experts "said the appointment of Liu Xiaoming, 50, suggests officials in Beijing are reassessing their relationship with Pyongyang and trying to find a new way to press discussions among China, North Korea and the United States." One analyst is quoted saying Liu "is young and capable, a new-generation diplomat who is outspoken and sees things with a sharp eye. One of his biggest advantages is his knowledge of the United States." Another expert said Liu's selection "is unlikely to affect the current deadlock in six-party talks over North Korea's nuclear program, but it shows that China is thinking about its relations with North Korea in a more comprehensive manner."

Russia Begins Destroying Nerve-Agent Chemical Weapons. The AP (9/9, Ingram) reports, "Engineers covered in head-to-toe protective gear inserted a neutralizing solution Friday into bombs filled with a nerve agent, officially starting the work of Russia's first plant for destroying the deadly chemicals. The opening of the Maradykovsky plant accelerates Russia's campaign to eliminate the world's largest arsenal of the toxins." The AP says the facility "will become a focal point of the push to meet an April 2007 target for Russia to destroy 20 percent of its stockpile." Russia has destroyed three percent of that stockpile, while the US has destroyed 39 percent of its chemical weapons. "Besides the Maradykovsky plant, Russia has two other chemical weapon destruction facilities, both built with generous foreign funding. The Maradykovsky plant is the only one for destroying nerve agents as opposed to blister agents."

Understaffed And Outmaneuvered, African Union Force Struggles To Keep Darfur Peace. The New York Times (9/9, Polgreen, 1.21M) reports, "The missing fuel and the struggle over who controls the main military airstrip in Darfur lays bare just how little autonomy the African Union force actually has as it struggles to keep a fragile peace in" Darfur. The AU force, "with its poor equipment and tiny contingent of 7,000 troops, had hoped to turn over command to a larger, better-equipped United Nations-led force at the end of the month. The Security Council has approved the step." Khartoum, however, "has refused, as it continues to press an offensive against some rebel factions. It has instead proposed keeping the African Union force in place, and from [the limitations put on that force by Khartoum], it is easy to see why." AU soldiers told the Times about "what has become an impossible mission — to oversee a peace deal most of the militants in this brutal conflict have signed and to monitor a cease-fire that hardly anyone respects." The Times adds, "But as weak as the African Union force is, nearly all agree it is better than none at all. Frantic diplomatic negotiations are now taking place to make sure some kind of peacekeeping force remains in Darfur, where hundreds of thousands of people have died and 2.5 million have been pushed from their homes in the fighting."

A Washington Post (9/9, A10, Timberg, 748K) piece this morning details the government's use of helicopter gunships against villagers and rebel forces. "Thousands of villagers have been victimized by government troops and proxy militiamen who killed, raped and looted. Now the government is intensifying an air war featuring Soviet-era Antonov planes jury-rigged into bombers and Mi-24 helicopter gunships turned against mud-and-thatch huts. New waves of shellshocked villagers have left their homes and trekked for days to bulging relief camps." The Post calls the 7,000-member AU force "a limited but crucial buffer against the government forces."

Bill Richardson Secures Salopek's Release. The Washington Post (9/9, A10, Timberg, 748K) reports Chicago Tribune Pulitzer-Prize winning journalist Paul Salopek "said from a Sudanese prison Friday night that the government would soon release him and two Chadian colleagues after a 34-day confinement." President Omar Hassan al-Bashir "agreed to release Salopek after meeting with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in Khartoum." Richardson announced that "the three men are expected to be freed" today. Salopek "will return to the United States with Richardson, though the details of their trip have not yet been finalized." He "said he hoped his experience would not prevent other journalists from coming to Sudan to cover Darfur." The New York Times (9/9, Polgreen, 1.21M) adds Khartoum said the releases would be done "on 'humanitarian grounds.'"

Blair Tells Brown He Will Step Down On May 4.

The Financial Times (9/9, Blitz) reports UK Prime Minister Tony Blair and Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown "have reached an understanding that the prime minister will resign on May 4, paving the way for a new Labour leader to take office in mid-June." Gordon allies "said there was now a broad understanding between the two men that Mr Blair will announce next February that he intends to quit as party leader on May 4, 2007 -- one day after the Scottish and Welsh regional elections." Blair's Thursday announcement "amounted to a major victory for Mr Brown." Yesterday, former Home Secretary Charles Clarke "weighed into the leadership row saying Mr Brown's behaviour had been 'absolutely stupid.'" The Times notes Blair's resignation will begin a six-week Labor leadership campaign, "which will see Mr Blair's successor -- almost certain to be Mr Brown -- installed by mid-June."

The New York Times (9/9, Cowell, 1.21M) adds "a rancorous new debate erupted in the Labor Party" Friday, "threatening to upend the uneasy truce that followed a week of feuding between the men over the timing of Mr. Blair's departure. In the new uproar," Clarke "called Mr. Brown's recent behavior stupid." The Times adds, "The signs of restlessness suggested that some legislators were not satisfied with Mr. Blair's refusal to be pinned down on a firm departure date. Some people in Mr. Brown's camp now expect that to be early next May." Notably, the Times says, "some legislators said the duel had damaged Mr. Brown's prospects as an unchallenged successor."

The AP (9/9, Gardiner) adds, "Bitter infighting flared in Tony Blair's Labour Party on Friday as" Clarke "criticized the prime minister's likely successor." Blair and Brown "appeared to have reached a private understanding on the handover of power. But a sharp attack on Brown by Clarke — a Blair ally until the prime minister fired him in May — made clear the peaceful interval that party bigwigs had hoped for was unlikely to materialize." Clarke "harshly chastised Brown for the way he handled this week's party turmoil and said his succession as prime minister was not guaranteed. He said the grin on Brown's face as he emerged from Blair's 10 Downing St. office after handover talks with the prime minister had been provocative and poorly judged." The AP adds, "It was not clear what motivated Clarke's attack. Although he was long seen as a Blair ally, that relationship has grown chilly since his firing so his comments may not have been sanctioned by the prime minister's camp."

The Financial Times (9/9, Ben Hall, Blitz) reports, "Downing Street officials on Friday expressed private delight over a broadside fired at" Brown "by" Clarke, "saying the attack had rightly exposed features of the chancellor's character." The Times adds, "In a sign that Mr. Clarke's attack has emboldened the Blair camp, other figures close to the prime minister expressed pleasure that questions were being raised about Mr. Brown's behaviour. The private view reflects tensions between the camps in spite of the understanding on Mr. Blair's departure date." One source says "relations between the two men remain sore after a serious stand-off at a meeting in Number 10 on Wednesday. Mr. Blair, in the presence of officials from both camps, accused the chancellor of plotting a coup against him."

An analysis piece in the Financial Times (9/9, Blitz) entitled, "Britain's Political Enigma," reports Brown "has taken a critical step to becoming Britain's prime minister." He "has never disguised his burning desire to succeed" Blair, and this week Brown "finally got something he long sought: a public assurance from Mr. Blair that he will quit Downing Street by next May." The Times calls the past several days "one of the most tumultuous weeks in recent British politics," and one "that has badly – probably fatally – damaged Mr. Blair." The Times continues, "Perhaps more remarkably, the week's events have also damaged Mr. Brown." For his part, Blair "remains one of the most arresting figures on the international stage," and in the US, "he enjoys mythical status as the sole sure ally of President George W. Bush in the war on terror. In Europe, Mr. Blair is regarded as the one person who has firmly shifted a party of the left to the centre ground." While Brown "enjoys none of this allure," but such an outlook "is to underestimate Gordon Brown. He deserves no less credit than Mr Blair for founding New Labour and making it a powerful electoral machine." He is also "the architect of the government's economic success – implementing reforms that have brought a decade of uninterrupted growth, low unemployment and interest rates. This, above all, is why his bid to succeed Mr. Blair is unstoppable."

LAT Says "Poodle" Label Ignores Blair's Accomplishments. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/9, 918K) says Blair is "wrongly caricaturized as Bush's poodle." While many UK political analysts "identify Blair's fatal affliction as his support for President Bush's foreign policy," the Times says, "It's not that simple." While "critics deride him as 'Bush's poodle,'" that is "a doubly unfair epitaph for Blair's tenure at 10 Downing Street." His "hawkish position on Iraq involves more than parroting Bush." Blair believes in intervening overseas when necessary, but, "quite unlike Bush, [he] considers these missions to go hand in hand with leadership on global warming, debt reduction in the Third World and aggressively reducing poverty worldwide. Blair has been the most articulate spokesman for what appears to be a political breed in retreat — the liberal internationalist."

Anti-Castro Journalists Fired For Taking Payments From The Bush Administration. The New York Times (9/9, Goodnough, 1.21M) reports, "The Bush administration's Office of Cuba Broadcasting paid 10 journalists…to provide commentary on Radio and TV Martí, which transmit to Cuba government broadcasts critical of Fidel Castro, a spokesman for the office said Friday. The group included three journalists at El Nuevo Herald, the Spanish-language sister newspaper of The Miami Herald, which fired them Thursday after learning of the relationship. Pablo Alfonso, who reports on Cuba for El Nuevo Herald, received the largest payment, almost $175,000 since 2001." The Times notes that "while the Castro regime has long alleged that some Cuban-American reporters in Miami were paid by the government, the revelation on Friday, reported in The Miami Herald, was the first evidence of that. In addition to Mr. Alfonso, the journalists who received payment include Wilfredo Cancio Isla, who writes for El Nuevo Herald and received about $15,000 since 2001; Olga Connor, a freelance reporter for the newspaper who received about $71,000; and Juan Manuel Cao, a reporter for Channel 41 who got $11,000 this year from TV Martí, according to The Miami Herald, which learned of the payments through a Freedom of Information Request."

Ailing Castro Overshadows Havana Summit. The Wall Street Journal (9/9, De Córdoba, 2.03M) reports, "When delegates from 116 countries gather for next week's Nonaligned Movement summit in Havana, the question uppermost in their minds will be whether their ailing host, Fidel Castro, is making his final bow on the world's stage. … Some U.S. officials surmise that Mr. Castro is suffering from a fatal stomach cancer, although they won't say so publicly. Earlier this week, Havana, which denies Mr. Castro has cancer, released a letter written by Mr. Castro that said he had lost 41 pounds in 37 days but was now recuperating at a 'satisfactory rhythm.' Mr. Castro has said he will receive dignitaries at the conference although there is no word on whether he will actually attend." According to the Journal, "If the event does amount to Mr. Castro's unofficial farewell from the global stage, Venezuela's fiery president, Hugo Chávez, stands ready to claim the title of heir apparent to his revolutionary mantle. He will be a visible presence at the conference."

Mexican Electoral Commission's Secrecy Stokes Fraud Suspicions. The Los Angeles Times (9/9, Tobar, 918K) reports, "Top electoral officials and judges are feeding doubts about the outcome of Mexico's presidential vote by declining to release details about a recount of 4 million ballots and by moving quickly to destroy all 41 million ballots." While "the seven judges of the Federal Electoral Tribunal declared conservative candidate Felipe Calderon president-elect on Tuesday," its "300-page ruling on the vote left some experts shaking their heads." One academic "said that although the election was flawed, it was mostly a success. On election day, he said, all of the political parties praised the way the IFE conducted the vote." He "said he opposed granting public access to the ballots because there was no guarantee a 'citizen recount' would follow established standards. But he said the election had shown the need for new reforms, including improved regulation of the media and private financing of campaigns."

Colombian Drug Cartel Leader Captured. The CBS Evening News (9/8, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "And police in Mexico have captured a top drug kingpin. A leader of a Colombian cartel responsible for nearly half the cocaine smuggled into this country. A US official tells CBS News Duran is now in Federal custody in New York City."

The AP (9/9, Watson) reports an Immigration and Customs Enforcement announcement that Mexican police "have arrested a reputed major figure in one of Colombia's largest and most feared drug cartels responsible for nearly half of the cocaine smuggled into the United States." Jaime Maya Duran "was arrested Wednesday by agents of Mexico's attorney general's office in Mexico City and flown immediately to New York, where he is under indictment on drug trafficking and money laundering charges." US Ambassador to Mexico Tony Garza said the "arrest 'shows the determination of U.S. and Mexican law enforcement authorities to pursue the most dangerous criminals, including those who thought they were untouchable.'" Maya Duran "and three other key lieutenants allegedly took over the Norte Valle cartel, based in Cartago, Colombia, after the ring's suspected leader, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante, was jailed in Cuba for attempting to enter the country with a false passport two years ago."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Before Speeches, A Bush Strategy To Regain Edge (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — When President Bush and his top aides gathered in July to sketch out a strategy for the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, it was clear to all that they had to try to reset the clock — back to a time, before Iraq, when portraying Mr. Bush as a steely commander in chief was a far simpler task, and before Hurricane Katrina, when questions about the administration's competence did not weigh so heavily.

From those discussions emerged the speeches Mr. Bush has delivered over the last week, the leading edge of a remarkably intensive and aggressive campaign in which he has tried to regain ground he has lost for more than two years, by turning the conversation away from Iraq and back toward the broader war on terror.

It is a carefully calibrated strategy that will continue in coming days, first with an appearance Sunday morning by Vice President Dick Cheney on NBC's "Meet the Press," the vehicle he used to advantage at key moments after Sept. 11 and then Mr. Bush's appearance that night at ground zero in New York and a prayer service at St. Paul's Chapel.

On Monday, for the first time since the first anniversary, in 2002, Mr. Bush will visit all three sites of the attack that remade his presidency — New York, Shanksville, Pa. and the Pentagon. Then he will cap the day and bring to a close this phase of his effort to portray himself and his party on his terms with a nationally televised speech from the Oval Office.

It is bound to be reminiscent of his speech from the same seat exactly five years before, when, after a shaky day, he first pronounced the "Bush doctrine" that led to the toppling of the Taliban in Afghanistan and ultimately became the heart of the administration's justification for invading Iraq.

"You can never turn back the clock," Dan Bartlett, the counselor to the president, said on Friday when asked about the strategy. "But we knew that news organizations and everyone else would be using this moment to define where we were five years later, and the president wanted to articulate his view, too."

"He's not trying to ignore Iraq — he wouldn't, he doesn't want to," Mr. Bartlett added. "But he had to explain that even if we have a debate here about whether Iraq's part of the war on terror, the enemy believes it is."

Mr. Bartlett, like Mr. Bush two weeks ago, said this was a moment of remembrance and a reminder of national resolve, not a moment for politics. But nine weeks before a midterm election that many Republicans fear they may lose, it is impossible to separate remembrance and politics.

In interviews, Republican strategists who are aware of the closely held White House plans for this week say the critical question is whether Mr. Bush still holds the power to alter the course of national conversation away from the Iraq war and back to the theme that has worked for them before, countering direct threats to the United States.

But there is another, related question as well: whether Republicans can succeed again in convincing the nation that Democrats cannot be trusted with keeping it safe. The political strategy pursued by Mr. Bush's strategist, Karl Rove, has always been to frame elections as choices and to work to make the other side an unappealing alternative.

The White House has signaled its intentions on that score and appears to be pivoting to a more openly political phase of its strategy, in which the administration and its allies will try to undermine the Democrats.

Last week, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld compared critics of the war to "appeasers." Mr. Cheney, for months, has been calling those who want to withdraw from Iraq "plain wrong." The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, coined a new term, "Defeatocrats," that Republicans have quickly worked into their lexicon, along with highly charged words like "surrender."

"I think this series of speeches will be critical to not simply defining this president, but more importantly to defining the challenges of our generation," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, adding, "One of the key questions that voters will answer is whether they want to elect leaders who recognize that we're at war and want to do whatever it takes to win the war, or do they want to surrender very key tools that have been necessary to prosecute the war."

Republicans and their allies are already stepping up their negative campaign against Democrats. In Tennessee, the Republican National Committee is running an advertisement against the Democratic candidate for Senate, Representative Harold Ford, that features pictures of fighter planes and control towers, as an ominous voice intones: "The threats are out there. The responsibility is clear. Knowing who the terrorists are and where they are is the only way to keep us safe."

While Mr. Bush proved in recent days that he was capable of seizing the agenda and dominating the news, there were reminders of the limits of his power to drive the national discussion to his benefit. He was out fund-raising on Friday, but the candidates did not campaign publicly with him, only behind closed doors at the fund-raisers.

And even the Senate Intelligence Committee, which Republicans control, released a report on Friday that raised new questions about the administration's use of prewar intelligence. It found that the Central Intelligence Agency had backed away last fall from the administration's claims, which Mr. Bush repeated just weeks ago, of ties between Saddam Hussein's Iraq and the Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The White House campaign to seize control of the debate grew in part out of a national security issue involving Mr. Bush's decision to move 14 high-profile terrorist suspects from C.I.A. custody in undisclosed locations in other countries into military custody at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, said one Republican who is often consulted by the White House and who spoke in return for anonymity.

The Republican said it was the transfer of the 14 suspects as much as Monday's anniversary of the attacks that prompted the political planning. The initial thought, he said, was to give one speech to "talk about the context," but soon the idea grew into a series of speeches dovetailing nicely with the political agenda, managed by Mr. Rove, the chief strategist; Mr. Bartlett; and Joshua B. Bolten, the chief of staff.

"The political folks and the communications folks, basically Karl and Dan and Josh, were delighted with the notion that you could begin to shape the fall debate around a series of substantive speeches that would not only drive the news but define the policy for people, and define the differences," this Republican said.

The speeches, written by a team headed by William J. McGurn, emphasized the continuing threat represented by Osama bin Laden and went on to offer Mr. Bush's own fairly upbeat report on progress made in closing the gaps in domestic security laid bare by the Sept. 11 attacks.

The White House kept the details of one speech particularly secret, even from some senior staff members: Mr. Bush's declaration on Wednesday that he had transferred the terror suspects from C.I.A. custody to the detention center at Guantánamo in a speech in which he also challenged Congress to give him the authority to begin war-crimes trials.

"This was the most cumbersome, because all of the material was so highly classified," Mr. Bartlett said, though Mr. Bush declassified some of the details of their interrogations in an effort to bolster his case that sometimes there was a need for what he delicately called "alternative" interrogation methods.

Bush Resets Political Debate With Demands For Action (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

President Bush this week reset the political landscape with just two months to go until the congressional elections, grabbing top headlines three days in a row as he dropped several political hot potatoes into Congress' lap and demanded action this month.

After a summer of questions about policy and progress in Iraq, his strategy on Iranian nuclear ambitions and the collapse of his push for a broad immigration bill, Mr. Bush has honed in on one overriding message: Democrats can either join Republicans to pass bipartisan bills or they can try to block them and see how that plays in November.

He also boosted Republicans' case for having made the nation more secure since the September 11 attacks by giving details of plots that have been foiled -- the first time many of those details have ever been released.

DOJ_NMG_0060980

"It's not an abstract argument anymore. The president pointed out specific events that have not occurred," Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, said in a telephone interview.

Democrats took some of their best shots to date, including an attempt to vote "no confidence" on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the release of their own security plan. But they were countered by White House dominance of the news cycle on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday -- the three days Congress was in session and Democrats had a platform.

Democrats, remembering the way the president used the creation of the Department of Homeland Security in 2002 as a wedge to win control of the Senate, said they won't let that happen again.

"We're playing it much smarter this time. We're not going to allow them to box us into a corner," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "It's obvious what the administration was trying to do this week, and that was exert maximum pressure on Democrats, and Republicans as well, that have concerns about their proposal. Unfortunately this time it's not going to work. Their tough-talking rings hollow."

Unlike 2002, Mr. Manley said, Democrats have both the September 11 commission as a yardstick to point out where the administration has fallen short on homeland security and divisions among Republicans on a number of issues.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, yesterday said splits among Republicans on military tribunals for detainees, Iraq policy and the fate of Mr. Rumsfeld have paralyzed the majority party.

"The result is fighting and chaos and nothing accomplished for the country. It's time for a new direction," Mr. Emanuel said.

Mr. Bush sought to cut through many of those divisions this week by honing his message.

In three speeches this week the president tried to put a face on the terrorists, asked Congress to approve his terrorist wiretapping program and announced he has transferred 14 top terrorists from CIA custody to the Defense Department. He called on Congress to authorize military commissions to try them.

"That is the No. 1 priority right now," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday.

Mr. McConnell said the courts forced the issue, but insisted that the political decision is now up to the Democrats.

"They've got now a choice -- they can either sign up with the president and the administration and a majority of Republicans and pass these two pieces of legislation on an overwhelmingly bipartisan basis, or they can turn it into a political issue we'll be happy to take to the American people," he said.

Bush 9/11 Tour Aims To Bolster Republicans (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

President Bush will visit the sites of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks Sunday and Monday for a series of events that the administration hopes can once more lift Republicans to victory.

Mr. Bush sees the attacks as the defining moment of his presidency, and made his muscular response a centerpiece of his re-election campaign in 2004. With the Republican majorities in Congress endangered by economic uncertainty and public fury over the war in Iraq, the White House is striving to remind voters of its response to Sept. 11 -- part of a broader assertion that Republicans take the terrorist threat more seriously than Democrats do and are better prepared to defend against it.

After months of rarely mentioning fugitive al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, Mr. Bush and other top White House officials are again making him a central part of their speeches. The president's announcement Wednesday that he had ordered high-level al Qaeda detainees such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed to be moved to the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, meanwhile, was designed in part to shift the terms of the public debate about the controversial facility by linking it explicitly to the Sept. 11 attacks.

The White House push will hit its emotional peak when Mr. Bush flies to each of the three sites struck to pay respect to the Americans who died there. On Sunday, Mr. Bush travels to New York to lay a wreath at the former site of the World Trade Center, take part in a prayer service at St. Paul's Cathedral and meet with police officers, firefighters and other first-responders to the attacks. On Monday, he will journey to Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon -- the crash sites of the other two hijacked airliners -- to lay wreaths.

Although Mr. Bush and other aides have long made terrorism a central part of their argument that Democrats are soft on national defense, administration officials say the president will make the Sept. 11 commemorations as apolitical as possible by not giving prepared remarks at any of the three sites. White House spokesman Tony Snow says Mr. Bush's only formal speech either day will be an Oval Office address to the nation Monday night on "what he thought Sept. 11th has meant to the country, what it taught us, and how Americans have demonstrated their toughness, compassion, courage and optimism in the many days since."

Mr. Snow says the president's recent speeches touting his administration's homeland-security record and asking Congress to approve controversial White House initiatives, such as tapping the phones of those suspected of terrorist links without warrants or trying extremists before military commissions rather than traditional legal forums, are "not exercises in reviving past emotions."

"They're designed to place in context ongoing threats and ongoing and future actions to address those threats," he says. "Heart-tugging addresses would have sounded very different and would have approached the subject in an entirely different way."

Still, there is no doubt terrorism will be a central issue in the November midterm elections, which Democrats see as their best chance in years to regain control of the House and possibly the Senate.

Strategists of both parties say the elections are likely to be decided largely by whether voters ultimately accept the Democratic case that the Iraq war has made the nation less safe by distracting military and intelligence personnel from the fight against al Qaeda, or the Republican contention that the war there is central to the broader battle against Muslim extremists.

"There's a clear understanding today that there are two wars, one against terrorism and one in Iraq," says Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee. "Americans understand that it's apples and oranges to say that they're the same fight."

White House aides, for their part, believe terrorism remains a winning political issue for Republicans. In recent meetings with lobbyists and political operatives, White House strategist Karl Rove and White House political director Sara Taylor said that Mr. Bush and other top administration officials would make regular reference to Mr. bin Laden and the threat posed by Islamic extremists in the eight weeks that remain until the elections, according to several of those in attendance.

"I continue to think that if the Republicans were to pick the battlefield issues, we'd say, 'Lets talk about national security,' " says Vin Weber, a Republican strategist and former congressman. "And if I were the opposition party I'd be nervous about an election strategy that rests on making a fundamental challenge to the commander in chief at a time of war. That's an incredibly tough thing to pull off."

To that, Democrats say the political terrain has shifted considerably since 2004, when Republicans last used terrorism successfully as a political issue. They argue that the deep disapproval of the Iraq war has eroded Mr. Bush's stature as a leader and that the White House's attempts to capitalize on the terrorism issue have robbed it of much of its punch.

President Aims To Revisit Social Security After Recess (WP)

By Anushka Asthana And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Sept. 8 -- President Bush said this week he would like to revisit Social Security reform next year and said he personally approved the U.S. visit of Iran's former president, as he prepared to address the nation to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The White House has requested network television time for the Oval Office address, which is scheduled to begin at 9 p.m. on Monday. All four major broadcast networks have agreed to air the president's remarks.

"This is not a political speech. There are not going to be any calls to action for Congress," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "It will be a reflection of what September 11th has meant to the president and to the country, the realities that it has brought to all of our attention, and how we can move forward together to try to win the war on terror."

In one of a series of interviews he is conducting to mark the anniversary, Bush told the Wall Street Journal that he would like to tackle Social Security after the midterm elections, when he "will be able to drain the politics out of the issue." The interview will appear in this weekend's Journal.

Bush failed last year to persuade Congress to overhaul the New Deal-era program, including the creation of private investment accounts and a reduction of guaranteed benefits for future retirees. His staff has said he is exploring the issue, but his comments to the Journal were the most definitive that he wanted to try something again -- although he did not say exactly what.

The president also said he personally approved this week's visit of former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami, a trip that has drawn some criticism in conservative circles.

"I was interested to hear what he had to say," Bush said. "I'm interested in learning more about the Iranian government, how they think, what people think within the government."

Bush's commemoration of the anniversary of the attacks will begin Sunday afternoon in New York, where he will lay a wreath at Ground Zero before taking part in a prayer service.

On Monday, he will begin his day with breakfast with emergency service personnel in New York, then will participate in a moment of silence at 8:46 a.m., the time that the first plane slammed into the North Tower of the World Trade Center, and then a ceremony with New York first responders.

From there, Bush will travel to Shanksville, Pa., where just after noon he is scheduled to participate in a wreath-laying. Later that afternoon, he will take part in a similar ceremony at the Pentagon.

The anniversary of the deadliest terrorist attack in the nation's history also will inspire a brief moment of bipartisan comity. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) will be among those joining Bush at the Pentagon ceremony. That evening congressional leaders from both parties will lead a commemoration of the national tragedy with speeches, a moment of silence and patriotic songs from the steps of the Capitol.

White House aides announced plans for Monday's speech on a day that Bush headlined closed-door fundraisers for GOP Senate candidates in Michigan and Missouri.

Bush's motorcade passed a small demonstration from protesters in Michigan holding up signs that read "President You've Let Us Down" and urging him to meet with the chief executives of the nation's struggling automobile manufacturers. A planned meeting between Bush and the heads of the nation's leading automakers has been repeatedly delayed, and deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the session will be held after the November election to "avoid getting it mired in politics."

Bush Plans 9/11 Anniversary Address (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush plans to deliver a speech to the nation from the Oval Office on Monday, the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, to reflect on what the terror strikes meant to the nation and to address what the United States still needs to do to fight terrorism, his spokesman said Friday.

The speech, at 6 p.m. PDT, will conclude Bush's participation in two days of commemorations of the attacks, which reshaped his presidency as well as the nation's foreign and intelligence policies.

Before delivering the speech, Bush will take part in memorial ceremonies Monday at all three sites where hijacked planes crashed on Sept. 11, 2001 — in New York City, in Pennsylvania and at the Pentagon.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush's address would avoid a partisan tone.

"This is not a political speech. There are not going to be any calls to action for Congress," Snow said at a White House news briefing. "It will be a reflection of what Sept. 11 has meant to the president and to the country, the realities that it has brought to all of our attention, and how we can move forward together to win the war on terror."

On Sunday, Bush is scheduled to take part in two ceremonies in New York City: The presentation of a wreath at ground zero, where the World Trade Center towers stood, and a worship service at a nearby church. He is not expected to make formal remarks at either event, Snow said.

The next morning, the president will have breakfast with New York City emergency crews; observe a moment of silence at 8:46 a.m., when the first of two airplanes struck the trade center; and take part in a formal commemoration of the attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0060983

From New York, he will fly to Pennsylvania to visit the site near Shanksville where United Flight 93 went down after passengers tried to seize control from hijackers. At midafternoon, he will present a wreath at the Pentagon, which was struck by a fourth airplane.

The speech Monday evening will be the fifth address in 12 days Bush will have delivered on terrorism and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The previous speeches have delineated his policies, setting out markers that differentiate them from those of Democrats, without naming the opposition party.

Snow said the speech Monday "is not something where we're trying to draw bright lines to separate Democrats from Republicans."

Rather, he said, Bush would try to draw on the way the country responded to the attacks, which Snow said was "nothing short of sensational, and it's something that could only have happened in this country."

Bush Plans Prime Time Sept. 11 Address (AP)

AP, September 9, 2006

President Bush will make a prime-time address from the Oval Office on Monday to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the administration had requested network time for the address at 9:01 p.m. EDT. The address is expected to run 16 to 18 minutes, he said.

The speech will come after Bush visits each of the attack sites, in New York, Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon, where terrorist hijackers used commercial airliners as weapons to kill nearly 3,000 people.

Snow said Bush's address would not be a political speech or a charge to Congress for action. Rather, he said, it would be reflective of what Sept. 11 has meant and "how we move ahead as a country in making use of the lessons of Sept. 11."

"It will have a note of optimism as well as sobriety about what we've been through," Snow said.

Also, it was revealed that the Pentagon on Saturday will allow the public to tour a multi-faith chapel and other memorial sites at the spot where a hijacked airline slammed into the building on that fateful day.

A Pentagon tour guide will accompany groups to visit the small chapel and an adjacent memorial room where the names of all 184 victims are etched on a plaque and a booklet contains a photo and description of each.

Also in the room is the flag that was draped over the casket used in a group burial honoring the 184 victims at Arlington National Cemetery the day after the attack, which destroyed a large section of the Pentagon's southwest side.

The first time the public was allowed to view these rooms was last Sept. 11.

Members of the public also can see a memorial marble stone, taken from the rubble of 9-11, that was embedded in the rebuilt section of the Pentagon at the spot where hijacked American Airlines Flight 77 hit the building.

The tour will include a look at the construction site for a two-acre memorial park near the impact site. The memorial, scheduled to be completed by the fall of 2008, will feature benches set over small reflecting pools commemorating each of the 184 victims. Several species of maple trees, including one known as the paperback maple, will dot the site.

George W. Bush 'Most People Want Us To Win' (WSJ)

By Paul Gigot

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

ABOARD AIR FORCE ONE -- Speaker Nancy Pelosi?

"That's not going to happen," snaps the president of the United States, leaning across his desk in his airborne office. He had been saying that he hoped to revisit Social Security reform next year, when he "will be able to drain the politics out of the issue," and I rudely interrupted by noting the polls predicting Ms. Pelosi's ascension.

"I just don't believe it," the president insists. "I believe the Republicans will end up being -- running the House and the Senate. And the reason why I believe it is because when our candidates go out and talk about the strength of this economy, people will say their tax cuts worked, their plan worked. . . . And secondly, that this is a group of people that understand the stakes of the world in which we live and are willing to help this unity government in Iraq succeed for the sake of our children and grandchildren, and that we are steadfast in our belief in the capacity of liberty to bring peace."

DOJ_NMG_0060984

Love or loathe President George W. Bush, you can't say he lacks the courage of his convictions. Down in the polls, with the American people in a sour mood over Iraq, Mr. Bush isn't changing his policy or hunkering down in the Oval Office. Instead he's doubling down, investing whatever scarce political capital he has to frame the November contest as a choice over the economy and taxes and especially over his prosecution of the war on terror.

The strategy carries no small risk, because if Republicans lose, Democrats will feel even more emboldened to challenge him on national security. The final two years of his presidency could be dreadful and the chances of a U.S. retreat in Iraq would multiply. On the other hand, his senior aides say, Mr. Bush will be blamed if Republicans lose in any case, so he might as well play his strongest hand to prevent such a result. And if the GOP holds both houses, he'll deserve much of the credit. * * *

The president is certainly in feisty, even passionate, form as I meet him for 40-some minutes Thursday afternoon, coming off the third of his speeches this week on the lessons of 9/11 and a fund-raiser in Savannah, Ga., for GOP House candidate Max Burns. The critics are saying the Bush Doctrine of spreading democracy in the Middle East is dead, but the Beltway coroners must not have talked with Mr. Bush. I pose the frequent complaint that his policy has succeeded only in unleashing the radical Furies in Palestine, Lebanon and Iraq.

"I would remind the critics of the freedom agenda that the policy prior to September 11th was stability for the sake of stability: Let us not worry about the form of government. Let us simply worry about whether or not the world appears stable, whether or not we achieve short-term geopolitical gain," he says. "And it looked like that policy was working, and, frankly, it made some sense when it came to dealing with the Middle East vis-à-vis the Communists.

"The problem with that philosophy, or that foreign policy, was that beneath the surface boiled resentment and hatred, and that resentment and hatred helped fuel this radical Islam, and the radical Islam is what ended up causing the attacks that killed 3,000 of our citizens. So I vowed, and made the decision that not only would we stay on the offense and . . . get these people before they could attack us again. But in the long run the only way to make sure your grandchildren are protected, Paul, is to win the battle of ideas, is to defeat the ideology of hatred and resentment."

But would he concede that elections have so far empowered mainly the radicals? "It's a part of the process. I think Americans must remember we had some growing pains ourselves. It wasn't all that smooth a road to the Constitution to begin with in our own country. Democracy is not easy," he says, coiled and intense in his presidential flight jacket.

Take the Palestinian elections that elevated the terrorist group Hamas to power. "I wasn't surprised," he says, "that the political party that said 'Vote for me, I will get rid of corruption' won, because I was the person that decided on U.S. foreign policy that we were not going to deal with Mr. Arafat because he had let his people down, and that money that the world was spending wasn't getting to the Palestinian people. . . . They didn't say, 'Vote for us, we want war.' They said, 'Vote for us, we will get you better education and health.'"

Mr. Bush concedes that Hamas's "militant wing," as he calls it, is "unacceptable." But he says he sees a virtue in "creating a sense where people have to compete for people's votes. They have to listen to the concerns of the street." The answer is for other Palestinian leaders to out-compete Hamas to respond to those concerns. "Elections are not the end. They're only the beginning. And, no question, elections sometimes create victors that may not conform to everything we want. . . . On the other hand, it is the beginning of a more hopeful Middle East." * * *

I try to dig a little deeper on Egypt, where the political opening of 18 months ago seems to have been abruptly closed by President Hosni Mubarak, with a muted U.S. response to the arrest of the moderate opposition leader, Ayman Nour. Has the U.S. given up on promoting reform in Egypt?

"Of course we have not given up," Mr. Bush says. "We were disappointed" about Ayman Nour. Does he believe Mr. Mubarak should release Mr. Nour? "Yes, I do, but he'll make those decisions based upon his own laws." Mr. Bush says he's spoken to Mr. Mubarak's son and heir-apparent, Gamal, about Mr. Nour, "and I have spoken to Mubarak a lot about democracy. And, equally importantly, I've talked to . . . a group of young reformers who are now in government. There's an impressive group of younger Egyptians -- the trade minister and some of the economic people -- that understand the promise and the difficulties of democracy."

The pace of Middle East reform will vary by country, he adds. In Kuwait, they now let women vote. "And so if you look at the Middle East from 10 years to today, there's been some significant change. Jordan changed, Morocco, the Gulf Coast countries, Qatar," and of course the nascent democracies of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Regarding Iraq, Mr. Bush is a bit reflective, if also insistent about the costs of failure. "I'm not surprised that this war has created consternation amongst the American people," he concedes. "The enemy has got the capacity to take -- got the willingness to take innocent life and the capacity to do so, knowing full well that those deaths and that carnage will end up on our TV screens. So the American people are now having to adjust to a new kind of bloody war.

"Now, my view of the country is this: Most people want us to win. There are a good number who say, get out now. But most Americans are united in the concept -- of the idea of winning."

On that point, I ask Mr. Bush to address not his critics on the left who want to withdraw, but those on the right who worry that he isn't fighting hard enough to win. "No, I understand. No, I hear that, Paul, a lot, and I take their word seriously, and of course use that as a basis for questioning our generals. My point to you is that one of the lessons of a previous war is that the military really wasn't given the flexibility to make the decisions to win. And I ask the following questions: Do you have enough? Do you need more troops? Do you need different equipment?" The question I failed to ask but wish I had is: Does this mean that, like Lincoln, Mr. Bush should have fired more generals?

With sectarian strife in Iraq, some critics (such as Sen. Joe Biden) are saying the best strategy now is for the country to divide into three -- Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni. Mr. Bush says partition would be "a mistake," though he does add that "the Iraqi people are going to have to make that decision." But he says Iraqis didn't vote for partition when they approved their new constitution or new government, and "this government has been in place since June; 90 days is a long time for some, but it's really not all that long to help a nation that was brutalized under a tyrant to get going."

Mr. Bush is most emphatic when he links Iraq to the larger struggle for Mideast reform. "In the long run, the United States is going to have to make a decision as to whether or not it will support moderates against extremists, reformers against tyrants. And Iraq is the first real test of the nation's commitment to this ideological struggle. . . . I believe it strongly. One way for the American people to understand the stakes is to envision what happens if America withdraws." He has been hitting that last point hard in his recent speeches, and it is the linchpin of the argument Mr. Bush will make through November against the Democrats who insist on pulling out immediately.

Intriguingly, the president broke a little news on the subject of Iran, acknowledging that he personally signed off on the U.S. visit this week by former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami. The trip has angered many conservatives because Mr. Khatami presided over the nuclear weapons development and cheating that Mr. Bush has pledged to stop. Why let him visit?

"I was interested to hear what he had to say," Mr. Bush responds without hesitation. "I'm interested in learning more about the Iranian government, how they think, what people think within the government. My hope is that diplomacy will work in convincing the Iranians to give up their nuclear weapons ambitions. And in order for diplomacy to work, it's important to hear voices other than [current President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's."

One thing Mr. Khatami has said this week is that because the U.S. is bogged down in Iraq it will never have the will to stop Iran's nuclear program. Is he right? "Well, he also said it's very important for the [coalition] troops to stay in Iraq so that there is a stable government on the Iranian border," Mr. Bush replies, rather forgivingly.

On other hand, Mr. Bush remains as blunt as ever about the nature of the Iranian regime when I ask if one lesson of North Korea is that Iran must be stopped before it acquires a bomb. "North Korea doesn't teach us that lesson. The current government [in Iran] teaches that lesson," Mr. Bush says. "Their declared policies of destruction and their support for terror makes it clear they should not have a nuclear weapon."

The impression Mr. Bush leaves is of a man deeply engaged on the Iran problem and, like several presidents before him, trying to understand what kind of diplomatic or economic pressure short of military means will change the regime's behavior. One way or another, Iran will be the major dilemma of the rest of his presidency, and Mr. Bush knows it. * * *

Five years after 9/11, I ask the president if he is surprised that -- and can explain why -- both Iraq and his larger antiterror policies have become so politically polarized. "Well, first of all, I do believe there's a difference between the political rhetoric out of Washington and what the citizens feel," he says.

"But this is a different kind of war. In the past, there was troop movements, or, you know, people could report the sinking of a ship. This is a war that requires intelligence and interrogation within the law from people who know what's happening. . . . Victories you can't see. But the enemy is able to create death and carnage that tends to define the action.

"And I think most Americans understand we're vulnerable. But my hope was after 9/11, most Americans wouldn't walk around saying, 'My goodness, we're at war. Therefore let us don't live a normal life. Let us don't invest.'" Mr. Bush calls it an "interesting contradiction" that he wants "people to understand the stakes of failure" in this conflict. But on the other hand, he also wants "the country to be able to grow, invest, save, expand, educate, raise their children." This is another way of saying how hard it is for a democracy to maintain support for a war without a tangible, ominous enemy such as the Soviet Union or Imperial Japan.

Could he have done more, as president, to win over more Democratic allies? "I met with a lot of Democrats over the course of this war, and" -- he pauses for the longest time in our interview -- "you know, it's hard for me to tell, Paul, whether I could have done a better job. . . . I don't know. I just don't know."

He then says that he has GOP majorities, and thus Republican leaders, to deal with. "Obviously, I wish that the effort were more bipartisan; it has been on certain issues. It certainly was when it came time for people to assess the intelligence that they had seen and knew about and vote on a resolution to remove Saddam Hussein from power." And it was as well on his policy of pursuing state sponsors of terror. But then the 2004 campaign intervened, he says, and now it's another campaign season.

Mr. Bush is an avid reader of history, and he has a contest with political aide Karl Rove to see who reads the most books. ("I'm losing," Mr. Bush says.) So I ask him if any current Democrat could play the role that Republican Sen. Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan played in helping Harry Truman establish new policies in the 1940s at the dawn of the Cold War.

Notably, he talks about Truman first. "I doubt Truman would have been able to predict how long the Cold War would last, but I applaud Truman for beginning to wage the Cold War" -- pregnant pause -- "for which he was very unpopular, for which the country was viewed as polarized." He never does mention a contemporary Vandenberg, and in truth the only one I can think of is Joe Lieberman, of late and by necessity not a Democrat but an "independent." * * *

The Truman reference is nonetheless revealing, because it suggests that perhaps Mr. Bush has begun to realize he will get little credit for his Middle East policies during his own presidency. His critics on the left in particular want to portray him as another LBJ, forlorn over a misbegotten war, and destined for historical disdain because of it. But Mr. Bush hardly resembles the LBJ who more or less came to agree with his Vietnam critics. He seems far more like Truman, both in his personal combativeness and also in his conviction that his vindication will come down the road.

One of his main goals now, also like Truman, is to institutionalize some of his antiterror policies by putting them on firmer legal and political ground so future presidents can use them. That's what his speech this week on military tribunals was mainly about, and the same goes for warrantless wiretaps and CIA interrogations of al Qaeda suspects. For all of the controversy they've caused, Mr. Bush is convinced that the next president will be grateful to have these tools. And despite all the partisan rancor surrounding them, Mr. Bush's legacy in defending them is likely to be lasting.

When I put to him the criticism made by Newt Gingrich, among others, that the U.S. security bureaucracy is too slow and unwieldy, he couldn't rebut it fast enough. "I disagree strongly," he says. "We were stove-piped in the past. We had an FBI whose primary responsibility was white-collar crime or criminality. We had a CIA that couldn't talk to criminal investigators. And we've changed all that."

Mr. Bush adds that the intelligence he receives is "quantifiably better" than it was before 9/11. One reason is the warrantless al Qaeda wiretaps, which gather intelligence from what he calls "the battlefield" in this conflict. "And so the data points are becoming richer, and the analysis is more complete, because now the reports I get on analysis have input from different parts of the intelligence community that John Negroponte is overseeing." Mr. Bush isn't likely to call legislation he signed a failure, but this is still the most reassuring thing I've heard about the CIA in years.

This is the fourth time I've interviewed Mr. Bush at length in the last eight years, going back to his time as Texas governor. One of the notable things about him is how similar he seems. He has always been supremely confident in his decisions and focused above all else on pushing forward, not looking back. If he is tortured by doubt, he doesn't show it to journalists. Some see this as obstinance, but he sees it as firmness of conviction.

Whether or not he's right about the elections this fall, you have to respect his willingness to put that conviction on the line. "I said in my Inaugural Address, we should end tyranny in the 21st century," he says. "And I meant that."

Analysis: War Focus Holds Political Risk (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, September 9, 2006

President Bush is casting the war on global terrorism as the central issue of the midterm elections. But it's a risky political strategy.

The approach carries reminders of failures in Iraq, prisoner treatment at Guantanamo Bay, warrantless wiretapping at home and Osama bin Laden's endurance abroad.

"We learned the lessons of Sept. 11," Bush said Thursday in the latest in a new round of speeches on the subject. "We're working to connect the dots to stop the terrorists from hurting America again."

GOP strategists hope the new focus, including efforts by Republicans in Congress to press for votes on a string of anti-terror initiatives, will burnish Bush's image as commander in chief in responding to the 9/11 attacks and help to divert attention from Iraq.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday that Bush will make a prime-time address from Oval Office on Monday to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks and that the White House had requested network air time at 9:01 p.m. EDT.

But Democrats were quick to portray the president's recent statements — including his acknowledgment Wednesday of a secret CIA prison system and the movement of 14 high-profile detainees to Guantanamo — as an admission of failure.

"Republicans have ignored the lessons of 9/11 and failed to make America as safe as we can and should be," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said on Thursday. "They want to stay the course in the face of failure. We won't. We'll change course in Iraq."

With the electorate in a sour and generally anti-incumbent mood, majority-party Republicans have little choice but to run on the war against terrorism, suggest activists in both parties.

Frank Luntz, a GOP pollster and strategist who helped orchestrate the "Contract with America" campaign in 1994 that helped Republicans seize control of both House and Senate, sees parallels between then and now — but in reverse since Republicans now control both chambers.

"There is a deep desire for change and a consistent widespread rejection of the status quo," he said.

Republicans have little choice but to make the war on terrorism their central theme, Luntz said. "They have to, because this is their one area of strength. This goes to the core difference between the two parties and their visions. If you can't communicate a core difference, what can you do?"

Democratic pollster Mark Mellman noted that the one-time commanding Republican edge over Democrats on national security "has been dramatically diminished."

"The conclusion of a lot of polls is that people in this country do not feel safer and they feel that George Bush's policies in Iraq and elsewhere have increased the likelihood of terrorism against the United States, not decreased it," Mellman said.

Six in 10 in a recent AP-Ipsos poll said there will be more terrorism in the United States because the U.S. went to war in Iraq. A CNN poll published earlier this week asked the public if the war in Iraq was part of the war on terrorism. Fifty-three percent said "no;" 45 percent said "yes."

With two months to go before congressional elections that will determine whether Republicans can extend their control of Congress, Americans seem concerned over the threat of terrorism but ambivalent over assigning credit — or blame — to efforts to contain it.

"We're in a lot better shape than where we were before," Grant Miller, 28, a car salesman and Democrat said over lunch in Crestwood, Ky.

Fellow Kentuckian Tim Cox, 46, gave the president solid marks for combatting terrorism, which he said was his biggest present concern. "We're doing what we should be," the factory worker said while stopping by the post office in PeeWee Valley, Ky.

DOJ_NMG_0060988

Frank Satterly, 45, a Republican who works as a meat cutter in New Albany, Ind., called it "pretty darn good" that there have been no further terrorist attacks in the U.S. in the past five years. However, he said, no matter who is president, "We're still going to have a terror threat. This is not going away."

Heavy emphasis on the war against terrorism could backfire for the Republicans, particularly if things get worse in Iraq, southern Lebanon, or in dealings with Iran.

But Democrats could also overplay their hand by being too harshly critical of the president.

"At any point, there could be a rally-around-the-president effect if there's another terrorist incident, another big arrest, or if — God forbid — we're attacked again," said James Thurber, a political scientist at American University.

Democrats Urge 9/11 Unity (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Democrats are challenging Republicans to put politics aside as they craft a resolution commemorating the anniversary of September 11, but also are accusing the majority party of making the country less safe in the five years since the terrorist attacks.

"Today, we are still living in a state of homeland insecurity," said Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat, who serves on the House Homeland Security Committee. "That is really what the Bush administration has as a legacy five years after 9/11."

Leaders from both parties will temporarily put their differences aside and unite for a Capitol Hill ceremony Monday evening to mark the anniversary.

"September 11th is not a time for politics," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland. He went on to outline his view of Republican security failures.

"September 11th is a time for remembering and resolve," he said. "On September 12th, frankly, we can, in my opinion, talk about the things that I am talking about today."

Republicans, meanwhile, plan to use their record on terrorism issues as they fight to hold onto power this fall.

On Wednesday they will offer a resolution honoring September 11 as a day of remembrance, Republican aides said. The resolution, a draft of which was obtained by The Washington Times, says that the American people "will continue to fight the war on terrorism" and "will never succumb to the cause of the terrorists."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California this week told Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois the draft she had seen "injects controversial political issues" and praises congressional legislation "that was highly controversial on a bipartisan basis."

The objectionable clauses include lauding "legislative accomplishments" such as the USA Patriot Act, the passage of the House's strict border enforcement-only plan in 2005 and the creation of the Department of Homeland Security.

Republicans say similar clauses were included in past resolutions, and in 2002 lawmakers unanimously approved a resolution that said President Bush had signed "numerous laws providing additional resources for the overseas effort against terrorism, as well as additional tools" for U.S. law enforcement.

In 2004, the House voted 406-16 for a resolution that championed "innovative programs" that have secured the nation and applauded the capture of Saddam Hussein. Neither resolution mentioned the Patriot Act.

Mrs. Pelosi asked the speaker to model the resolution after last year's version, which said the House would take "whatever actions necessary to identify, intercept and disrupt terrorists."

Republicans balked at the Democratic requests.

"Democrats seem to care more about the November elections and risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on 9/11 than work with us in a bipartisan way," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert.

House Leaders Spar Over Resolution Honoring Victims Of Sept. 11 (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans and Democrats can't agree on how to honor the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks five years after the tragedy pulled the nation together.

DOJ_NMG_0060989

The House of Representatives is scheduled to vote next week on a resolution marking the anniversary, but Republican Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California are at a standoff over the wording of the nonbinding, purely symbolic legislation.

As drafted, the resolution mourns the nearly 3,000 victims, condemns terrorists, praises the military and law enforcement, and vows vigilance.

But it also lauds several Republican-led legislative moves that Democrats opposed or sought to modify: the USA Patriot Act, which gives law enforcement officials tools to combat terrorism that some Democrats think infringe too much on civil liberties; and the House's border security bill, now stalled, which would charge illegal immigrants as felons.

Democrats want Republicans to strike those and other references to legislation. But, as of Friday, Republicans were holding firm.

"By slashing out all those programs, they stay on message saying, `This is a do-nothing Congress.' That's why they want the recognition of those programs out," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "I think the American people should be very concerned that Democrats are even trying to politically use the 9/11 resolution as a way to gain the majority in November."

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider countered that Republicans loaded the resolution with controversial references to put Democrats in a box: By signing on to the resolution, they'd be giving those programs their tacit support, but by withholding their names from a 9/11 resolution, they'd be taking a risky political stand.

"It is the worst kind of political posturing on a day that should be sacrosanct," Crider said. "The fifth anniversary of 9/11 is a day we should commemorate with the seriousness and unity that Americans from all walks of life came together with on Sept. 11, 2001."

Unless Hastert and Pelosi reach a truce, Democrats may offer a competing resolution. Then it would be up to the Republican majority to decide whether to let them vote on it or to block it.

The House won't be able to vote on any resolution in time to mark the anniversary, as it's not in session again until Tuesday.

Five Years After 9/11: How Have Things Changed? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Since then, passenger levels have recovered and are higher than the pre-9/11 level. But changes have made traveling more cumbersome. Wait times at airports have increased because of new security measures. In August, British authorities said they foiled a plot to blow up U.S.-bound airplanes with liquid bombs, leading to a ban on passengers carrying gels or liquids on board.

The U.S. in the World: After the attacks, there was an outpouring of support from the international community. The U.S. tightened some alliances; Pakistan, for instance, received no military financing from the U.S. before the attacks, but last year got $298 million.

But while some countries remain allies in the war on terror, the U.S. has lost some support. Syria initially cooperated with the U.S., but that has "radically diminished," says Anthony Cordesman, a national security expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Polls show support for the U.S. falling in many countries; in Turkey, 12% of people in a Pew Research poll said they had a favorable opinion of the U.S. in 2006, down from 52% in 2000.

POINTS OF VIEW

"I quite frankly think the U.S. is pretty much the same place it was on Sept. 10... The goal is to fight the enemy but keep America the same as always -- and by and large it is."

-- James Carafano, senior research fellow, The Heritage Foundation

"On Sept. 12 there was this combination of a tremendous vulnerability -- a sense of vulnerability that we hadn't felt in a long, long time since Pearl Harbor perhaps -- combined with a tremendous sense of optimism about the ability to prevail...There's still a feeling of vulnerability because there is a recognition that we are a relatively free and open society and that at some level it is relatively easy to pull off a terrorist attack."

-- Christopher Preble, The Cato Institute

"In the larger scheme of life's problems, the idea of getting hit in your neighborhood or at your workplace is no longer the kind of urgent concern we thought it might be [after 9/11]. Part of this is the law of probability. People are starting to realize that the likelihood of anyone coming home to roost nearby is very low."

FACTS

Since 2001 the number of student visas has declined 20%. Visas for artists, athletes and entertainers are up 2%. Still world renowned Spanish guitarist Paco de Lucia and Cuban musician Ibrahim Ferrer had to cancel U.S. concerts because they could not secure a visa.

Red, orange, yellow, blue and green are the colors of the government's post-9/11 threat-warning system. The federal level has never dropped below yellow or "elevated." It has been raised to orange or "high" eight times. It has been raised to red or "severe" once.

The U.S. government's Rewards for Justice program has paid out more than $62 million to people credited with giving information leading to the prevention of a terrorist attack or the capture of a terrorist. There are 29 people on the government's list of "Wanted Terrorists."

The U.S. sponsors more than 50,000 hours of television and radio broadcasts to the broader Middle East -- quadruple the number of hours in 2001. The U.S. budgets for international broadcasting to the Arab and Muslim world have increased 237% in 2006 from 2002.

Before 9/11, the World Trade Center was the world's fourth tallest building. Today, the world's tallest building is the Taipei 101 in Taipei.

Of the 4,960 terrorist incidents world-wide last year, 47% occurred in Iraq, about 10% in West Bank/Gaza and 4% in Afghanistan.

Waiting For Al Qaeda (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

John Mueller has an awkward question for those of us in the terrorism industry, which is his term for the journalists, politicians, bureaucrats and assorted “risk entrepreneurs” who have alarmed America about terrorism.

For five years, we’ve been telling Americans that Sept. 11 changed everything. “It will always be a defining moment in our history,” President Bush says in this year’s Patriot Day proclamation. We declared it a harbinger of a new clash of civilizations, a global ideological struggle — World War III, in Newt Gingrich’s words.

We reported intelligence estimates of thousands of Al Qaeda terrorists and supporters in “sleeper cells” in America. In May 2004, Attorney General John Ashcroft said that Al Qaeda’s preparations for an attack were 90 percent complete. We braced for acts of terrorism forecast to occur during the political conventions, the presidential campaign, on Election Day, after Election Day. Through yellow and orange alerts, we kept in mind the Department of Homeland Security’s warning: “Today’s terrorists can strike at any place, at any time and with virtually any weapon.”

So what’s keeping them? That’s the question raised by Mueller, a political scientist at Ohio State University, in the current issue of Foreign Affairs.

“Why,” he asks, “have they not been sniping at people in shopping centers, collapsing tunnels, poisoning the food supply, cutting electrical lines, derailing trains, blowing up oil pipelines, causing massive traffic jams, or exploiting the countless other vulnerabilities that, according to security experts, could so easily be exploited?”

The Bush administration likes to take credit for stopping domestic plots, but it’s hard to gauge whether these are much more than the fantasies of a few klutzes. Bush also claims that the war in Iraq has diverted terrorists’ attention there, but why wouldn’t global jihadists want the added publicity from attacking America at home, too? Al Qaeda’s leaders threatened in 2003 to attack America — along with a half dozen other countries that haven’t been attacked either.

Mueller’s conclusion is that there just aren’t that many terrorists out there with the zeal and the competence to attack the United States. In his forthcoming book, “Overblown,” he argues that the risk of terrorism didn’t increase after Sept. 11 — if anything, it declined because of a backlash against Al Qaeda, making it a smaller and less capable threat than before. But the terrorism industry has been too busy hyping Sept. 11 and several other attacks to notice.

It has found a new audience for old dangers. For more than half a century, experts have warned that terrorists could destroy a city with a weapon of mass destruction. They still might, but their failure so far suggests it isn't easy to do, and it didn't suddenly become easier on Sept. 11.

There are plenty of fighters willing to use terrorist tactics locally during civil wars and insurrections, as in Afghanistan, Iraq, Chechnya or Kashmir. But it's harder to recruit competent warriors to fight abroad, and harder for them to operate in orderly countries where the citizenry and the authorities both want to stop them.

"Outside of Afghanistan and Iraq," Mueller says, "the number of people killed around the world since Sept. 11 by groups in sympathy with Al Qaeda is not that high. These are horrible and disgusting deaths, but they're not a sign of a diabolically effective organization. The total is less than the number of Americans who drowned in bathtubs during this period."

As it is, he figures, the odds of an American being killed by international terrorism are about one in 80,000. And even if there were attacks on the scale of Sept. 11 every three months for the next five years, the odds for any individual dying would be one in 5,000.

Compared with past threats — like Communist sociopaths with nuclear arsenals — Al Qaeda's terrorists are a minor problem. They certainly don't justify the hyperbolic warnings that America's "existence" or "way of life" is in jeopardy, or that America must transform the Middle East in order to survive.

There undoubtedly will be more terrorist attacks, either from Al Qaeda or others, just as there were before 2001. Terrorists might strike Monday. There will always be homicidal zealots like Mohamed Atta or Timothy McVeigh, and some of them will succeed, terribly. But this is not a new era. The terrorist threat is still small. It's the terrorism industry that got big.

Five Years On (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

September 11, 2001, it is often said, was a day that "changed everything." Five years later, it remains to be seen whether that's really as true as it deserves to be.

The significance of events is not always captured at the moment in which they happen: Some, like the American Revolution, grow with time; others, like the French Revolution, diminish. But the meaning of events can be instantly and enduringly obvious, or nearly so. On a cloudless September morning, 19 young Muslim men from four Arab countries combined simple means and fanatical determination to murder nearly 3,000 men and women, most of them civilians who rose that morning never imagining themselves to be at any risk. The killers aimed at famous targets in two great cities, a spectacle for the world to behold. We watched from our offices across the street from the World Trade Center, and every day we gaze at the pit they left behind.

Part of the tragedy is that this wasn't their first strike. Similar deeds by people of similar beliefs had been committed before against American targets, albeit not on U.S. soil. The attacks of 9/11 exposed not just the flaws in airline security but, far more important, our failure to comprehend the nature and scale of the threat we were facing.

HOT TOPIC

Five Years After 9/11: How Have Things Changed?1

Osama bin Laden had declared war on us years earlier, but we insisted on seeing him as a small menace, not unlike Abu Nidal and the terrorists who had hijacked planes or killed Israelis over the previous decades. However, bin Laden is above all a man of ambition, not grievance, and his ambition is to re-establish an Islamic Caliphate after his own fashion, one that can destroy every trace of what the West represents within its own sphere and, someday, in ours, too. * * *

So it seemed to us on September 12, 2001, when we wrote in this column that the attacks intended to "prove that freedom and democracy are not after all the wave of the future." We added that "we can honor yesterday's dead by rallying our diplomatic, moral, financial and as necessary military resources to ensure that that purpose is convincingly defeated."

Today, there is less confusion than before about al Qaeda's purposes, particularly after its vengeful turn on fellow Muslims in Casablanca, Riyadh, Amman and Baghdad. But there remains a great deal of doubt about our own purposes. There is doubt whether the methods employed by the Bush Administration to defeat al Qaeda have worked, or been won at too high a moral and diplomatic price, or backfired by giving would-be jihadis fresh reasons to hate us. There is also too much doubt whether broadening the focus of the war to rogue regimes hasn't been a colossal distraction. And there is a deeper, creeping doubt whether the goal of "convincingly defeating" our enemies is even plausible.

So it's worth taking stock of what has -- and hasn't -- been achieved in five years. We presume that bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman Zawahiri, are alive, probably in the Pakistani hinterland. But we know that Mohammed Atef, the mastermind of the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in East Africa, was killed in Afghanistan in an American air strike. We know that Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri, one of the masterminds of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole, is in U.S. custody, as is Abu Zubaydah, who allegedly planned the failed millennium attacks. We know the U.S. captured Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the al Qaeda operations chief and mastermind of September 11, as well as his successor, Abu Farraj al-Libbi. We know the U.S. killed al-Libbi's senior deputies, Haithem al Yemeni and Abu Hamza Rabia. We know that Midhat Mursi, author of al Qaeda's explosives manual, is dead.

This is not an exhaustive list. And while we do not know what proportion of al Qaeda's senior ranks are dead or in jail, Zawahiri must write letters to associates to find out whether his messages have aired on al-Jazeera. Al Qaeda has spawned imitators and affiliates, which trade on its radical infamy. But the ability of bin Laden and Zawahiri to plan and execute terrorism seems to have been massively degraded, and it shows in the fact that five years later there has been no major terrorist attack in the U.S., nor any, anywhere, comparable in scale to the attacks of that day.

Nobody likes to tempt fate, so it's only natural that our political leaders would not advertise this fact too loudly. But at least it should temper the criticism of those who claim that the U.S. policy of aggressively interrogating suspects has yielded no credible information, a point President Bush finally got round to making this week. And it is a strong rebuttal to the argument that, by invading Iraq, the Administration lost focus on the terrorist threat and made America less safe.

The war in Iraq is alternately criticized as a major strategic blunder, something the U.S. should never have done in the first place; or as a tactical fiasco, a worthy enterprise incompetently executed. We would have more sympathy with the second argument if the history of all warfare were not a (retrospective) study in far greater "incompetence," from Grant's Wilderness campaign to the needless slaughter of Marines at Peleliu. We've cited many of the Administration's mistakes over the last four years, going back even before the war to its (largely the CIA's) reluctance to trust and work with all but its own favored Iraqi exiles. But these columns aren't about to support a war only to back away when things get rough. The mistakes in Iraq at least have some hope of being corrected.

The deeper Iraq argument is that the U.S. should never have gone to war against a country that "posed no threat," a point supposedly proved by the failure to discover weapons of mass destruction. In fact, Charles Duelfer's definitive post-mortem report on Iraq's WMD painted a different picture: Saddam maintained weapons programs that were in "material breach" of U.N. resolutions. And he intended to reconstitute his former programs as soon as the sanctions regime was lifted, something he was well on his way to accomplishing thanks to the global bribery scheme that was the U.N.'s Oil for Food program.

But the notion that Saddam posed no threat beyond WMD capabilities is wrong, and in hindsight the Administration miscalculated politically by emphasizing WMD as it did. That error owed largely to the pressure it was under to take the case for war to the U.N., where Saddam's violations of his disarmament obligations served as an actionable cause of war. But the real WMD in Iraq's arsenal was Saddam himself, the threat he posed to his people and his neighbors, and the misbegotten conceits he inspired in a region hungry for a new Saladin or Nasser, someone to redeem Arab honor by standing up to the West.

This was the boil that most needed to be lanced if there was to be any hope that the societies from which the September 11 hijackers hailed could be meaningfully reformed. Saddam in power meant U.S. forces in Saudi Arabia, a chief grievance in bin Laden's fatwa against America. It also meant $25,000 checks for the families of Palestinian suicide bombers, and the costly maintenance of the no-fly zones and the preservation of U.N. sanctions, which the war's current critics once told us were the cause of thousands of Iraqi deaths from malnutrition and the dearth of medical supplies.

Saddam in power meant that virtually no other Arab problem, such as Syria's occupation of Lebanon, could be addressed, let alone resolved. In short, Saddam in power locked the Arab world -- and America's involvement in it -- into shapes and patterns that were the source of so many of its political and social ills, and that could only be broken by his removal. And, to a remarkable extent, that is just what happened in the two years after the war.

Consider where things stood a year ago on the fourth anniversary of September 11. Israel had just withdrawn from the Gaza Strip, a territorial concession never achieved throughout the seven years of the Oslo peace process. The Palestinian Authority was democratically led by Mahmoud Abbas, not Hamas. Lebanon had just been freed from 29 years of Syrian occupation, and the Syrian regime of Bashar Assad was facing a potentially regime-changing investigation into the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had gone to Cairo to demand political change; Mr. Mubarak responded by agreeing to a multiparty presidential vote that, while rigged, was a step forward from the previous uncontested referenda on his rule. And despite terrible violence and plenty of second-guessing by the global commentariat, Iraqis freely ratified the most liberal and democratic national constitution in Arab history. * * *

The last year has seen some setbacks, which go far to explain the overglum mood surrounding the current anniversary. Yet it is by no means clear that those failures owe to some flaw in the overall U.S. strategy as opposed to tactical mistakes and the simple fact that we are fighting a determined, resourceful enemy that is itself adapting to our moves. The victory for Hamas, the troubles in Iraq, the uncertain outcome in the recent war in Lebanon, and above all the renewed aggression of Iran all pose major challenges. Mr. Bush's party may pay a price for those setbacks in November, though the President has begun to fight back, as he shows nearby.

We're glad he is doing so, because the great challenge for this presidency is to remind Americans that the threat they face is undimmed even as the events of September 11 recede in memory. The costs of responding to 9/11 have been many, and the temptation is strong to think we can withdraw from Iraq, or from the larger Middle East without consequence to our own security. The abiding lesson of that day five years ago is that this is a dangerous illusion.

On September 12, 2001, we wrote with some optimism about the "resilience" of modern industrial democracies. That resilience has been proved time and again the past five years, and the challenge is to prove it again for the next five, or 50, if that's what victory requires.

Thatcher To Attend Sept 11 Memorial Events In Washington (AFP)

AFP, September 9, 2006

Former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher will attend events in Washington to mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, her office said.

The 80-year-old baroness will on September 11 attend a church service and a commemorative ceremony with US Vice President Dick Cheney, who invited her to Washington.

The ceremony will take place at 8:46 am (12:46 GMT), the precise time when members of the Al-Qaeda terror network crashed the first hijacked plane into the World Trade Centre in New York.

Afterwards Thatcher will attend a ceremony at the State Department, where she will meet US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The trip will be Thatcher's first to the United States since she attended the funeral of former US secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger in April.

Thatcher was Britain's prime minister from 1979 to 1990 and formed a close partnership with then US president Ronald Reagan, who died in 2004.

She holds the presidential medal of freedom, one of the two highest United States civilian awards.

US's Rice To Thank Canada For Support After September 11 Attacks (AFP)

AFP, September 9, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001 attacks in Halifax, Canada, the State Department said.

"Secretary Rice wanted to go to Canada on September 11th as a way of thanking Canada and the Canadian people for all that they did on that day," said department spokesman Sean McCormack.

DOJ_NMG_0060994

"On September 11th, America closed its air space, and the Canadian government and the Canadian people took in many, many flights and many, many people who were essentially stranded because they could not continue flying into American air space," he said.

After the attacks on New York and Washington by four teams of airplane hijackers, Canada received 224 flights carrying 33,000 passengers which were diverted away from the United States.

"That was just an extraordinary act of trust, generosity and kindness in a moment of need, and Secretary Rice wanted to travel to Canada to thank the Canadian government and the Canadian people for those extraordinary act," McCormack said.

Travelling with Canadian foreign Minister Peter MacKay, on September 12 Rice will visit Pictou, MacKay's electoral district in Nova Scotia province.

Where's The Clarity? (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, September 9, 2006

Terrible as they are, wars can be clarifying events. Like thunderstorms, they purge the diplomatic air. They force people to take sides and, if they are total wars, they leave one victor standing. This is what happened during World Wars I and II (the latter being mainly an extension of the former) and the cold war. In the end, fascism and totalitarianism were vanquished—with the exception of a few redoubts, like North Korea—freedom was left the sole victor and America was seen as its champion. George W. Bush would have us view the "war on terror," which turns five years old on Monday, in this light as well. "This is the great ideological struggle of the 21st century—and it is the calling of our generation," the president said this week in a dramatic rendezvous-with-destiny speech timed to the 9/11 anniversary. "Freedom is once again contending with the forces of darkness and tyranny"—the terrorists who would seek to impose what he called a "totalitarian Islamic empire."

The president's opponents say the war on terror is nothing at all like the last century's biggest conflicts. With a crucial midterm election approaching, Democrats in particular are eager to portray what Bush calls the war on terror's "central front"—Iraq—not as another glorious fight against totalitarianism but as another Vietnam, a quagmire unrelated to the fight against Al Qaeda. Vietnam, of course, was not a clarifying war, at least for Americans. Indeed the war provoked so much confusion and self-doubt about U.S. policy that its impact is still felt today, 31 years after the fall of Saigon. To Bush's critics, the "Vietnam Syndrome"—a casualty-shy reluctance to use force—has now been replaced by a parallel, and equally paralyzing, "Iraq Syndrome."

The truth is that, year by year, the so-called GWOT (global war on terrorism) has become less and less clear in its direction and goals—and less and less like any previous war. What began as a crystal-clear fight against a small, self-contained group of murderers has become a kind of murky, open-ended World War III in which the identity of the enemy is less certain and our allies seem to grow less reliable. While at the beginning no one had any use for Al Qaeda—Americans, Russians, Chinese, Europeans, Arab regimes—now that the Bush administration has expanded the war to include all terrorists and their "state sponsors," very few nations seem to be buying fully into the U.S. vision. Many of those who hated Al Qaeda, for example, never accepted the link to Saddam Hussein's Iraq. And some of these countries are ambivalent at best about making Hizbullah and Hamas (both of which disavow any link to Al Qaeda), or their sponsors, Iran and Syria, part of the same struggle. "We're a nation at war," Bush says. But we all must now ask: with whom exactly?

In two remarkable speeches delivered in Washington this week, the president sought to recover some of the clarity of 9/11, returning the war on terror to its origins. On Tuesday he restored Osama bin Laden to his place as America's central bogeyman—after a three-year period of barely mentioning his name—and compared him to Hitler and Lenin. The next day, the president brought families of 9/11 victims into the East Room for a dramatic speech in which he acknowledged, for the first time, the existence of the CIA's secret prison program and an "alternative set of procedures" used to interrogate key Al Qaeda suspects rounded up in the early years after 9/11. He made a vigorous case that "questioning the detainees in this program has given us information that has saved innocent lives by helping us stop new attacks."

He also pointed to his most signal success: the lack of a follow-up assault on the U.S. homeland in the five years since 9/11 (except for the still-unsolved anthrax attacks of that fall). Both speeches were political masterstrokes, especially coming two months before an election that has Republicans in serious trouble over questions of the president's competence and credibility. The problem is that, measured against the policies the president has pursued over the past five years, Bush's rhetoric does not describe the war on terror we have come to know.

On Tuesday, speaking before the Military Officers Association of America, Bush exhorted his listeners to take bin Laden's rants seriously, reminding them of what happened when the world powers of the day ignored "an exiled lawyer" (Vladimir Lenin) and a "failed painter" (Adolf Hitler) who laid out their bloody, revolutionary programs early on. "Bin Laden and his terrorist allies have made their intentions as clear as Lenin and Hitler before them," Bush said. "The question is: Will we listen? Will we pay attention to what these evil men say?" Bush declared that "we will not rest ... until this threat to civilization has been removed."

In light of the facts that have since been confirmed, this description does not fully account for Bush's own conduct over the past five years. Bin Laden, after all, didn't just write a pamphlet on 9/11—he carried out his plans, directing his henchmen to kill thousands of Americans on their own soil. It was a moment of absolute, terrifying clarity: in retribution for 9/11, according to every Western code of justice and honor, bin Laden should have been relentlessly pursued until he was dead or captured. Yet we now know that the Bush administration allowed itself to be distracted from that task as the months passed after 9/11. Gary Berntsen, the CIA officer in charge of the operation, told me a year ago that he knows for certain that bin Laden was trapped in Al Qaeda's Tora Bora hideaway after the fall of Afghanistan's Taliban rulers in late 2001. As Berntsen records in his 2005 book "Jawbreaker," bin Laden told his followers, "Forgive me," and apologized for getting them pinned down by the Americans. But Bernsten says, the Pentagon refused to put in the necessary troops.

This account is corroborated by Bernsten's then boss, CIA senior officer Henry Crumpton (now the State Department's counterterrorism chief), who made clear to Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney that America's Afghan and Pakistan allies couldn't take out bin Laden. "We're going to lose our prey if we're not careful," Crumpton told Bush and Cheney, according to Ron Suskind's new book, "The One Percent Doctrine." Numerous accounts have also established that, shortly after Tora Bora, the president began diverting Special Forces troops, Predator drones and other resources involved in the hunt for bin Laden to Iraq.

Yes, Bush sought this week to clarify his broader strategic goals in the war on terror. "The experience of September the 11th made clear, in the long run, the only way to secure our nation is to change the course of the Middle East," he said. And that may well be true. But what about the short run and the medium run? The chief culprit of 9/11 and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are still free. And Bush administration officials concede, anonymously, that there is a good chance the two will never be caught, especially now that Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, with the administration's blessing, has pledged not to continue troop incursions into the tribal areas where bin Laden and Zawahiri may be hiding.

We also know—again, these are now historical facts, not opinions—that while Bush resorts to the rally-the-citizenry (or electorate) rhetoric of World War II and the cold war, he has sought to tax-cut his way to victory, driving up record budget deficits, underfunding the U.S. Army and quashing all talk of a draft. Even in Iraq, the Army is desperately trying to stabilize Baghdad with one brigade of Stryker fighting vehicles because there are no others that are ready. "We need several brigades, but we don't have them," a senior military official told me this week, citing the Army's pleas for emergency funding. "Since 9/11, for all the rhetoric about us being involved in a global war, there's been nothing of the kind," historian Robert Dallek, who has written of the national mobilization efforts during World War II and the cold war, told me. "It's generally been business as usual."

Then there is overarching issue of whether Iraq ever should have been part of the war on terror at all—or, instead, whether it made the GWOT hopelessly murky. In his speech Tuesday, Bush called Iraq the "capital" of Al Qaeda's would-be totalitarian caliphate and said it "is the central battlefield where the outcome of this struggle will be decided." But military experts now say that the continuing violence since the killing of Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, the top foreign terrorist in Iraq, last June is evidence that the insurgency there is mainly indigenous, largely unconnected to the larger war on terror. "This proves how small a part foreign fighters play in Iraq," says John Arquilla, an intelligence expert at the Naval Postgraduate School. "There's a real Lewis Carroll quality to all of this rhetoric, where what is up is down, and what is right is wrong. The president says that Iraq is the central front. But the president also says Iraq had nothing to do with 9/11. A visitor from Mars just entering into this debate would surely be struck by the contradictions in these statements. And then to invoke bin Laden as a bête noire now while closing down Alec Station [the CIA's bin Laden monitoring group, which was disbanded earlier this year] seems a contradiction as well."

DOJ_NMG_0060996

Five years on, little of the GWOT conforms any longer to Bush's clarifying rhetoric. The president argued again this week, as he has tirelessly, that "the lack of freedom" in the Middle East helped create September 11. No one doubts that more freedom and democracy will help to cure the pathologies of the Arab world. But the truth is that the group that orchestrated 9/11 grew up in Afghanistan—not part of the Middle East—during the anti-Soviet jihad of the 1980s. It was conceived by Arab men who'd left their countries and formed European- and Asian-based cells. Their philosophy, mainly based on ultra-orthodox Salafism, was spread by a nominal American ally, Saudi Arabia, underwritten by petrodollars supplied by oil-addicted Westerners. Initially at least, the "Islamo-fascism" that the Bush team refers to had little to do with the mainstream struggle in Islam. It also remains a distinct phenomenon from Hamas and Hizbullah, or the Muslim Brotherhood movement in Egypt.

Some scholars of Islam, such as Gilles Kepel, also argue that extremist Islamist groups were shaped at least as much by European fascist and communist influences as by Arab dictatorships. In an interview, a senior administration official who helped draft Bush's latest "national strategy for combating terrorism"—also released this week—could not cite any authoritative studies linking the rise of democracy with the defeat of terrorism, other than to say, "I'm personally a huge fan of John Stuart Mill." "There's a real disconnect here," says Princeton scholar G. John Ikenberry. "They've come to this without serious thought about how you get democracy and what its impact is."

A parallel lack of clarity led to the interrogation scandal that Bush sought to put behind him Wednesday. The president announced the transfer of CIA-held Al Qaeda suspects to Pentagon custody and the prospect of future trials, in what a senior administration official described as a concession to June's Supreme Court ruling that held Bush's enemy-combatant detention policies to be unconstitutional. In his big speech, Bush defended these policies as a way of applying his broad doctrine of pre-emption of terror to the interrogation room, justified by the need to "break" often zealous and uncooperative Al Qaeda prisoners for clues on forthcoming plots and insights into the global terrorist network. The president was eager to describe how a daisy chain of intelligence breaks from the 14 men he named this week led to the exposure of Al Qaeda's anthrax program and numerous averted attacks, including a "planned strike" on U.S. Marines at Camp Lemonier in Djibouti, another one on the U.S. Consulate in Karachi "using car bombs and motorcycle bombs" and "a plot to hijack passenger planes and fly them into Heathrow or the Canary Wharf in London."

Most Americans, frankly, wouldn't have much of a problem if someone like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the mastermind behind 9/11, was beaten to within an inch of his life in some dark room somewhere (which is probably what happened after he was captured in May 2003). But the exposure of the two-year-old interrogations scandal—culminating in an embarrassing series of stories about the CIA secret prison program—was also a direct result of the administration's conflation of the original "war on terror" with the counterinsurgency war in Iraq. As detailed in several Pentagon investigations, a handful of techniques that might be legally and even morally justifiable against a handful of true bad guys mentioned by Bush on Wednesday came to be used indiscriminately against many more detainees, a number perhaps running into the thousands in Iraq. What began as a carefully controlled experiment in new techniques used to ratchet up the pressure on resistant Al Qaeda leaders beginning with Abu Zubaida in the spring of 2002—handled by a small number of skilled operatives working for the CIA—came to be used by ill-trained guards at Abu Ghraib prison. If this conflation hadn't occurred, it's far less likely there would have been a scandal of this proportion in the first place.

Finally, another thing that hasn't been clarified five years on is the politics of the war on terror. And just two months from a critical election in which Bush won't be running, but his legacy will be at stake, the president has once again proved he is a master of the game, painting the congressional Democrats as defeatist. This debate, which we will hear a lot more about in coming weeks, is also very different from previous wars. During World War II and, to a lesser extent, the cold war, politicians made a conscious, painstaking effort to bridge party lines, which were every bit as viciously partisan as today. Democrat Harry Truman and Republican Dwight Eisenhower, says John Arquilla, "crafted grand strategy that everybody in America, right and left, accepted for decades. They knew they needed broad support. We don't have that now. We're trying to wage the war on terror with the support of only part of the American people."

Perhaps the only thing that is clear any longer is that the war on terror will continue for a long time to come. And so will the war of words over the war on terror.

Arrest Evidence Stands In Padilla Terror Case (LAT)

By Vanessa Blum

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

MIAMI — A federal judge has refused to throw out evidence related to the 2002 arrest of alleged Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

Rejecting defense lawyers' requests, U.S. Magistrate Stephen Brown said in a pair of rulings that jurors should be allowed to consider the terror suspect's statements prior to his arrest in May 2002, as well as items in his possession at the time including about $10,000 in cash, a cellphone and a phone book containing numbers for alleged Al Qaeda contacts. Brown's rulings, signed Tuesday, became public Friday.

After his arrest, Padilla, now 35, was designated an enemy combatant by President Bush and held in military custody for 3 1/2 years before being transferred to Miami to face terrorism-related charges. His trial is set to begin in January.

Padilla is charged with providing material support and resources to terrorists. Government officials had said he wanted to detonate a radioactive bomb on U.S. soil.

Defense lawyers argued Padilla's arrest was illegally based on information obtained from alleged terrorists held overseas, at least one of whom claimed to have been tortured.

Anything their client said to the FBI should be thrown out because he was not informed of his rights to remain silent and to be represented by an attorney, the lawyers said.

Brown said such warnings were unnecessary because the agents questioned Padilla before placing him in custody.

As for the torture allegations, the judge said even if true, defense lawyers failed to prove that the FBI agent applying for Padilla's arrest warrant knew or should have known about them.

The rulings come after U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke, who oversees the case, threw out a main charge against Padilla and his co-defendants because it duplicated allegations in other charges.

Looking For Agreement On Tribunals For Detainees (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — The main Senate Republican in talks with the White House over bills to establish tribunals for terror suspects said Friday that a small set of problems divided the two sides and that they would negotiate through the weekend in an effort to reach a compromise.

The senator, John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said “90 percent” of the proposal that the White House submitted this week reflected a proposal that he and other Republican senators who have taken the lead on the question had drafted over the summer.

The senators, Mr. Warner, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona, maintain that they can work with the administration to resolve the differences, but they showed few signs of yielding on the disputed questions. “The determination simply has to be made on what flexibility the administration wants to show,” Mr. Warner said.

The disputed issues are the same ones that the Supreme Court cited in striking down a system of tribunals that the administration established after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. They include whether suspects can be excluded from their trials and what types of evidence would be admissible.

“I feel strongly about this,” Mr. Warner said. “I want to be supportive of the president.”

But as a lawyer and former Navy secretary, he said, “I feel this bill has got to pass what I call the federal court muster, so this thing doesn’t get tangled up in the courts again and go all the way to the Supreme Court, and then down she goes again.”

Mr. Warner said that his committee would have its legislation ready for a vote next week, whether or not the White House agrees to all its provisions. He predicted that the Senate would quickly pass it.

“We don’t need a lot of time,’’ he said. “We all know what the issues are. I don’t see a prolonged debate.”

DOJ_NMG_0060998

There is no certainty that the committee bill will reach the Senate floor if there is no deal with the White House. The Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, has said he will decide next week whether to bring the committee bill to the floor or bring up the version that President Bush proposed on Wednesday.

House Republican leaders have said they intend to pass the White House version.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the tribunals the White House established violated the Constitution and international law by denying terror suspects basic human and legal rights.

Chiefly, the court objected to excluding suspects from trials and allowing hearsay and evidence obtained under coercion. It faulted the administration system to have a military lawyer oversee the proceedings, as opposed to a judge, as in military courts-martial. The court added that the jury size was too small.

Mr. Bush's new proposal allows for a military judge and expands the jury from a minimum of three people to five, the minimum the court said was required under courts-martial, with 12 for cases involving the death penalty.

The administration proposal would allow hearsay and evidence obtained by coercion, if the judge rules it was probative and reliable.

The plan would also deny the accused the right to see and therefore respond to classified evidence that the jury could use to convict him, although the defendant could be allowed a summary of it.

That provision, Mr. Graham said this week, would be struck down by a court "in 30 seconds."

Mr. Graham in particular, a former military lawyer and a military reserve judge, has been inclined to follow the advice of the military lawyers on the shape of the tribunals.

Mr. McCain, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, has argued that any system would set a precedent for how other countries try American troops and that passing a system that excluded the defendant opened up Americans to being tried in kangaroo courts elsewhere.

A spokesman for the International Committee of the Red Cross in Washington said Friday that it would visit the 14 new detainees being held at the naval base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, as soon as it received permission from the Defense Department.

An official with the Red Cross in Washington, Simon Schorno, said: "We do not have a date yet. But as soon as we get confirmation, we will undertake a visit as soon as possible."

Mr. Schorno said his organization had a team of about 10 people on standby. The team, which includes officials in the Washington office, will draw Red Cross employees from elsewhere to work as translators.

He said the first order of business would be to interview the detainees "and give them the means to contact their families through Red Cross messages."

The Red Cross, Mr. Schorno added, will assess the detention conditions in the undisclosed locations where the inmates had been held and now at Guantánamo.

By agreement with the United States government, the Red Cross will, in exchange for access, not make public its views on the conditions of confinement and treatment.

Mr. Schorno said his organization might announce the fact of the visit when it occurred because of the wide public interest in it.

A Solution For Trials (WP)

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

IN SENDING legislation to Congress to authorize military trials at Guantanamo Bay, President Bush appears to be hoping that, with an election just around the corner, Congress will not have the stomach to deny him the latitude he demands both on the trials themselves and on larger questions of the treatment of detainees. But quietly, over the past few weeks, a trio of Republican senators -- Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (Va.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John McCain (Ariz.) -- has put together a remarkably good alternative bill on the subject. The draft balances profound and difficult interests thoughtfully and with considerable respect both for the uniqueness of the current conflict and for the American tradition of fair trials and due process. It is, in almost all respects, superior to the president's proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0060999

The Senate draft would require that military commissions function much like regular courts martial. Commissions would not be permitted to convict on the basis of classified material the accused cannot see, and evidence obtained by torture or abuses just short of it would not be admissible. At the same time, the bill would give the administration needed flexibility on the use of hearsay evidence and on authenticating evidence collected in the rough and tumble of warfare. Finally, it would also make clear that commissions can try alleged conspiracies -- a point about which several justices had raised questions when the Supreme Court decided the case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld this summer.

The draft, which is still in flux, is not perfect. The jurisdiction of the commissions it would create would be too broad and could sweep in people who should not face military trials. The bill also would prohibit those convicted from challenging their convictions in federal court except under a constrained appeals process. Several other provisions -- such as one giving defendants the right to represent themselves -- should be reconsidered. But these problems can be fixed. The administration's bill has more fundamental flaws -- starting with the fact that the trials themselves would deviate from the usual rules of courts martial more than necessary. In particular, while the bill bans evidence obtained by torture, it would permit the admission of evidence obtained by coercion just short of it in certain situations. It would still permit a conviction based in part on evidence the defendant has had no chance to see or rebut -- something the military's top uniformed lawyers insist is not necessary.

More troubling still, it would amend the law to limit the application in the current conflict of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions -- which prohibits cruel and degrading treatment of detainees. The administration's bill would define Common Article 3, which the Supreme Court has applied to the conflict with al-Qaeda, as requiring only what U.S. law -- the same law the administration has twisted to allow for abusive interrogations -- already requires. To top it off, the bill would strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over all pending cases involving detainees at Guantanamo, and thus any future review of trials or detentions.

President Bush is pushing aggressively for quick action on his bill. But the Senate needs to work from its own, far better, draft -- which, with relatively few changes, could provide a sound legislative basis for fair and orderly trials.

Lindsey Graham: Accused Terrorists Must See Evidence Against Them (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

SENECA, S.C. - Sen. Lindsey Graham said Friday that he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them.

Graham, a military lawyer who's a colonel in the Air Force Reserve, read the White House bill late Thursday evening on a plane from Washington to Greenville, S.C. He pored through the 86-page document until, on page 34, he reached a clause that would prohibit defense lawyers from sharing classified information with defendants they represent. He marked it with a red pen.

"That's the killer," the South Carolina Republican said. "I fell over when I read it."

Graham said he supports 90 percent of the bill, which Bush sent to Congress on Wednesday. But, he said, "I don't feel good about telling someone - no matter who they are - `We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why.'"

"It's a bridge too far, and it's not necessary," Graham said in an extensive interview with McClatchy Newspapers in his hometown of Seneca. "It will result in putting the (military) commissions in legal jeopardy and eroding our standing in the world community."

Graham, 51, said that every general and admiral at the top of the country's military justice system agrees that classified information can be shared with accused terrorists without jeopardizing national security.

Maj. Gen. Scott Black, the judge advocate general of the Army, told the House Armed Services Committee on Thursday: "I believe the accused should see that evidence."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has given the Armed Services Committee until Tuesday to produce a bill, Graham said. The panel's chairman, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, and Sen. John McCain share Graham's view on the handling of classified evidence, setting up a possible clash in the Senate next week.

Graham said Frist has vowed to bring Bush's bill directly to the Senate floor on Tuesday. Graham said he agrees with Frist that Congress must act soon so terrorist trials can begin at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bush called on lawmakers to pass his tribunals measure quickly so detainees can be tried. The president increased the political pressure by disclosing that 14 senior al-Qaida members, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, were being sent to Guantanamo Bay from secret CIA prisons overseas.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the Bush administration had exceeded its authority in establishing military tribunals without congressional action, prompting the need for legislation.

Senior lawyers at the White House, the Justice Department and the Pentagon argue that allowing terrorists to see classified evidence could expose how the United States has pursued al-Qaida and would put informants within the terror network in danger. But Graham said he's certain the Supreme Court would reject a law that denies accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"It would be a tragedy to take one of the masterminds of 9/11, hold them accountable, only to have the case rejected by the Supreme Court for no good reason," Graham said.

"I'm frustrated when people say we're trying to give terrorists classified information," Graham said. "Well, that's garbage. We're going to protect our classified information, and we're going to protect our methods and sources."

Graham said that if his differences with the White House can't be bridged, he's prepared to push an amendment giving accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"I think I will draft an amendment that will get majority support in the Senate, and there will be plenty of Republicans voting for it," Graham said. "I'm just predicting that we win. I don't know by what margin."

The House is set to take up tribunals legislation the week of Sept. 18.

Air Force Col. Morris Davis, who would run the Guantanamo trials, said accused terrorists will get fair trials and his corps of lawyers will work with whatever legislation Congress passes.

Davis said the 10 cases that moved forward before the Supreme Court ruling, including Hamdan's, didn't require the use of classified evidence to gain convictions.

"The world needs to see that we're giving these guys a fair trial," Davis said Friday in a telephone interview. "We want them to be open. We're going to do everything possible to declassify any evidence used in court. I don't think it's in anyone's interest to do things in secret."

Graham said it's possible to provide evidence without revealing how it was obtained.

"I don't mind giving the accused the phone conversation (transcript) of how they were plotting," he said. "But there's no need to tell them how NSA (the National Security Agency) works. There's no need to divulge confidential informants who put us on the terror trail and led us to evidence we will use to convict."

While a few other parts of Bush's measure concern Graham, they're not deal-breakers for him. The prohibition on sharing classified information, however, goes to the heart of what he said he taught Afghan military lawyers during an Air Force Reserve assignment there last month.

"The United States can't say it's a rule-of-law nation and at the same time potentially impose the death penalty on evidence never seen by the person to be put to death," Graham said.

Why Lindsey Graham Is Blocking Bush On Terror Trials (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, September 9, 2006

The GOP planned to play the national security card on Capitol Hill this election season, but they are being trumped by one of their own: South Carolina's Lindsey Graham. As they had in the last two election cycles, Republicans intended to force a series of "bad votes" for the Democrats this September, designed to make them look weak on defense and national security. Pushing through hard-line bills that would authorize President Bush's programs of domestic surveillance and terrorism tribunals, the White House and Republican leaders thought, would force Democrats either to oppose popular anti-terrorism initiatives or play a supporting role to the GOP's star turn defending the homeland.

But three Republican Senators are scuttling the party leadership's plan. Two are Senate stars — John Warner, head of the armed services committee, and John McCain, the party's frontrunner for the 2008 Presidential campaign. The third, Graham, is the youngest and most conservative. But his role may be the crucial one. As the Senate's only serving judge advocate general in the armed forces, he carries authority on the subject of military trials and he has made it clear that he will oppose any attempt by either party to turn what he calls the "legal infrastructure of the war on terror" into a campaign device.

"I hope they don't create an environment where military commissions become a political football where they push things that are just over the line," he told Time outside a Judiciary Committee mark-up on the surveillance bills. "There are too many kids that have been killed or wounded for us to play around with this. The legal infrastructure in the war on terror will be necessary for decades to come, not just for the next election, and we have an obligation to make sure that our troops have the clarity they need in fighting this war."

The biggest issue of disagreement between Graham and the White House is over rules of evidence. In its proposed rules for military tribunals, the White House wants to be able to introduce evidence that can be withheld from the defendant. The Administration wants those rules of evidence, moreover, to apply not just for alleged terrorists but for foreigners accused of conspiracy and other lesser charges. Graham and the Pentagon's leading lawyers want to allow military judgeS to make the decision whether classified evidence against detainees is important enough to the case to be shown to the defendant.

"They want to do something that is new and novel and that is very problematic," Graham says. "How can you effectively defend someone if you can't even talk to them about the case? I do not think that will survive judicial scrutiny." More important, he argues (as do Department of Defense lawyers) that restricting the rights now for even the worst of America's detainees could mean similar restrictions on the rights for America's armed forces captured in the future. "It's a bridge too far, and that's a precedent that could come back to haunt our troops," says Graham.

For now, Graham is winning. Though the White House has continued to beat the issue in speeches and press conferences, its legislation is stalled on the Hill. Democrats are doing their part, of course. Wisconsin's Russ Feingold exasperated Judiciary chairman Arlen Specter Thursday by introducing four amendments to the surveillance bill Specter had negotiated with the White House last June. The bill failed to make it out of committee and, like the military commissions bill, faces an uphill battle to reach the floor for a vote.

Graham may yet back down — he has been a key ally for the Administration on other controversial matters of detention in the past — but for now he's standing firm. "If you try to create political winners and losers this year then I think you've let those men and women on the front line of this war in the military and other agencies down," he says. "Politics will not protect us. 'Bad votes' will not protect us. What will protect us is an interrogation system that is constitutional and effective."

Linking Faces To Terror: Bush's Clever Footwork (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

NEW YORK

A lot of words have been expended on President George W. Bush these past years, many of them harsh, and in the cacophony a single thought has perhaps been overlooked: He's a pure political animal.

When an election nears, and a critical midterm congressional vote is just nine weeks away, Bush is galvanized and the traits that have won him four straight elections at state and national level re-emerge: a relentless energy, a pitiless focus, an uncanny sense of timing, an agenda-setting determination and a folksy empathy with the average American that belies his blue-blooded lineage.

The thoroughbred has been in plain view this past week as the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks on Monday nears. A combination of this moment, whose solemnity will play to the commander- in-chief's authority, and the adrenaline of an accelerating campaign seem to have banished, for now, Bush's second-term drift.

Speech after presidential speech, day after day, has hammered on or around the theme that brought Bush his victory in 2004: terrorism and the supposed resolve of Republicans and wobbliness of Democrats before this mortal threat to America.

This being Bush, the oratory has had its risible side. We've seen the bizarre lumping together of "Lenin and Hitler" - not Stalin, but Lenin! - to exemplify the murderous menace to liberty that Bush believes Osama bin Laden and his ilk pose once more, demanding resolve rather than Chamberlain-like appeasement.

We've also been treated to a new favored presidential iteration of the threat - "Islamo-fascists" or "Islamic fascists" - an odd formulation for the loose-knit, stateless groups of vaguely like-minded anti- Western Muslim fanatics whose movement has few, if any, of the characteristics of 20th-century totalitarian systems. After all, these guys don't even wear uniforms.

But these are considerations for which Main Street has little time. Bush knows that. He wants the popular imagination to align current American military efforts in Afghanistan and Iraq with the boys wading, in freedom's name and through a hail of Nazi fire, onto the beaches of Normandy in 1944. And damn the details.

The theme is, of course, a tired one by now. Americans are a lot less receptive to it than they were two years ago. The heavy toll of Iraq and the growing difficulties of Afghanistan - not to mention expensive gasoline and an uncertain economy - have made reality harder for Bush to mold to his political ends.

But he's ingenious. His love of wrong-footing an opponent appears undiminished. Underestimating Bush's political acumen has proved costly to many a Democrat. That was illustrated this week by the most effective of his speeches, one that did introduce a new element into the election and the terrorism debate.

By bringing 14 high-level terror suspects out of secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency and into the relative open of the Guantánamo Bay detention center, and by demanding that Congress approve war-crimes trials of these men by military tribunals, Bush seemed to change the political dynamic.

He put a face to an increasingly faceless phenomenon: "terror." There, suddenly, were the visages of three senior Al Qaeda suspected operatives: Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, Ramzi bin al-Shibh, and Abu Zubaydah. They were a reminder of the successes in fighting back against those who brought murder and mayhem to America five years ago.

By detailing some of the critical intelligence gleaned from interrogations of these and other prisoners, Bush also contrived a more persuasive posing of the core question in the fight against terrorism than he has mustered in a long time.

That question is: what degree, if any, of the exceptional measures including secret prisons and interrogation so aggressive as to skirt the borders of torture was - and remains - justified in trying to keep a traumatized country safe? Smart people in good faith are going to come down on different sides of that question. Two facts are indisputable. America has not been attacked since Sept. 11, 2001. And the cost to the international image of the United States, and to its self-image, of the creation of an obscure prison labyrinth beyond the rules of law and habeas corpus has been huge. The country's authority and effectiveness have thereby been diminished.

What Bush in effect did, by abruptly bringing part of a shadowy world to the surface, was to make the best possible case for his approach. He raised his game when it mattered, as he has before.

He also created an immediate political challenge for Democrats. With an anniversary - and Hollywood - refreshing memories of 9/11, they must now decide if they can afford to be seen to stand in the way of the president's proposed trials of the suspected, and now visible, authors of the attack.

That's a delicate dilemma. The Supreme Court rebuffed the proposed procedures in June, but a perception of Democratic obstinacy in delaying military tribunals for the likes of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed could carry a heavy political price.

The Democrats still have many weapons in their arsenal: the myriad fiascoes of Iraq, the simmering anger of Americans over the administration's incompetence, the global unpopularity of Bush. The president's speeches have not, for now, altered the outlook for November: a likely Democratic retaking of the House and an outside chance of Democratic control of the Senate, too.

But Bush is fighting, with a verve that is startling for a second-term president with no possibility of re- election himself. Already, he's clawed his popularity levels back into the 40s from the 30s. The last week has been a timely reminder to the Democrats: underestimate this political thoroughbred at your peril.

Judgment At Guantanamo (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

As it enacts new rules for military commissions, Congress -- as well as the public -- should keep two overriding principles in mind. One: While the jihadists detained at Guantanamo Bay must have due process of law before they can be criminally punished, they are not -- despite a billowing cloud of confused reasoning, misleading testimony and downright propaganda -- entitled, under the U.S. Constitution or relevant international law, to the same level of procedural protections enjoyed by the lawful soldiers of sovereign states. Two: The methods of warfare employed by unlawful combatants in the war on terror fully justify extraordinary trial rules.

Let's take the first issue. In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the Supreme Court invalidated the Pentagon's original military commission rules, holding that they must be the same as in American courts martial. But it reached this conclusion only because of language -- requiring military commission and courts-martial procedures to be "uniform insofar as practicable" -- in the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Congress can and should change this language.

As to international law: Under the Geneva Conventions, captured enemy soldiers accused of criminal violations are entitled to courts-martial procedures only if they qualify as "lawful" or "privileged" combatants. At a minimum, this requires their association with a group that has a regular command structure, wears uniforms, carries its arms openly, and obeys the laws of war -- including the injunction against deliberate attacks on civilians. Al Qaeda and its allies do not qualify.

Thus the Guantanamo detainees are not entitled to be tried by courts martial unless Congress specifically says so. Congress should now join the president and declare explicitly that they are not so entitled. While unlawful combatants have always been considered a scourge to humanity, today they pose the greatest single threat to organized society, and every opportunity must be taken to de-legitimize them. Permitting them the same rights as honorable soldiers undercuts this goal.

With regard to the second issue -- fair trials -- it is precisely because jihadists deliberately target civilians for attack that there is a greater premium on the development and protection of intelligence sources and methods than in conventional warfare: Terrorist attacks must be prevented, not merely defeated. Consequently, the cost of exposing classified information during a public trial is far greater. Military commissions must, when necessary, permit portions of the proceedings to be closed to the public, with less restrictive evidentiary rules.

The Supreme Court approved this procedure in the leading case of Ex parte Quirin (1942), where eight German agents, including an American citizen, were tried by military commission. Here the Court accepted the trial of "unlawful" enemy combatants conducted in secret with substantially relaxed rules of evidence, and without a jury. After the war, similar rules were utilized for military commissions by all of the common law countries, including Great Britain, Canada and Australia.

These procedures are also consistent with current international norms. Both the United Nations International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda have routinely closed portions of trials (Slobodan Milosevic's trial proceedings were on many occasions closed to the public), and their rules permit the admission of "any relevant evidence . . . deem[ed] to have probative value," including hearsay. The International Criminal Court also permits closed proceedings -- to protect, among other things, "confidential or sensitive information" -- and follows highly discretionary evidentiary rules.

But can a defendant himself properly be excluded from any part of his trial, effectively keeping the identity of at least some witnesses secret? This implicates a core right of confrontation, and makes it more difficult to ensure a fair trial. However, there are a number of possible measures that can protect the defendant's interests. For example, a particular witness's identity may be hidden from the defendant, but not his lawyers. The judges may be required to discount, but not disregard, evidence that the defendant has not himself seen.

Congress should realize that, while the key test in any trial is whether the defendant has had a full and fair hearing and a meaningful opportunity to defend himself, the military and civilian justice systems can meet these goals in different ways. Also -- and despite the occasionally hysterical critics of the administration -- there is no established international law bar to keeping some evidence from the defendant in exceptional circumstances. Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions does not address the issue. It simply requires that defendants be afforded "all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples."

What these indispensable guarantees include are not settled in international law. In practice, U.N. criminal tribunals have permitted numerous ex parte contacts between prosecutors and judges, as well as significant limits on the defendant's right of confrontation. In the Yugoslav Tribunal, witness statements rather than live testimony have been allowed, as have depositions from other trials which the defendant's lawyers have not had the opportunity to contest.

Moreover, the Yugoslav Tribunal has also made clear, in The Prosecutor v. Tadic, that the testimony of anonymous witnesses would be permitted in exceptional circumstances. The Bush administration proposal would also permit the use of "anonymous" evidence only in exceptional circumstances. In any case, the relevant tribunal rules have changed many times over the years -- further evidencing the very unsettled state of international law in this area.

Overall, Congress should give unlawful enemy combatants their legally entitled rights -- but no more. The real choices in crafting procedures for the trial of detainees in military commissions are a matter of policy. In this regard, the president's military commissions bill carefully balances the key relevant policy imperatives -- ensuring a fair trial without undermining national security -- and yet gives unlawful enemy combatants more due process than they've ever received in history. It should be promptly enacted.

Bin Laden's Blueprint (WT)

By Claude Salhani

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Five years after the horrific September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York, the Pentagon and Pennsylvania, many Americans are still asking questions, trying to understand what happened that fateful morning, and why. And five years after the attacks, a great many unanswered questions remain.

In a speech to the nation Tuesday, President Bush tried to explain. He said Osama bin Laden had a multiphased strategy which was to have been carried out in the months and years after September 11, with the ultimate aim of reestablishing the Muslim Caliphate.

• The first stage, the president said, was to have been to expel the Americans from Iraq.

• The second stage called for establishing an Islamic authority, or emirate, which would be developed until it achieves the level of the Caliphate.

• The third stage would be to extend a jihad wave to the secular countries that border Israel.

• And the fourth stage would be a clash with Israel.

Said Mr. Bush: "We must not, and we will not, give the enemy victory in Iraq by deserting the Iraqi people."

Much in line with what the president said, the following are excerpts from a United Press International story titled "The potentate of the Super-Stan," written by this author on Sept. 19, 2001 -- only eight days after the attacks:

Like any revolution that needs to survive, Osama bin Laden and his al Qaeda movement must continue to grow, or it will die. In his quest for Muslim expansion, bin Laden would like to see the "Balkanization," or in this case the Islamization, of Central Asia. Maybe Islamization is the wrong word because there is little that is Islamic about his ways, which, says Professor Akbar Ahmad, chairman of Islamic Studies at the American University's School of International Studies in Washington, D.C., "are not Islamic at all."

"What makes it worse for Muslims is that the West is equating the Taliban's un-Islamic acts with Islam. This is a double affront to Muslims," Mr. Ahmad told UPI. "The first step the West needs to undertake is to better understand Islam."

Nevertheless, bin Laden is using Islam, much like Adolf Hitler used National Socialism, and Pol Pot communism. Had he been politically active in the 1960s or 1970s, he would just as easily have adopted communism as a platform in order to propel his cause. But mix in religious fervor and any revolution becomes all the more potent, and dangerous.

"It's a very complex situation," said Mr. Ahmad. This pan-Islamic movement "may be called Taliban in one country, and it is called something else in others." Several intelligence sources say bin Laden's network extends to more than 60 countries.

The Taliban's main aim, according to Mr. Ahmad, is to "shake up the West's structure." While bin Laden and the Taliban are not openly talking about a greater Islamic entity, others, such as Al Muhajeroun, a group based in Britain, and with whom bin Laden enjoys close ties, are talking about a Caliphate.

Bin Laden's first step was to hijack Islam to fit his cause, passing himself off as a fervent religious man. That, of course, is meant to win him the support of hordes of fanatics who know little, if anything, of the Koran. On the other hand, as the chief executive officer of terror, he knows exactly what he is doing and where he wants to go.

Anyone with his mindset would clearly not be content to remain holed up in the bleak caves of Afghanistan. So the question, of course, is what next?

In order to better grasp bin Laden's long-term thinking you will need to look at a map of Central Asia.

Afghanistan, where bin Laden had set up camp, is a desolate country without much of an infrastructure, reeling under a heavy burden following years of Soviet invasion, war and a disastrous civil conflict -- a perfect place from which to launch a revolution. Much of the terrain is inaccessible, except by horseback, making the task of modern armies impossible. Just ask the Russians.

To the south and east of Afghanistan lies Pakistan, another country that sits on the fence of Muslim fundamentalism. The Taliban have warned Pakistan that siding with the United States would bring down the wrath of the Muslim world upon it.

Pakistan, an Islamic country, is in a most precarious situation. The percentage of the population that supports the fundamentalists is in question, but some analysts believe the Taliban enjoys strong support in the army and the intelligence services.

This gives the country's ruler, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, a very fine line to tread. It also makes him an important friend of the United States and any Western coalition.

"The situation for Pakistan is very difficult," said Mr. Ahmad. "Pakistan is between a rock and a hard place. Musharraf is sitting on a tiger," said Mr. Ahmad. "You either ride it or you are inside its belly."

With its nuclear capabilities, Pakistan would represent an ideal asset for bin Laden and the Taliban, should it fall off the fence and into their hands. Think of the consequences.

Regardless, bin Laden's next step would be to extend the reach of his Muslim fundamentalism. Tajikistan, to the northeast, Uzbekistan to the immediate north and Turkmenistan to the northwest -- all three are former Soviet republics with whom Afghanistan shares a border and a common religion.

Besides geographic expansion, giving them greater power in numbers (a combined population of more than 35 million), these countries offer a wide range of natural resources. Turkmenistan borders the Caspian Sea, a short hop to Azerbaijan, another former Soviet republic, and a Muslim country. Given that scenario, the new Muslim empire, or Caliphate, governed by bin Laden or the Taliban would encircle Iran, itself a Muslim nation, also rich in oil and other natural resources.

Look at the map again and see the implications for the rest of the oil-rich Arabian Gulf. Iraq, Kuwait, Bahrain, the Emirates, Saudi Arabia and Oman are only a small step and a revolution away. Remember the old domino effect theory much feared by the West -- especially the United States -- during the Vietnam War?

Now look at the map again; we are back in the Middle East. Palestine, Israel, Jordan, Egypt, North Africa and sub-Saharan Africa are the natural extension for bin Laden's Caliphate.

Think this is an unbelievable scenario? It was done a few centuries ago. Bin Laden is far too astute to content himself with the caves of Afghanistan. Read between the lines of his communiques and the picture will become much clearer.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Urges Congress On Security Gaps (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

The nation's homeland security chief urged Congress on Friday to approve plans to better protect seaports and chemical plants from terrorists — or risk another attack on the scale of 9/11.

In a speech outlining public protections the government has taken since Sept. 11, 2001, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff also rebuked critics who have resisted stepped-up safeguards that might be costly or inconvenient.

"That kind of backsliding runs directly contrary to the lessons of 9/11," Chertoff told an audience of hundreds at Georgetown University. He was referring to critics, including lawmakers, of plans to require tamper-resistant driver's licenses and border-crossing cards that some consider too costly.

"If we had it five years ago, there would not have been a 9/11," Chertoff said, noting that nearly all the 9/11 hijackers had fake ID cards. "God help us if we don't take the steps to put into place as soon as we can to prevent another 9/11."

Approving tougher security measures at ports would "be a fitting tribute to the fifth anniversary" of 9/11, Chertoff said. And if Congress gives Homeland Security authority to regulate chemical facilities, "we will implement it promptly," he said. "That will raise security for Americans all over this country."

The Senate is considering port security legislation, which lawmakers are pushing to win full congressional approval by the end of the month. But plans to let the Homeland Security Department regulate the chemical industry are stalled.

House Democrats, too, faulted the Republican-controlled Congress for failing to close security gaps highlighted by the 9/11 Commission earlier this year. The commission gave Congress and the Bush administration several failing grades for remaining vulnerabilities that could be exploited by terrorists.

"We created the 9/11 Commission to ensure that our nation was never left unprepared again," said Rep. Bennie G. Thompson, D-Miss., top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee. "Five years after 9/11, it is time to move forward and do the right thing."

Airport Screening Technology Developed (AP-Y)

By Scott Lindlaw

AP, September 9, 2006

At the airport check-in of tomorrow, "getting through security" should take 30 seconds.

Passengers breeze through a series of scanners that probe for explosives, weapons, even drugs. Shoes stay on feet, laptops in cases. A machine confirms that a bottle of wine is wine, and not a disguised cocktail of bomb ingredients.

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks prompted a clampdown at the nation's airports and a new era of aggravation at security checkpoints. They also accelerated a race to develop better screening technology, research that has advanced with each thwarted terrorism plot.

Some of these devices are already snooping your luggage as part of a 2002 congressional mandate that all checked baggage be scrutinized for explosives, but technical glitches and funding problems stand in the way of other technologies.

Key questions remain: Are these ready to handle thousands of passengers per hour, and their belongings?

"Some things are imminently deployable. Some things are further off," said Steve Hill, spokesman for GE Security, the unit of General Electric Co. that makes transportation security equipment. "We are not light years off."

Although one futuristic device known as the "puffer" already is in use at San Francisco International and 36 other airports, the government halted its continued rollout recently because of concerns about reliability. The Transportation Security Administration declined to elaborate.

Critics also question whether the Bush administration is investing enough, even as it spent nearly $1 billion in fiscal 2006 on explosive-detection equipment for checked luggage and checkpoint screening.

TSA and the Department of Homeland Security have repeatedly failed to spend tens of millions of dollars that Congress earmarked for new airport security equipment.

In 2003, TSA cut most of its $75 million research budget to try to address a deficit. Its research office was later consolidated into DHS's research arm, which has failed to spend $200 million from past years, leading lawmakers to rescind the money this summer.

"The TSA is groping around, moving money," said Rep. Peter DeFazio of Oregon, a senior Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee. "They don't have enough money to have enough employees, and they can't buy new equipment."

Even as the recent British terror plot was unfolding, Homeland Security quietly tried to take away $6 million that was supposed to be spent this year developing new technology for detecting explosives.

There will never be enough money or improvements in technology, said Richard Lanza, senior research scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"We're always faced with this unpleasant and nasty fact: people are going to come up with new explosives which won't be detected by this," Lanza said. "You're just trying to make it harder for the bad guys."

DOJ_NMG_0061007

Among the newer technologies, the puffer is a tall, clear cylinder that looks like a Star Trek transporter. Passengers chosen largely at random are hit with quick blasts of air — not quite enough to ruffle the hair — to dislodge trace particles of explosives or narcotics from a passenger's skin and clothing. An instant microscopic analysis determines whether the passenger has been exposed to illicit substances.

In the future, luggage will be "sniffed" for minute traces of explosives or bombarded with neutrons, subjecting it to CT scans, which differs from traditional x-rays in that they take hundreds of pictures of an object from a variety of angles.

Passengers at San Francisco's international terminal can glimpse a "Checkpoint of the Future" as envisioned by GE Security.

The company has set up camp next to the checkpoint of today, a working security zone where plastic bins clatter and passengers shuffle through metal detectors. The GE "lab" is a nonworking checkpoint where the company is researching and tweaking its gear in hopes of winning government approvals and ironing out technical glitches.

Much of that gear is mock-up equipment where company officials can demonstrate the dream: a half-minute process, starting with a device that scans a passenger's finger for explosives and drug particles. A conveyor belt would use CT to peer at carry-on items. A body scan would look through clothing for knives, guns and bombs. A shoe scanner would end the need to kick off footwear.

GE Security said it has spent more than $100 million over the last five years in developing next-generation aviation screening technologies and products.

The government is particularly interested in developing the ability to quickly analyze what's inside liquid containers following the recent discovery of a London-based plot to bring down airliners using explosives disguised as common household items, said Jennifer Peppin, a spokeswoman for the TSA's Western region.

Rapiscan Systems Neutronics and Advanced Technologies of Santa Clara is trying to perfect a device that can peer into bottles, books and shoes and identify explosives inside. The scanner, slightly larger than a tipped-over phone booth, hits the object with neutrons and analyzes the gamma rays that bounce back, telling the machine which elements are present.

One recent afternoon, Rapiscan's chief operating officer, Pat Shea, placed a bottle of wine in the machine's drawer and started the analysis. A whirring sound followed for about 40 seconds, followed by an analysis: the bottle indeed contained wine.

Despite all the years and dollars his company has poured into research and development, Shea cautions against an over-reliance on technology.

"No one device is a silver bullet," he said. "The devices are a tool that's badly needed. You've got this classic needle in a haystack search, but made much easier if you have a magnet to work with. If you have to reach through the haystack with your hand until something pricks your finger, it'll take a long time."

Is Utah Tops In Terror? (DESERET)

By Lee Davidson And Geoffrey Fattah, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 9, 2006

State logs 96 cases categorized as terrorism in '05; most are ID theft

Federal data on criminal cases show Utah tops the nation in terrorist-related activity. But does it really?

The U.S. Department of Justice reported 96 terrorism-related prosecutions in the Beehive state in 2005. That represents one out of every eight such cases nationwide, well ahead of the second-place 80 filed in the Eastern District of Virginia (in the suburbs of Washington), and the third-place 67 in the Southern District of Texas.

But Utah has not turned suddenly into a stronghold for al-Qaida.

A Deseret Morning News review of the cases shows that most of them likely would not be considered terrorism-related by people outside of the Justice Department. In fact, 87 of the 96 were identity-theft cases. None of the cases reviewed had any apparent ties to organized crime or terrorist groups listed in court documents.

The Justice Department provided only vague, general reasons why such cases were coded as terrorism-related for national databases. Officials say that terrorists use crimes like identity theft to fund their efforts, making those crimes a potential threat to national security.

"Since our goal is to charge defendants before they can put their plans into action, this very often leads to the use of non-terrorism statutes such as fraud or false statement charges, immigration violations, identity theft and other offenses that often carry lesser penalties than offenses associated with completed terrorist acts or conspiracies," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. He added that smaller offenses allow officials to disrupt and prevent more serious attacks.

The U.S. attorney for Utah's spokeswoman, Melodie Rydalch, said her office could not comment and was instructed to refer all comments to Washington. Questions forwarded via e-mail to the U.S. Department of Justice's office of public affairs asking for comment on the Utah cases were not answered.

Perhaps the reason for the high number of terrorist-related cases in Utah has to do in part with the way the Utah office classifies some cases. Because the Utah Identity Theft Task Force is a component of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force, identity-theft cases often are termed as terrorist-related.

While some of those those cases are not directly linked to a terrorist plot, others are considered "domestic terrorism" because they have been linked to groups, such as white supremacists, who use identity theft to fund their efforts.

Even if cases have no terrorist link, federal prosecutors rationalize that crimes involving stealing personal information, illegal entry into the country and compromising airport security threaten national security.

There might also be another reason for the numbers. The Justice Department has used such statistics (along with data from all federal districts) in efforts to obtain anti-terrorism funding and to bolster support for the Patriot Act.

The findings emerge from raw data collected nationally from the Justice Department by Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse (TRAC) and analyzed by the Morning News.

The data reported that 743 terrorism-related cases were prosecuted in 2005, and 96 of them were in Utah.

Utah's number that year was twice as high as the 47 such prosecutions it had in 2004, which was then the third-highest in the nation. Before that, reported terrorism-related prosecutions were fairly rare in Utah: just nine in 2003, three in 2002 and none in 2001 or 2000.

The vast majority of the reported terrorism-related cases in Utah were for identity theft, immigration or drug violations that did not seem, in court documents, to have clear links to terrorist groups.

Some examples include:

• Jamie A. Barlow, who worked for an orthodontist, pleaded guilty to using the point-of-sale terminal in that office to illegally credit her account with $11,000. Court records say Barlow was given 90 days' house arrest and ordered to pay restitution.

• Eric Arthur Andersen and Deborah Gaye Bower pleaded guilty to charges stemming from fraudulently obtaining a credit card by using his brother's personal information, and then attempting to buy a $2,000 computer from Best Buy.

• Anne Kristine Bennett, Timmothy Ray Grimsley and Jacqueline Carrie Nelson pleaded guilty to charges stemming from stealing checks from the mail and going on a $3,000 spending spree with them in Weber and Davis counties.

• Robert Brad Young pleaded guilty to charges stemming from use of stolen and counterfeited checks, identity theft and use of false identification.

• Blissen Bacala Coelho pleaded guilty to charges stemming from using someone else's Social Security card to open a credit union account, and then using that account for check kiting.

Only a few cases seemed to approach what most people would likely consider as terrorism, and maybe even they lack strong ties.

For example, Juan Carlos Justo-Martinez pleaded guilty to charges of trying to take a box cutter on an airplane and possessing false immigration documents. Court records show he was sentenced to time served and released on the condition that he "shall not illegally re-enter the United States."

Sue-Betty Owens was prosecuted, but had her case dismissed, for supposedly interfering with flight crew members on a SkyWest flight from Salt Lake City to Kalispell, Mont. Indictments said a flight attendant asked her to stow her handbag, but Owens refused and threw the bag at the attendant.

Joshua Lutman, a Starbucks Coffee employee at the airport, pleaded guilty to charges stemming from trying to sneak a friend into restricted areas at the airport through improper use of his identification badge.

Controversy over possible erroneous classification of cases as terrorist-related is nothing new.

DOJ_NMG_0061009

For example, the Philadelphia Inquirer in December 2001 reported that the Justice Department inflated terrorism statistics in annual reports to Congress by including improper cases. It said the Justice Department did that, in part, to justify its budget requests.

Because of criticism from that newspaper story, the Justice Department switched from using FBI data about terrorism-related cases to using data from the offices of U.S. attorneys.

However, a 2003 report by the U.S. General Accountability Office said it still found that about half the supposedly terrorism-related cases that it reviewed had been misclassified by the U.S. attorneys offices and the Justice Department.

That GAO report also concluded that the Justice Department "does not have sufficient management oversight and internal controls in place ... to ensure the accuracy and reliability of its terrorism-related conviction statistics."

University of Utah law professor Wayne McCormack, who teaches a course on law related to terrorism, said he understands why federal officials would treat such crimes as terrorist-related. "There have been many instances," he said, pointing to a cigarette smuggling ring broken up between Virginia and Pennsylvania where the difference in tobacco tax was collected and used to fund Hamas efforts.

"That's the frustration. It could be terrorist-related, but you just don't know," McCormack said. As for the Utah statistics, "It looks pretty fishy."

Share Data -- And Protect Rights (WP)

By Sophie In't Veld

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

In his op-ed of Aug. 29, "A Tool We Need to Stop the Next Airliner Plot," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff claimed that the fight against terrorism is being hampered by European privacy concerns about the U.S. government's use of data collected on airline passengers. This is a very serious allegation that calls for a reaction and some qualification.

Europeans are no less concerned about the threat of terrorism than our American friends, not least since several attacks have occurred on our own continent since Sept. 11, 2001 (Madrid, London, the murder of filmmaker Theo van Gogh in Holland) and many more have been prevented. But we are also very aware that one aim of terrorists is to undermine our democracy, the rule of law and our human rights. We should never grant them the pleasure of achieving that goal.

Many Europeans have only recently acquired freedom and democracy, having lived for decades under authoritarian regimes. Therefore we are extremely aware of how precious democracy is. Due democratic process -- holding the executive to account, maintaining proportionality, transparency, the possibility of judicial review and respect for the rule of law, including international agreements -- is of the essence.

But the first question that must be answered about any anti-terrorism measure is this: Does it help make our world safer? Since Sept. 11 a host of measures have been taken in the fight against terrorism, often in a rush and in a climate of fear. It is high time for an in-depth evaluation of the results: Are the measures effective in terms of increased security? How many bad guys did we catch? How many plots were prevented? How many innocent citizens were held by mistake? Do we need further measures, or can some of them be revoked or adapted?

Asking critical questions, and insisting on proper safeguards and proportionality, are vital parts of the democratic process. Arguing that democracy, the rule of law and civil liberties get in the way of the fight against terrorism is nonsense. On the contrary, they are our best defense against those who want to destroy our society.

No one will deny that data collection and information sharing are necessary in the fight against terrorism. But such measures should not go beyond what's needed to achieve that purpose, and any restriction on the freedom and privacy of citizens must be accompanied by safeguards against mistakes and abuse, and by provision for proper means of redress.

In the case of the European Union-United States Passenger Name Record (PNR) agreement, neither condition has been met. The United States requires 34 items of data from travelers to the United States. E.U. citizens are not covered by American privacy laws, as U.S. citizens are, so they have little protection in this regard. The United States was not willing to make any promises to provide such protection but agreed only to "undertakings" in this area. It's hardly surprising that the European Parliament was not reassured.

It can be done differently, as shown by the PNR agreement between the European Union and Canada. Canada requires only 25 data items, and the protection of personal data that applies to Canadian citizens has been extended to cover E.U. citizens traveling to Canada.

In general, for the purpose of identifying certain individuals, the so-called APIS data (name, passport number, etc.) are sufficient. In practice, the carriers do not provide all 34 items requested by the United States but only the eight to 10 available to them. The need for further data has not been convincingly demonstrated. There may be a case for it, but as I understand democracy, it is up to the authorities to prove they need personal data, not to parliaments or individual citizens to prove that they don't.

A very critical report by the privacy officer of the Department of Homeland Security and an evaluation of the implementation of the E.U.-U.S. agreement show that implementation by the United States has been slow and inadequate. At the time of the evaluation, passengers did not receive any information about the PNR program and their rights. Contrary to what was agreed to, the United States has so far failed to switch from the so-called PULL system (whereby the United States has direct access to the computer systems of the European carriers) to the PUSH system (whereby the carriers forward the data). There are serious questions regarding the use of data for purposes other than the ones agreed on and over the forwarding of data to third parties.

Secretary Chertoff states that the United States does not do ethnic profiling. To my knowledge no Western nation has admitted to ethnic profiling as an official policy, but we all know it happens in practice. So-called "trusted traveler" programs are essentially that. What chance has, say, a 25-year-old man with a beard, wearing a turban or having a Muslim appearance (whatever that may be) of being a "trusted traveler"?

Europeans are eager to work with their American friends and allies to eliminate the scourge of terrorism. But friends and allies work together on the basis of mutual respect, trust and shared values. Issues such as Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, illegal rendition flights and secret detention camps, the SWIFT spying scandal and the unsatisfactory implementation of the PNR agreement have done much harm to the traditional trust between the transatlantic partners. If we want to beat the terrorists, it is essential that trust be restored. That will not be achieved by tough language between the parties but through respect and willingness to seek compromises.

I am convinced that together we can find ways to protect our democracy and freedom while preserving our hard-won civil rights. Only in that scenario do the terrorists lose.

Police On The Lookout For Terrorists With Missiles Near Airports (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Police officer Steven Benner was on patrol in northern Anne Arundel County, driving his unmarked sport-utility vehicle through parking lots, climbing onto rooftops and peering down access roads that wind through wooded areas.

Suddenly, a jetliner screamed a few hundred feet overhead. That Southwest Airlines jet -- and the many other low-flying airliners here -- was the reason he was combing the area. Benner, an officer with the Maryland Transportation Authority Police, was looking for threats from shoulder-fired missiles around Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport.

Benner said he tries to think like a terrorist. He looks for people who seem out of place, such as those parked in restricted areas who might be taking notes or photographs as reconnaissance for an attack. Sometimes he drives off the beaten path to potential launch sites. He knows it wouldn't take much to get off a shot: A missile could be fired from the back of a moving pickup truck.

"They don't do things by the book, so we can't do things by the book," Benner said, adding that he is also on the lookout for people monitoring him. "If we do this randomly and every so often, they are not going to be able to pattern police movements. I like to be a little smarter than them, a little faster than they are."

Since British police said they foiled a plot to blow up airliners over the Atlantic, security authorities have focused on the threat of explosive liquids and gels. But the commercial airline industry faces a variety of threats, including bombs in cargo, hijackings and shoulder-fired missiles.

The U.S. government says shoulder-fired missiles have been used in at least 36 attacks on civilian aircraft in the past three decades, all overseas. Many security experts say the threat of attack in the United States is more remote than in other countries, particularly those in Africa and the Middle East.

Still, the possibility worries police and intelligence officials because many missiles are on the black market and many terrorist groups have them. Authorities estimate that terrorist organizations have several hundred to several thousand shoulder-fired missiles, which can cost as little as $5,000. In a report to Congress last month, the Department of Homeland Security called missile attacks a "real and international concern."

To counter the threat, the U.S. government has spent more than $100 million to develop a reliable anti-missile system to install on commercial planes. The systems, which are mounted underneath aircraft, detect missile launches and then fire laser beams at the weapon to disrupt its guidance system and send it off course. The military already uses such countermeasures on its aircraft.

The government hopes to develop systems that would cost about $1 million each for installation on thousands of jetliners. But widespread deployment of such devices on the U.S. commercial fleet would probably take at least a decade. The Department of Homeland Security is spending an additional $10 million to test different anti-missile systems, some of which could be ground-based, at airports. Most security experts say commercial jets are most vulnerable when landing or taking off because they are going relatively slow and are low to the ground.

In the absence of technological solutions, police have filled the gap. Police at Dulles International Airport and Reagan National Airport conduct patrols, but a spokeswoman declined to discuss security efforts in detail.

Shoulder-fired missiles are small and can fit in a large duffel bag. Some have ranges of up to three miles, and some can reach altitudes of 15,000 feet.

Most departments began the patrols after two missiles barely missed an Israeli jetliner taking off in Kenya in late 2002. A DHL cargo plane was badly damaged after being struck by a missile in Iraq a year later. In response, the U.S. military cleared a large area around Baghdad's airport, and commercial planes have taken the dramatic approach of flying over the airfield at 10,000 feet and then corkscrewing down to the runway to avoid missiles.

Maryland Transportation Authority Police officials have briefed officers on the missiles' range and effectiveness. Each officer has been given photographs of the missiles, which are known in law enforcement circles as "manpads," for man-portable air defense systems.

The photos, which include close-ups of the individual components, are displayed in the department's BWI squad room with a large map that shows "BWI Manpad Sites," nearly a dozen locations that police check at random intervals because they think they would make good launching sites.

The biggest part of the effort focuses on officers such as Benner, who on a recent afternoon spent 90 minutes checking the perimeter of the airport. He inspected the Amtrak train station for explosives and drove through parking garages to ensure that no terrorists were hiding there. He also checked school and business parking lots.

He has never confronted anyone suspected of being terrorist, but he has kicked out people picnicking in restricted areas and questioned aviation enthusiasts who gather at airports and take notes on the comings and goings of planes.

Gary W. McLhinney, chief of the Maryland Transportation Authority Police, said the patrols are one of the oldest and best tools he has to combat a potential attack. "The patrols are an important and an effective use of our resources," McLhinney said. "This is such an important issue."

Airport police have expanded their anti-missile networks by reaching out to other law enforcement organizations that patrol potential launch sites. The U.S. Park Police, which monitors many of the parks and roads along the Potomac River, has stepped up patrols because of the threat posed to planes heading to and from National Airport.

Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford said the department has trained maintenance crews and park service employees to recognize those who may be attempting to launch a missile and those who may be scouting for an attack. "We have to be constantly vigilant," Pettiford said.

Police officials said they work closely with the Transportation Security Administration and the FBI to learn about threats.

DOJ_NMG_0061012

When the TSA was created after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, security officials reached out to community associations to enlist the help of neighborhood watch groups. Scott McHugh said he pushed for such community briefings when he was the federal security director at Dulles in 2002 and 2003. He and other former federal security directors say the community meetings have dwindled and occur at only a few airports. He said TSA officials have failed to implement policies that could effectively counter the threat.

TSA spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said in an e-mail that security officials meet with community and business groups and that they work closely with local police and federal law enforcement on the issue of shoulder-fired missiles.

New York Muslims Beset By Suspicion (FT)

By Jonathan Birchall And Joshua Chaffin In New York

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

The Muslim owner of the Dar-us-Salaam store on Atlantic Avenue in Brooklyn was polite, but he didn't want to talk.

At the Firdous cosmetics shop next door, a bearded young Moroccan was equally wary, when asked how things had changed for the city's Muslims since the September 11 terror attacks.

"We get so many people coming and asking questions about this. My boss says it's best to say nothing. We just want to move on," he explains.

Five years after the attacks, the mood on Atlantic Avenue is guarded. New York survived the aftermath of the attacks without any major outbreaks of violence against Muslims or Arabs. But on Atlantic Avenue, and in Bay Ridge and Bensonhurst and Sunnyside, things are not as they were.

Said Mahmoud, who operates a cart selling coffee, doughnuts and bagels in midtown Manhattan, says that following the attacks he was shocked to hear construction workers telling their friends waiting at his cart not to give their business to an Arab. "We were lucky we were not in some other country, where maybe they kill you," he says.

New York's Muslim community numbers about 600,000. The number of mosques in the city has grown from half a dozen in the early 1970s to more than 140. But after being shaken by the widespread detentions of suspected illegal immigrants that followed the 9/11 attacks, recent events have highlighted tensions.

In July, a New York court found Shahawar Matin Siraj, a 23-year old Pakistani immigrant, guilty of conspiring to blow up the city's Herald Square subway station, one of the city's busiest.

The Siraj case underlined the level of monitoring of some sections of the city's Muslims. Charges were brought against Siraj after a police informer began operating in his mosque.

"Muslims now see themselves as being put in this category of suspicion," says Louis Cristillo, who heads a Columbia University teaching college project on issues affecting Muslim youth in New York. "There is de facto racial profiling in airports and public transportation."

He says there are also claims of scores of lower level racist incidents, such as children being teased or beaten up at school, or of girls having head scarves ripped off.

More optimistically, he argues the city's Muslim community is more integrated than immigrant Muslim communities in the UK, France and Germany. "Once you're naturalised in the US, you have the same rights as everyone else," he says.

But Mr Mahmoud, in midtown Manhattan, finds a bitter irony for Arab Americans. "Many people came here in the spirit they did not like the things their own governments did, and they wanted freedom. And now, when they see things like detentions without trial, what must their feelings be?"

KC Man Linked To Early Al-Qaida (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 9, 2006

Did a Kansas City college student help Osama bin Laden start al-Qaida?

Federal law enforcement officials think he did. So do private-sector experts on international terrorism.

Now, a new book that chronicles the history of al-Qaida portrays former Kansas City resident Mohammed Loay Baizid as a confidant of bin Laden in the early years of the terrorist organization.

While The Looming Tower: Al-Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, by Lawrence Wright, a staff writer at The New Yorker magazine, provides Baizid's firsthand account of his association with bin Laden, the former Kansas City resident's activities already have been extensively documented in federal court transcripts and law enforcement documents. He even was mentioned in the 9/11 commission report.

"He was one of the guys there when it all got started," said John Lumpkin, a senior fellow at GlobalSecurity.org, an Alexandria, Va.-based defense-policy research firm and clearinghouse of military information. "He definitely was a major figure."

Jack Cloonan, who as an FBI agent questioned Baizid with the cooperation of Sudanese authorities shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, said he had seen a list of original al-Qaida members.

"His name is on it," Cloonan said of Baizid. Cloonan now is president of a private security firm, Clayton Consultants.

Baizid has denied that and said he was not present at the meeting that many consider the birth of al-Qaida.

Although many think Baizid was an integral part of al-Qaida's early days, his role in the organization as it evolved into a worldwide terrorist organization is less clear. His name has come up in the trials of terrorism figures, but he apparently has never faced charges himself.

Wright and others think Baizid long ago cut his ties to bin Laden and al-Qaida.

Cloonan said he and other FBI agents came to Kansas City in 1998 to investigate Baizid's background. After the Sept. 11 attacks, Cloonan was part of a joint FBI-CIA team that went to Khartoum, Sudan, to interview people with connections to al-Qaida, including Baizid.

"We really don't know the full length and breadth of his involvement," Cloonan said.

Galvanized by call

According to Wright, Baizid was 24 in 1985 when he answered the call to jihad and traveled from Kansas City to Pakistan and later Afghanistan to fight the Russians. Wright spent five years researching his book and met Baizid in 2003 in Khartoum.

Baizid's family immigrated from Syria when he was a teenager and in Wright's book, Baizid is quoted as saying that he was a "typical young middle-class American man" when he read a tract by Abdullah Azzam, who has been described as one of bin Laden's main spiritual influences.

In the tract, Azzam called on Muslims to rally together to aid Afghanistan in its fight with the Soviet Union.

Baizid declined to be interviewed by The Kansas City Star, but Wright told The Star that in interviews the former Kansas City resident said he was seeking adventure and became "galvanized" by Azzam's call.

Baizid only intended to stay a short time, but after flying to Pakistan, he called a telephone number that was printed on the tract he had read and Azzam answered the phone. Bazid said he did not know what he would have done otherwise.

In Pakistan, Baizid met Azzam, bin Laden and other Arab volunteers in the fight against the Soviets. He adopted the name Abu Rida al-Suri.

"I went to Afghanistan with a blank mind and a good heart," Baizid is quoted in the book as saying. "Everything was totally strange. It was like I was born just now, like I was an infant, and I have to learn everything new. It was not so easy after that to leave and go back to your regular life."

That regular life included studying engineering at the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

Baizid was enrolled at UMKC from August 1982 to May 1984, according to university records that do not reflect whether he obtained a degree. A university spokesman said privacy laws did not permit the release of grade information or the names of professors Baizid studied under.

An acquaintance of Baizid's in Kansas City in the early 1980s, also an immigrant from Syria, recalled an easygoing young man who enjoyed playing cards with friends and walking on the Country Club Plaza and who was always quick with a joke.

"He always liked to tease and try to be funny," said the man, who asked that his name not be used for fear that it might hurt his business.

In the next decade, Baizid allegedly became a business adviser and fundraiser for al-Qaida, according to extensive sworn testimony and documents from federal investigators and terrorism experts filed in federal courts in Chicago and New York during terrorism trials. Lorenzo Vidino, a terrorism analyst for the Investigative Project, a Washington-based counterterrorism research and investigative center that was founded in 1995, said Baizid's role in the formation of al-Qaida and its later fundraising efforts in the United States, cannot be overemphasized.

"It's no exaggeration to say he was one of the four or five founding members," said Vidino, co-author of the book Al Qaeda in Europe: The New Battleground of International Jihad.

Members of Baizid's family, including his uncle Adnan Bayazid, who lives in the Kansas City area, declined requests to comment.

But Adnan Bayazid told U.S. News & World Report in a 2002 article about American jihadists that his nephew had helped buy supplies for Afghans fighting the Soviets and had since grown disillusioned with bin Laden. He also suggested that another person with a similar name may be responsible for some of the things attributed to his nephew.

Bayazid also mentioned his nephew's connection to bin Laden in the 1980s and '90s in an article in the Kansas City Jewish Chronicle.

Mohammed Baizid allegedly was still in Pakistan in 1988 when a pivotal event in the history of al-Qaida occurred. At a meeting of bin Laden and a handful of others, plans were discussed to organize the group that would become al-Qaida. Wright said that Baizid denied he was present, but the handwritten notes of that meeting were made by Baizid, according to later federal court testimony and documents prepared by the U.S. Justice Department.

In the early 1990s, bin Laden relocated to Sudan, and Baizid went with him.

In Wright's book, Baizid is described as bin Laden's "main business adviser" for various enterprises in Sudan.

By 1994, Baizid was back in the United States. He obtained an Illinois driver's license and allegedly became a leader of the Chicago-based Benevolence International Foundation, a purported charitable organization. Federal authorities later shut down the group for allegedly funneling money to al-Qaida. Its director pleaded guilty to a charge of racketeering.

In documents later seized by authorities, Baizid is referred to as being president of the foundation at one time.

Vidino said the group functioned as one of the main Al-Qaeda fundraising groups in the United States.

Baizid's first known contact with U.S. law enforcement came in what Vidino called a "mysterious story" that unfolded Dec. 16, 1994, in California.

According to trial testimony and court documents, Baizid was with bin Laden's brother-in-law, who was detained after arriving in San Francisco on a flight from the Philippines.

But Baizid was released, and Vidino said he has never been able to determine the reason or where he went after that.

Wright said that Baizid has a comfortable life in Sudan and operates several businesses.

"I know he would like to come back to Kansas City," Wright said. "He's bored and frustrated in Khartoum."

But Baizid is afraid that U.S. authorities will arrest him, even though Wright said law enforcement officials have told him that Baizid is not facing any charges.

"I think he's harmless and should be allowed to come back," Wright said.

Paulson Sizes Up Wall St Disaster Defences (FT)

By David Wighton And Paul Taylor In New York

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Concerns about Wall Street's ability to withstand a terrorist attack, natural disaster or flu pandemic have prompted Hank Paulson, the new US Treasury secretary, to review the financial market's disaster-planning.

In one of his first acts in the post, the former Goldman Sachs chief executive has asked the president's working group on financial markets to assess the improvements made since September 11 2001. This comes amid continued Wall Street concerns – five years after the World Trade Center attacks – about the resilience of power and telecommunications services.

September 11 exposed weaknesses in the industry's disaster planning and closed the equity market for four days.

Experts say financial services companies in New York and London have improved the resilience of their operations. But some senior Wall Street figures are concerned that the utilities, on which the financial markets depend, have made less progress. There is also greater focus on the impact of a flu pandemic.

DOJ_NMG_0061015

Scott Parsons, US deputy assistant Treasury secretary, said the utilities had made "tremendous improvements" but added: "We remain concerned about how to provide better resilience in telecommunications, which is the financial sector's single biggest dependency."

Wall Street firms blamed many of their problems in 2001 on the damage to one of Verizon Communications' five switching centres in lower Manhattan.

Some Wall Street disaster planners believe more pressure needs to be put on the utilities by their regulators. They are encouraged by the early interest taken by Mr Paulson, who was involved in the issue at Goldman Sachs.

Recently, many financial services companies and regulators have focused on their ability to operate in the event of a flu pandemic when many staff would want to work from home.

Anxiety Remains On Wall St Disaster Planning (FT)

By David Wighton, Deborah Brewster, Paul Taylor And Anuj Gangahar

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

When Dick Grasso, the then chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, reopened trading on September 17 2001, it was a symbol of Wall Street's resilience in the face of terrorism.

But the four-day closure of the exchange also underlined the serious disruption caused by the attacks on the World Trade Center, due partly to flaws in Wall Street's disaster planning.

Five years and billions of dollars of investment later, many of those flaws have been addressed and there is little doubt that financial markets in New York – and in other leading financial centres – would now be more resilient in the event of a similar disaster.

But concerns remain, not least about the key utilities on which the financial services sector depends and the industry's ability to handle other sorts of threat, such as a flu pandemic.

Scott Parsons, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for critical infrastructure, says the most basic lesson learned from September 11 was the need for back-up facilities far enough away from a main site.

Most companies' contingency plans had focused on localised potential problems. "Some firms had their back-up in the basement of their buildings or right across the street," says Mr Parsons. As a result, some lost access to both their primary and back-up facilities.

"Institutions also generally had not considered the possibility that transportation of personnel could be significantly disrupted and preclude the relocation of staff to alternate sites," said a 2002 report by the Federal Reserve and other regulators.

The regulators subsequently introduced new guidelines on back-up facilities and many companies have invested heavily in new operations.

The Bank of New York, for example, has built two identical data centres, one 40 miles from its 1 Wall Street headquarters and one – completed just six months ago – 750 miles away. A leading clearer of bond trades, BoNY was badly disrupted by the September 11 attack.

"Each is a replica, just waiting for the other to fail," says Don Monks, BoNY's vice-chairman.

Many financial services companies in London have made similar moves and the UK Financial Services Authority said in a study in December that most companies now had "highly resilient" IT systems and could continue normal operations within a day of a disaster.

According to Gregory Ferris, chairman of the Securities Industry Association business continuity committee, another key lesson of September 11 was the need for better communication within the industry during a crisis. The SIA and other industry bodies set up a command centre to improve co-ordination. "Recovery efforts following the 2003 New York City blackout and other events, such as the 2005 transit strike and national immigration rallies, were more effective because this structure was in place," he told a congressional committee in June.

Another area of focus has been collaborative testing, such as a big exercise for the New York securities markets set for October 14, says Anna Ewing, chief information officer of the Nasdaq stock market. "These tests are now much more intensive and are really aimed at ensuring that transactions can still get done in the event of a crisis."

Banks and securities firms are also paying greater attention to their power and telecommunications systems. Much of the disruption caused by September 11 was the result of problems with utilities, which proved unexpectedly vulnerable.

"We didn't know how much of the telecoms infrastructure was concentrated in seven buildings in downtown Manhattan . . . and the main unit needed to operate for the other six to operate," recalls Mr Monks. BoNY now demands much more information from its suppliers and has also leased five fibre optic cables to connect its data centres.

Verizon Communication says it has further decentralised the infrastructure that supports Wall Street and made it easier to re-route voice and data traffic in a crisis. It has also installed another 40 miles of fibre optic cabling in lower Manhattan, much of it configured in "self-healing" rings.

But some senior Wall Street operations executives believe infrastructure suppliers have not faced as much pressure from their regulators to increase resilience.

Telecommunications is also a concern for many financial services companies as they draw up plans to deal with a possible pandemic. The assumption is that following an outbreak large numbers of employees will stay at home and companies are investigating how much of their operations could be done from home.

9/11 Has Spurred Only Modest Changes In New York City And National Building Codes (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

The destruction of the World Trade Center produced calls for a wholesale re-evaluation of the way tall buildings are designed and built, but five years later, the changes to New York City's building code, and others across the nation, have been few and modest.

Skip to next paragraph

Related Twin Beams to Light Sky Again. But After 2008? (September 9, 2006)

Recommendations from a major federal investigation into the collapse are still being debated and may yet result in modifications to a national building code that the city plans to adopt. So far, though, 9/11 has not been a turning point for code revision, in the way past disasters were — like the Triangle Shirtwaist fire of 1911.

In New York, some suggestions have been quietly shelved. Proposals for more and wider stairwells in skyscrapers, for example, were set aside in part because the real estate industry felt threatened by the loss of rentable space.

Other ideas, like hardening building components to withstand major fires, are mired in technical debates among engineers that could take years to resolve.

To some critics, the pace of revisions is evidence that the sense of urgency aroused by the attacks has faded. Others argue that the attacks were so extraordinary an event that they cannot be the basis for sweeping changes in the way skyscrapers are designed and built.

"No building is safe from everything," said Patricia J. Lancaster, an architect who has been the commissioner of the city's Department of Buildings since 2002. "It's up to the owners to assess how much risk their building, their piece of land, their edifice, is at. There's no one answer to the question of what you should do. That's why not everything is mandated in the building code. If you mandate too much, then we'll be building concrete bunkers."

Developers of some planned buildings, like the Freedom Tower at ground zero and the Bank of America tower in Midtown, are voluntarily meeting higher standards than those required by the code, in part because anxious tenants now seek them. It is unclear, however, whether such efforts will continue as market conditions evolve.

Ms. Lancaster has overseen two major responses to 9/11 that are expected to change the city's building code for the first time since 1968.

The first was to convene a task force that made 21 recommendations for immediate changes in the city's code in response to the disaster. The second was to support the gradual adoption of standard building, electrical, plumbing and fire-safety codes used by most states and cities in the United States; this would be a major change for the city, which has long insisted on setting its own standards.

Both studies reflect a desire to learn from 9/11.

The planes that day severed five of the six stairwells in the twin towers, fatally trapping as many as 1,500 people on the upper floors. Analysts have said many more might have escaped if there had been more stairwells and if they had been made of reinforced concrete rather than lightweight gypsum board.

The New York City building code currently requires only three stairwells in a tall building, regardless of whether it is 10 or 100 stories. Federal investigators have said that, given the size and number of the stairwells, the evacuation would have been much slower and many more people would have died if the towers had been fully occupied that day. A former director of the World Trade Center told the 9/11 Commission in 2004 that stairwells needed to be wider to speed up evacuations.

Changing the code's provisions for stairwells was not one of the things recommended by the task force of industry representatives, engineers, city officials, and fire-safety experts, but city officials point out with some pride that a majority of the 21 recommendations did become law in 2004. Among the new requirements: all high-rise commercial buildings over 100 feet must have sprinkler systems installed within 15 years; exit paths, doors and stairs must be marked with glow-in-the-dark materials; and buildings have to maintain plans to evacuate occupants in all kinds of emergencies, not just fires.

The task force decided against requiring more and wider stairwells and instead backed encouraging the change. It asked the Department of City Planning to encourage developers to build more and wider stairwells by excluding stairwells when the city calculates how big a building can be.

The proposal would have removed a disincentive against adding stairwells, since developers want to maximize every inch of rentable space. But it would also have meant taller buildings. City planners rejected the idea, and it has not been revived.

But After 2008? Asked why the task force did not simply recommend requiring more stairwells, Ms. Lancaster said, "We were not successful in gaining consensus on that issue." She added, "If you increase a stairwell by one inch at the top of a 90-story building, you are giving up dozens and dozens of square feet of rentable space."

Similarly, the task force agreed to encourage but not require the use of impact-resistant materials for elevator and stairwell enclosures. Ms. Lancaster said the group recognized that the gypsum board used to enclose the trade center stairwells was inadequate, but that it would not have been appropriate to specify a harder material, like cinder block. "We can't show favoritism," she said, adding that several other materials were just as durable.

Glenn P. Corbett, an assistant professor of fire science at John Jay College of Criminal Justice, said the city was too lenient in giving owners 15 years to install sprinklers. "Ten years, in my opinion, was plenty of time to do it," he said.

Ms. Lancaster, however, described the changes as significant, hard-won concessions given the expense of improvements like sprinklers and the political clout of the real estate industry. "I think it's a miracle we got this passed at all, frankly," she said of the sprinkler change.

"The real estate industry was pretty darn good about stepping up to the plate and going along with this stuff," she said. "They were sobered, as were the rest of us, after 9/11. When they became convinced that this would really help people in an extreme event, they adopted it. It's really pretty striking. Those guys have big bucks."

Marolyn Davenport, a vice president at the Real Estate Board of New York and a member of the task force, said the code revisions were a compromise among competing interests, and the code itself only a baseline standard. Many developers of tall buildings were voluntarily surpassing it, she said. "That's true of anything being built in a prime location in Manhattan," she said.

For example, many features of the 54-story Bank of America tower, now under construction at 42nd Street and Avenue of the Americas, will reflect the concerns of a post-9/11 world: bollards to block bombs, shatterproof glass, extra-thick steel and wider staircases encased in thick concrete. Many were not required under the code but were sought by the bank, as anchor tenant, or the developer, the Durst Organization.

Burdensome restrictions would make construction too expensive, Ms. Davenport said. "While you want to incorporate safety features, at the same time we have to compete with the surrounding areas," she said.

The second prong of the city's response has been to wait for changes in model codes that are supposed to result from a $16 million study by the National Institute of Standards and Technology. The 10,000-page study, released last October, concluded that design flaws did not cause the collapse of the towers, but that there were significant ways to improve the durability of skyscrapers and the ease of evacuations.

Some federal, state and local lawmakers and many engineers have criticized the study's recommendations as too vague and said they did not provide enough guidance for code revisions.

David Scott of Arup, an engineering firm in New York City, who is chairman of the Council on Tall Buildings and Urban Habitat, an international nonprofit professional organization, said, "A lot of people were disappointed by the NIST report because it was a bit vague and didn't tell people what to do, and didn't do the research to back up what it did tell people to do."

S. Shyam Sunder, the lead investigator for the federal study, said it was not his team's job to rewrite the code. "It was part of our design to be performance-oriented in our specifications," he said. "We felt the private sector and code organizations were the most qualified to translate performance recommendations into specific code language."

That process will move forward this month with hearings in Florida, where a panel of experts will review whether 19 of the recommendations should result in changes to the International Building Code, the model code used by most states and cities.

The recommendations address issues like preventing a total collapse when part of a building is damaged by fire or other calamity; the use of spray-on fireproofing; the reliability of automatic sprinklers; the use of elevators by rescue workers and people fleeing; the durability, width and number of stairwells; the marking of exit paths; and the storage of fuel oil. The recommendations will be voted on in March.

Sally Regenhard, the co-chairwoman of the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, which lobbies for more stringent building codes, said she was disappointed by the slow progress. "It's hard for me to tell you what tangibly has changed," said Ms. Regenhard, whose son, Christian, a probationary firefighter, died on 9/11. "All we have is a lot of recommendations."

Dr. Sunder said he believed that the recommendations would get into the national codes, eventually. Others are less optimistic.

"Shyam is an incredibly capable, smart guy who led an impressive group of people to put this thing together," said Guy Nordenson, who runs a structural engineering firm in New York and teaches at Princeton. "The problem is, their process didn't lead to a wider consensus-building that would allow these recommendations to get implemented."

Jon D. Magnusson, a principal in Magnusson Klemencic Associates, a structural engineering firm in Seattle, said the institute's recommendations, if adopted, would only provide a false sense of security. "None of the proposals, had they been previously a part of the code, would have changed the outcome in the events of 9/11 or at Oklahoma City," he said. "You simply cannot out-build determined terrorists."

After Attacks Changed The World, The Recovery Changed A City (WP)

By Michael Powell And Michelle Garcã-a

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

NEW YORK -- You're sitting in the center of the fabulousness. The stinky old Fulton Fish Market is gone, and cobblestone streets are lined with boutiques and $1 million condos with floor-to-ceiling windows, and the sky is that razor blue.

Almost like that day.

Five years ago, this neighborhood in downtown Manhattan, a few blocks from the twin towers, was covered in half a foot of gray ash. Now, Jason Lowney, 28, and Patrick Darragh, 24, down drinks and talk that emphatic guy talk, and Sept. 11 feels pretty distant.

"People thought downtown would be a ghost town," says Lowney, a husky and dark-haired insurance adjuster. "I think it's stronger ."

Darragh nods. Then he lets slip that his uncle was on the 80th floor of the South Tower and died that day. Darragh wanted to migrate here after college.

"It was like a defensive thing," he says. "You even saw it immediately afterward. . . . New Yorkers never had any apprehension."

Some days the hole in the heart of this city appears healed over. The braggadocio is back and the jackhammers rattle near Ground Zero. The scar that is the 16-acre hole is still there, a monument to political paralysis. But a forest of blue condominium towers rises, Hermes and Tiffany are opening shops downtown, Goldman Sachs is throwing up a 43-story office tower, and those Viking-stoved, Jacuzzi-ed lofts still attract high-roller bid-a-thons.

DOJ_NMG_0061019

More than 5,800 apartments have been built in Lower Manhattan since 2001, and the median residential sales price has jumped 75 percent. Big corporations -- the Bank of New York, Goldman and Moody's Investors Service -- are building millions of square feet of new office space.

"The luxury stores are moving in, and with luck we'll soon . . . start building at Ground Zero," said Kathryn Wylde, president of the Partnership for New York City, which represents the city's largest businesses. "A lot of major corporations have committed to staying in place, and that wasn't at all clear in 2001."

So if you measure health by beautiful offices and million-dollar lofts -- and what upper-middle-class New Yorker hasn't these past five years? -- you might conclude that all's swell.

Then you walk to the corner of Barclay and Church streets, where five years ago a cluster of cops and waiters and reporters watched the city's biggest tower fall out of the sky. No one moved, it wasn't real -- and then everyone ran as 30-story clouds of ugly gray smoke and dust and biomass rocketed up Church.

Nearby there is an outdoor exhibit of photos of Ground Zero, beautiful photos of women in tears and St. Paul's Chapel, spire lost in that cloud of dust, and firefighters huddled in the darkness around the remains of one of their own. A sturdy cop looks at the photos and wipes at his eyes.

Congenitally contentious, Bill Dobbs is a war opponent, a fighter for gay rights and a tilter at windmills. He might be expected to cast a querulous eye at the memory of the twin towers, those monuments to David Rockefeller's capitalist vision. But he is also a New York chauvinist, and he admired the towers' brassy size and yearns for something like them to rise again.

"I loved those towers -- when the other buildings quit, those two just kept going," he says. "Look across the harbor from Staten Island -- God, it's horrible to see our skyline now."

Then there is the air. So many firefighters and police officers and paramedics and construction workers and good Samaritans pawed through the wreckage and tended to the rescuers and vacuumed out the high-rises that still stood. Andrziy Nereci remembers feeling like a hero. On the edge of Freedom Plaza, on the south end of Ground Zero, this Polish man with a bushy blonde mustache points to the skyscrapers he wiped clean of toxic dust: the Verizon building and Bank of America. He was handed a flimsy paper mask, he knew it wasn't enough.

"I risked my life and health," he said. "When we went to the 15th floor, the building could have fallen down; we didn't know."

Now he and thousands wheeze and cough. Mount Sinai Medical Center studied 9,500 people who helped at Ground Zero and other sites, and concluded in a report released this week that seven of 10 suffer from chronic lung illness contracted while breathing the post-9/11 air. This is the same air that the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency proclaimed safe. Federal officials also suspended workplace safety regulations for the cleanup sites.

Nereci overstayed his visa; he is not a legal immigrant. City and state officials have resisted paying lots of health bills for workers, but he is the lowest of the low. "In some sense, I regret it," he says. "If I had not worked there, I'd have a life."

Post-2001 New York has not been terribly kind to the $51,000-median-family-income New Yorker. In the first months, city and state officials held "listening sessions," and there was talk of parks and affordable housing.

Plans for parks remain, but it would take a microscope to find affordable housing in downtown Manhattan. Out of $2 billion in federal aid expended at in the neighborhoods around Ground Zero, officials have created 77 units of subsidized housing.

By contrast, bonds issued for redevelopment went to 13 new luxury residential buildings with 4,468 market-rate units, including one that was in the works before the attacks. The state also handed out $539 million in business-recovery grants. Hundreds of millions went to large corporations. Exactly $62 million went to owners of small shops and food stores.

Bettina Damiani lives in Brooklyn and keeps a sharp eye on downtown Manhattan for Good Jobs New York, which has scrutinized the spending. She sees an age-old New York story playing out. "Well, we certainly reinforced the status quo, which is that if the real estate industry is doing well, by golly, we all are," she said. "Here's my motto for downtown: Bring free-market capitalism back to Lower Manhattan."

Less clear is what the years since have done to the ephemera that make up a city's soul. Sarah Fisch is a classic New Yorker, in that she arrived in 2000 from somewhere else -- Texas, in her case -- and is pretty intense about her new home. After the attacks, her little subculture of poets and performance artists flowered.

"They were chomping at the bit," she said. "People performed out of a need to escape and wanting to connect with one another."

Then rents rose so high in Lower Manhattan, the tiny theaters and poetry clubs shuttered. People began to move, to Seattle, Yonkers, wherever. Fisch was broke and sick, and she saw the makeshift memorials in Union Square every day as she walked to one temporary job or another.

"It made me think I'm cannon fodder. I'm the girl in the office while everyone else is out having corporate breakfast," she says.

This autumn she began her second semester of classes. No more starving artist; she wants a PhD so she can get a steady teaching job. She too is the determined face of post-9/11 New York.

Business As Usual Economic Fears After 9/11 Proved Mostly Unfounded (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath And Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

After terrorists attacked the U.S. five years ago, many worried that the economy would lose its hard-won vitality. Companies would need to hire security staff instead of production workers, build up costly inventories and face delays as goods moved across tightened borders.

This is what has happened instead: The number of security guards on business and government payrolls has declined, companies are holding less inventory, and the amount of freight moving though the nation's ports has soared. Not only has the economy grown, it has become more efficient. And office construction in downtown New York and Washington has continued.

Despite fears in 2001 that the terrorism threat would impose a great expense on the nation's business and weigh on the economy, "there is nothing like that showing up," said Bart Hobijn, an economist with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York who has examined security-related spending.

Michael O'Hanlon, a security expert at the Brookings Institution, said that "in the private sector, all that's generally been done is a few more security cameras and guards at the most vulnerable of sites: some skyscrapers, some chemical plants." He added, in an email exchange: "Any one owner of any facility is very unlikely to be attacked, yet quite likely to suffer competitively if he [or] she pays the price for more protection and no one else in the same economic sector does the same."

Several forces are behind the surprising turn. In 2001, years of heavy spending on technology had already begun paying dividends for many companies, permitting them to become more efficient even as they had to divert some resources to security. Massive government stimulus -- hastened by an economic downturn that was in place before the attacks -- helped the economy crawl out of its slump and get on a sustainable growth path. The medicine included steep interest-rate reductions, tax cuts, emergency spending increases and a federal backstop for terrorism insurance -- meaning the U.S. would front part of insurers' losses in the event of a major attack. Meanwhile, crime rates were falling, reducing security needs in some places even as fears of domestic terror rose.

The Sept. 11 attacks did have a major short-term impact on the economy, especially certain sectors, such as airlines and autos. In the case of cars, for example, the Big Three U.S. makers rushed to clear inventories by rolling out zero-percent financing.

And there are other costs to the struggle against terrorism ignited by 9/11, such as the higher price of oil because of supply disruptions and the fear of them -- the so-called terror premium. Then there are the costs that all but defy accounting: the value of lives lost, of individuals injured in battles overseas, of economic opportunities lost by military reservists who are serving abroad.

Earlier this year, Joseph Stiglitz, a former Clinton administration economist and a Nobel prize-winner, and Linda Bilmes, a Harvard professor, took a broad approach to accounting for the Iraq war, including valuations for lives lost and individuals injured, and attached a price tag of up to $2 trillion.

In a narrower look at the post-9/11 costs, Mr. Hobijn of the New York Fed estimates last year's U.S. public and private-sector spending on domestic security at $90 billion, covering everything from guards in city office buildings to federal grants for ports to install surveillance gear. The figure is a little more than $30 billion greater than annual spending on domestic security before the attacks. That's a substantial rise, yet considering that the giant U.S. economy churns out more than $13 trillion of goods and services a year, it's little more than a rounding error.

Whether the nation is more secure today is a different matter, and one that is much harder to measure. It is possible that a five-year stretch without an attack at home has lulled business leaders and politicians into complacency about the threat, and they aren't spending enough on security.

It also isn't clear whether the federal government, which has borne most of the cost of increased security spending, has set the right priorities. Federal spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, which isn't counted in Mr. Hobijn's estimate of domestic-security spending, is $120 billion in this fiscal year alone, the Congressional Budget Office calculates. That dwarfs what is spent to protect buildings, ports and borders. It also creates large chunks of deferred expense in the form of national debt.

At one company in Rockford, Ill., the effect of the terrorist attacks is close to imperceptible. "Security, as far as 9/11, hasn't really impacted us that much here," says Greg Bubp, chief financial officer of Eclipse Inc., a private manufacturer of industrial heating equipment. Rockford is about 90 miles northwest of Chicago. Mr. Bubp says that, being that far from a major city, he hasn't felt the need to step up security measures at Eclipse's facilities in the U.S. or abroad. "It's something that we need to be aware of, but we're not necessarily in hot spots," he says.

Instead, he has been focused on running his business more efficiently. By working more closely with suppliers, the company has been able to reduce the amount of inventory it keeps on hand at plants from about 100 days' worth of sales to about 80 days' worth since 2001.

U.S. businesses, on average, held inventories equal to a bit more than 43 days' worth of sales in mid-2001, just before the terrorist attacks. If businesses had decided to build up stocks as a buffer against supply disruptions, the ratio of inventories to sales would have risen. Instead, it fell to under 38 days by mid-2006, as companies used new technology and new business practices to hold less on their shelves for every dollar of sales.

Executives at many companies say security is an important issue and a significant budget item. The Business Roundtable, an association of chief executives from the nation's largest companies, created a task force to address security issues right after 9/11, establishing, among other things, a hotline with the White House for crises.

In a just-completed survey of chief financial officers at 434 U.S. companies, 42.4% said they had increased planning for business disruptions since 2001. In the survey, conducted for The Wall Street Journal by Duke University and CFO Magazine, 21.4% said they were paying more for insurance against terror and business disruptions.

But the executives also said that terrorism ranked near the bottom among today's worries. And hard evidence of a pickup in private-sector security spending is spotty.

Insurers take in several billion dollars a year in U.S. terrorism-insurance premiums, estimates Robert Hartwig, chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. Before 9/11, terrorism coverage was included in standard policies. For U.S. businesses, the cost today likely isn't a heavy burden -- it's roughly equal to what they pay to insure their directors and officers against personal losses for the actions they take in their posts.

Moreover, after five years with no new U.S. attack, the cost of terrorism insurance recently has been dropping. The median price of it fell 25% last year from 2004, according to a study by Marsh Inc., the insurance-brokerage unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos.

Spending on private-sector security services such as alarm monitoring systems and guard services was already growing briskly before 9/11, and continued doing so afterward. Yet the pace of its growth slowed slightly, according to data from Freedonia Group Inc., a market-research firm. It says such spending grew at a 6.8% annual rate between 2000 and 2005, down from a 7.1% pace in the second half of the 1990s. In all, the private sector spent about $39 billion on security services last year, vs. about $28 billion in 2000, the firm says.

Freedonia sees the growth in this spending easing off to a 4.3% annual rate in the second half of this decade, largely because of reduced crime rates. However, Mark Visbal, director of research at the Security Industry Association, sees robust growth in spending on equipment like closed-circuit television.

While the economy has largely shrugged off the effects of 9/11 and the terrorism threat's security demands, it is possible that strains will show up gradually over time. Bernard Groseclose, for one, says he is starting to feel them.

DOJ_NMG_0061022

He is the chief executive of South Carolina State Ports Authority. Its Charleston hub is among the 10 most active ports in the nation, managing traffic last year that was equivalent of two million 20-foot containers. So far, Mr. Groseclose says, his ports have managed to sustain their efficiency through five years of beefing up security.

Truckers had worried that installation of tall radiation monitors, which scan trucks as they leave ports, would slow traffic in and out. But Mr. Groseclose says the turnaround time for trucks has held steady at a little more than 20 minutes since the monitors were installed.

However, he complains that his operation has been forced to fund security spending on a closed-circuit television system, fencing and a beefed-up police force after the federal government failed to provide grants to cover all the required new security. The ports authority imposes security surcharges of $2 per container, something it didn't do before 9/11. And this fee will soon rise to $4.

One result of having to bear security costs is that the port has put off needed investment to expand its bustling facilities. "There has been no follow-through from a [federal] funding standpoint," Mr. Groseclose says. "I think that is a real problem.... There is not a lot of spending on expansion projects going on right now and security is one reason. "Mark Zandi, of Economy.com, is concerned about the long-term effects of the broader struggle to combat terrorism. Counting the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, he estimates the U.S. government has poured nearly half a trillion dollars into the effort since 2001, increasing federal debt to fund the effort. "In any given year it is not significant, it is not awe-inspiring," Mr. Zandi says. "Over a long period of time, the dollars add up."

Early Accounting For 9/11 Aftermath Despite Dire Forebodings, Stocks, Productivity Are Up, But Final Reckoning Awaits (WSJ)

By Edward Chancellor, David Vise And Rob Cox

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Stocks fell by 11% in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. At the time, many anticipated dire economic consequences. Fears of financial Armageddon turned out to be exaggerated. Five years later, stocks are up by a third from shortly after the markets reopened. However, it's too early to draw up a final reckoning for that terrible day.

In the months before September 2001, the economy was suffering from the collapse of the tech-stock bubble. The response to the attacks probably sped up its recovery. The Fed accelerated its program of rate cuts, and the government loosened the purse strings. Consumers went on a patriotic spending spree. In the month after 9/11, car sales jumped an extraordinary 26%.

Measured in terms of economic activity, the impact was far less severe than Hurricane Katrina, according to research firm Global Insight. Nor has the "clash of civilizations" arrested the process of global integration, as many feared at the time. Instead, the pace of world trade has picked up. Despite rising tensions in the Mideast, the flow of petrodollars from the Gulf is unabated.

The "War on Terror" that followed 9/11 has boosted U.S. military and security expenditures. Yet foreign loans have enabled Americans to have more guns without skimping on the butter. Economists would normally expect the expansion of such essentially nonproductive activity to have a harmful effect on overall economic efficiency. That hasn't happened. It turns out that average productivity growth over the past five years has actually been greater than during the 1990s.

Yet there may still be some future costs to bear. The drop in skilled immigration and foreign students that followed could affect long-term growth prospects. As the war in Iraq drags on, it could well become a greater economic burden. Finally, the economic recovery was accompanied by a surge of consumer borrowing. That's left many households in the red. As the housing market slows, they will come under increasing pressure to settle their bills. Only then will a truer financial accounting for 9/11 be possible.

Yahoo or Boo-Hoo?

A Microsoft takeover of Yahoo is often hailed as a cure for the House that Gates built. It would certainly give Microsoft's Internet operations more clout. Yahoo's shareholders, who've seen their investment decline by around a third this year, would probably welcome a juicy buyout premium. Yet a deal's unlikely to be done. Blame Europe's antitrust cops.

DOJ_NMG_0061023

The frostiness of Microsoft's relationship with European Union antitrust officials burst into public view anew on Thursday. The company warned it might be forced to delay release of the next version of its operating system, Windows Vista, in Europe. It seems Microsoft and Brussels can't agree on what features it must exclude from Vista, how much Microsoft may charge, and what secrets it must reveal to would-be rivals.

For Microsoft, the European standoff has left it trying to do business with one hand tied behind its back. Several members of the European Parliament accused regulators this past week of micromanaging the software giant. But the authorities, led by Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, counter that Microsoft's brass-knuckled approach is responsible for the continuing litigation.

This sour relationship would probably lead European antitrust officials to take a dim view of a Microsoft-Yahoo alliance. They wouldn't need to look too hard. In Europe, Google and Microsoft are battling for Internet dominance. Google's currently winning the race with 156 million unique monthly visitors. Microsoft is second with 144 million, while Yahoo is third with 100 million. With a takeover of Yahoo, Microsoft would take the lead.

The dominance of American Internet firms is already politically unpopular in Europe. A Microsoft-Yahoo combination would make life more difficult for existing European-owned Internet businesses, such as those operated by France Telecom, Telecom Italia and Belgacom, which all rank third in their home markets.

European regulators have already blocked a megamerger between two U.S. firms -- the proposed tie-up of General Electric and Honeywell five years ago. It's only too likely they'd bring out their knives again if Microsoft made a bid for Yahoo.

Forward-Dating

Much ado has been made about backdating options, an unsavory practice that has minted potential fortunes for many executives. But in some cases it may actually benefit a corporate chieftain to delay the pricing of options.

Take, for instance, the "forward-dating" of options for Viacom's new boss, Philippe Dauman. The longtime sidekick to chairman Sumner Redstone was given his new job over the Labor Day break. Investors fretted that Mr. Redstone was tightening his grip over Viacom. By last Wednesday, the media company had lost 7% of its value.

Yet the market's displeasure at his appointment hasn't cost Mr. Dauman. Although he received share options that Viacom valued at $12 million, the exercise price of these options was pegged to the close of trading Friday. That's about $2.75 a share cheaper than if they had been priced at the close of trading on Sept. 1, just before Mr. Dauman's return.

Viacom says waiting a few days to price options for incoming chief executives is not uncommon, which is true. Hewlett-Packard did the same when it named Mark Hurd its new boss last year, costing him dearly because the stock rose after Carly Fiorina was ousted. PC-maker Gateway this past week said its new leader's options will be priced on his first workday.

But Ford Motor chose a different tactic when awarding Alan Mulally three million share options. These have an exercise price of $8.28 apiece, the average price on Sept. 1, when he signed his contract and several days before his appointment became public. Because investors liked the news, Ford shares rallied and Mr. Mulally is now nearly $1.5 million richer on paper.

Had Viacom followed the same practice, Mr. Dauman's options would be worth almost $1 million less. To avoid the impression that companies are still playing tricks with executive pay, they should adopt a uniform practice when dishing out stock options to their new hires.

Democrats Maintaining The Pressure On 9/11 Film (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

Despite word of small last-minute cuts meant to soften the film's depiction of President Bill Clinton and his aides, members of his administration and Democratic officials yesterday stepped up their campaign to force ABC to cancel its disputed mini-series, "The Path to 9/11."

The Democratic National Committee delivered to the network a petition with more than 200,000 names that demanded withdrawal of the film, which the petition called "right-wing propaganda."

Officials of the committee said they would continue to collect and deliver signatures until ABC "does the right thing and pulls this scandalous project."

DOJ_NMG_0061024

Senator John Kerry and Al Gore, Mr. Clinton's vice president, also released statements castigating ABC.

But the debate was not entirely one-sided. Among a variety of conservative Web sites that accused Democrats of politicizing Sept. 11 was that of Conservative Voice.

"Former President William Jefferson Clinton and his minions are strong-arming the folks at ABC Television," a commentary on that site said, "in order to stop a docudrama being aired during the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. The Clintonistas are conducting a full-court press to prevent Americans from learning the truth."

As for ABC, its officials stood by earlier statements that the mini-series was a docudrama, not a documentary. The network, which this summer sent copies of the film to journalists for review, also said: "No one has seen the final version of the film, because the editing process is not yet complete. So criticisms of film specifics are premature and irresponsible."

At least before any late editing, the five-hour film depicts some Clinton administration officials, including Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright and Samuel R. Berger, national security adviser, as placing obstacles in the way of strikes against Osama bin Laden.

Both Ms. Albright and Mr. Berger have called such depictions a fabrication.

One particular target of Democratic anger is Thomas H. Kean, chairman of the commission that Congress created to investigate the events leading to the Sept. 11 attacks. Mr. Kean was a senior consultant to the mini-series, and in a strongly worded letter to him dated yesterday, Ms. Albright and Mr. Berger expressed "deep dismay" that he had played such a role.

"Actors portraying us do contemptible things we never did, and say things we neither said nor believed," the letter read. "What's more, in many instances these portrayals are contradicted by your commission's own findings."

The letter outlined five such instances in the mini-series' first half, due to be broadcast tomorrow night.

The Walt Disney Company, ABC's corporate parent, was also under pressure. Bruce R. Lindsey of the Clinton Foundation and Douglas J. Band, counselor to Mr. Clinton, sent a second letter to Robert A. Iger, Disney's chief executive, saying they remained concerned about the impact the mini-series would have on public perception of events.

"We expect that you will make the responsible decision to not air this film," the letter said.

The former president's wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, was somewhat more guarded in remarks at an event at Columbia University.

"My bottom-line view," Ms. Clinton said, "is that when it comes to something as serious and historically significant as 9/11, the truth is enough and we ought to stick to the facts."

The Republican national leadership was quiet on the mini-series, though President Bush did complicate ABC's broadcast plans by scheduling a speech to the nation for 9 p.m., Eastern time, on Monday, the fifth anniversary of the attacks.

That is the night that ABC plans to broadcast the mini-series' second half. The network said yesterday that it would most likely break into the telecast to show the speech and then resume the film.

Walt Disney Co.'s ABC is forging ahead with plans to air a miniseries starting Sunday despite controversy over its efforts to dramatize — and some say unfairly politicize — the events leading up to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Producers said late Friday that they had finished making minor edits to "The Path to 9/11" amid a firestorm of protests from leading Democrats including Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who warned that telecasting "right-wing political propaganda" might violate the terms of ABC's government-mandated broadcast license.

ADVERTISEMENT

Critics say that, among other things, the film fabricates scenes and unfairly blames the Clinton administration for failing to capture or kill Osama bin Laden. The network, for its part, has urged critics to withhold judgment until the final version airs.

Whatever viewers ultimately see, it's clear that the five-hour $40-million docudrama, highlighting years of intelligence failures and political bickering before the attacks, has detonated an election-year bomb that's reverberating from Hollywood to Capitol Hill.

The movie is also threatening the bipartisan work of the Sept. 11 commission, whose Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas H. Kean, served as a paid consultant on the project and has played a key role in ABC's public-relations campaign.

At least two other commission members — former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste and Jamie S. Gorelick, a former deputy attorney general under President Clinton — have vehemently criticized the miniseries project. And two former Clinton officials, Madeleine Albright and Samuel "Sandy" Berger, expressed dismay with Kean's involvement. Clinton spokesman Jay Carson called ABC's actions "despicable" and said the film was "indisputably wrong."

Kean, in an interview Friday, continued to defend the movie as a "first-class project," adding that although the filmmakers took the recent criticisms seriously and made adjustments when warranted, much of the hostile reaction was political grandstanding from partisans who had seen little if any of the film. "That's the blogosphere, frankly," Kean said of the controversy.

The situation was further complicated Friday, when ABC and other networks agreed to carry live a 15-minute speech from President Bush on Monday night, the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. This speech will air at 9 p.m. Eastern time, forcing ABC to interrupt Part 2 of the miniseries in many markets, including New York and Chicago.

The sharp partisan divide over the miniseries has been seized upon in recent days by radio talk show hosts, bloggers, columnists and the like, so much so that the rancor has largely overshadowed the film's critical reception, which has been mixed.

The flap also underscores the challenges docudramas face in such a hyper-politicized environment. In 2003, supporters of President Reagan were incensed by a CBS movie that fictionalized scenes and put words into Reagan's mouth. CBS yanked "The Reagans" before its airdate and moved it to a much-less-watched sister network, the pay cable outlet Showtime.

Indeed, many conservatives have complained that Democrats have a selective memory. They point out that Democrats seemed unconcerned about Michael Moore's 2004 documentary "Fahrenheit 9/11," which pilloried the Bush administration for its response to the terrorist attacks. (Then-Disney Chief Executive Michael Eisner, saying he wanted the company to avoid political controversy, declined to release that film; it obtained another distributor.) Conservative radio commentator Rush Limbaugh recently labeled Clinton and Democrats as "just a bunch of thin-skinned bullies now trying to pressure ABC."

When ABC announced "Path to 9/11" last summer, executives seemed to expect a groundbreaking movie that could garner high ratings, even if they did not anticipate the political uproar.

Steve McPherson, the network's entertainment chief, compared the project to ABC's 1983 TV movie "The Day After," which examined the aftermath of a nuclear strike in middle America. "That was such an important movie for a lot of people, and it wasn't about entertainment," McPherson told the trade paper Daily Variety. "It was about putting out a message, and this ['Path to 9/11'] falls into the vein of things you do because you think they can be valuable."

But the network may have at least inadvertently politicized the Sept. 11 film by hiring writer-producer Cyrus Nowrasteh, a politically conservative Iranian American Muslim.

In an interview last month with FrontPage Magazine, Nowrasteh, whose writing credentials include TNT's acclaimed miniseries "Into the West," said the ABC film would be unsparing in its view of anti-terrorism during the Clinton years. "The 9/11 report details the Clinton's administration's response — or lack of response — to Al Qaeda and how this emboldened Bin Laden to keep attacking American interests," Nowrasteh said. "The worst example is the response to the October 2000 attack on the USS Cole in Yemen where 17 American sailors were killed. There simply was no response. Nothing."

Former Clinton aides have disputed Nowrasteh's characterization of the report and the administration's reaction to the Cole bombing.

An Aug. 23 screening of the ABC miniseries at the National Press Club in Washington proved a turning point. More than 200 people attended, including Kean, the producers and many family members of Sept. 11 victims. The producers showed only the first half, and a DVD of the entire film was given to guests on the way out. Al Felzenberg, press secretary for the Sept. 11 commission, said that afterward there was "a lot of emotion in the room." "It was very gripping," he added.

Others were outraged.

"There were significant deviations from our report," said Ben-Veniste, who attended the event. During a question-and-answer period after the screening, he added, "I questioned why ABC would fictionalize events that were set forth with great care. We didn't get satisfactory answers."

By the middle of this week, Democratic protests clustered around two main areas. The film, they said, falsely claims that former national security advisor Berger and former Secretary of State Albright blocked CIA and military efforts to kill Bin Laden in the late 1990s.

Moreover, critics say, "Path to 9/11" is wrong to suggest that Clinton was too preoccupied with the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal to focus on combating terrorism.

Because ABC has apparently made many edits to the film in recent weeks, it's impossible to say how much if any of this material will survive in the version that is to air Sunday and Monday.

But Leo Braudy, a professor and cultural historian at USC, said he believed the dust-up stemmed from the fact that "there is no narrative that everyone accepts about 9/11."

"The 9/11 commission comes out with one narrative, which no one reads. Then movies take a piece of it — there's 'United 93' and 'World Trade Center.' The Bush administration is pushing its own narrative of the meaning of 9/11 as justification for its policies. And now a miniseries comes into being that creates a narrative in a semi-documentary, fictionalized manner, which is very persuasive.

"Suddenly people who felt they know what really happened are being preempted by this fiction. Naturally they are going to be upset about it," he said. "Narrative creates closure."

Braudy wonders whether Americans are ready to see movies on the terrorist attacks: "I don't think we have enough historical distance."

Clinton, Other Democrats Assail ABC Docudrama 'Path To 9/11' (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Former president Bill Clinton has urged ABC to "tell the truth" in its hotly disputed docudrama on the battle against Osama bin Laden as network executives scrambled to make last-minute changes to fictional scenes.

Clinton told reporters in Arkansas Thursday night that ABC executives should provide an honest accounting in "The Path to 9/11" -- "particularly if they're going to claim it's based on the 9/11 commission report, they shouldn't have scenes which are directly contradicted by the factual findings of the 9/11 commission. I just want people to tell the truth and not to pretend it's something it's not."

DOJ_NMG_0061027

An ABC spokeswoman said yesterday that changes are being made to a number of scenes in the film, including one deletion involving The Washington Post. ABC plans to air the film tomorrow and Monday -- despite another letter from the Clinton camp yesterday asking that it be pulled -- although it is trying to figure out how to accommodate President Bush's prime-time speech Monday and a planned panel discussion after the movie.

Democrats -- joined yesterday by former vice president Al Gore -- have mounted a campaign against the film, which depicts Clinton administration officials as undermining attempts to capture or kill bin Laden. Actor Harvey Keitel, who plays an FBI agent in the film, has joined the critics, telling CNN's "Showbiz Tonight" that he has had arguments with the filmmakers over elements that were "wrong."

"You can't put these things together, compress them and then distort the reality. . . . You cannot cross the line from a conflation of events to a distortion of the event," Keitel said. "Where we have distorted something, we made a mistake, and it should be corrected."

In another salvo, nine prominent historians -- including Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr., Sean Wilentz and Michael Kazin -- released a letter urging the film's cancellation. Calling ABC's explanation that the movie will be identified as a dramatization "disingenuous and dangerous," they said: "A responsible broadcast network should have nothing to do with the falsification of history, except to expose it."

One scene that is being revised -- to what extent is unclear -- involves former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger refusing to approve a CIA plan to snatch bin Laden in Afghanistan, which Berger and the Sept. 11 commission say never happened.

The Post is mentioned in an advance copy of the movie, in which CIA officials are seen discussing with an Afghan rebel leader and each other the difficulties of keeping track of bin Laden.

"Besides," one CIA official says, "ever since The Washington Post disclosed we intercept his calls, UBL has stopped using phones altogether. He is using couriers like they did a thousand years ago."

Post management contacted ABC and objected to the reference yesterday. An ABC spokeswoman said that the scene had already been reviewed at the request of the network's lawyers and that the explicit reference to The Post will be cut.

An Aug. 17, 1998, Post article quoted a former CIA official as describing "intercepted electronic communications among bin Laden associates." Four days later -- the day after a U.S. cruise missile attack against bin Laden launched in retaliation for the bombing of two American embassies in Africa -- a Washington Times article said that bin Laden "keeps in touch with the world via computers and satellite phones."

At a news conference in December, Bush said that "the fact that we were following Osama bin Laden because he was using a certain type of telephone made it into the press as the result of a leak." He chastised the media for helping "the enemy" by "revealing sources, methods and what we use the information for."

Scott McClellan, then the White House press secretary, said afterward that Bush was referring to the Washington Times article, which had also been cited in the Sept. 11 commission report.

But bin Laden's communications had been disclosed much earlier. Time magazine noted bin Laden's use of satellite phones in December 1996. Terrorism analyst Peter Bergen did the same thing on CNN in 1997 while reporting on an interview he had conducted with the al-Qaeda leader.

Bush Asks To Interrupt Show (KCS)

By David Bauder

The Kansas City Star, September 9, 2006

NEW YORK | ABC, still dealing with angry former Clinton administration officials about an upcoming Sept. 11, 2001, miniseries, also faced a request Friday from President Bush to interrupt the film for a speech.

The president has asked networks to clear time for an address to the nation at 8:01 p.m. Central time Monday, the scheduled start of the last hour of “The Path to 9/11.”

The network did not immediately say what it would do. It has said the miniseries, which stretches five hours commercial-free Sunday and Monday, is still being edited amid concerns by former Clinton officials that it drastically distorts history.

DOJ_NMG_0061028

"No one has seen the final version of the film, because the editing process is not yet complete, so criticisms of film specifics are premature and irresponsible," the network said in a statement Thursday.

ABC said that for dramatic and narrative purposes "the movie contains fictionalized scenes, composite and representative characters, and dialogue and time compression."

A group of historians, including Arthur Schlesinger Jr. and Princeton University's Sean Wilentz, wrote Friday to Robert Iger, CEO of Walt Disney Co., which owns ABC, urging him to scrap the miniseries. They said permitting inaccuracies to heighten drama is "disingenuous and dangerous."

The Democratic National Committee said it delivered a petition with nearly 200,000 signatures to ABC's Washington office urging the network to drop its "right-wing factually inaccurate mocudrama."

The controversy is reminiscent of the one that erupted over a 2003 CBS miniseries about the late Ronald Reagan. In the face of political pressure over that film's accuracy, CBS canceled it, and it later aired on the Showtime cable network.

Harvey Keitel, one of the actors in "The Path to 9/11," said he questioned whether some of the material was accurate.

"When I received the script, it said 'ABC history project,' " Keitel said in an interview with CNN Headline News' "Showbiz Tonight."

"I took it to be exactly what they presented to me: history. And that the facts were correct. It turned out not all the facts were correct, and ABC set out trying to heal that problem. In some instances it was too late because we had begun."

Scenes being reviewed by the network and producers involve Samuel Berger, the former national security adviser, and Madeleine Albright, the former secretary of state, and efforts to capture Osama bin Laden, according to an official close to the film.

A cut of the film distributed to TV critics depicts a team poised in darkness outside bin Laden's cave fortress in Afghanistan while an actor portraying Berger in Washington stalls on giving the final go-ahead to carry out the seizure. He confers on videophone with CIA chief George Tenet.

"Look, George," Berger says, "if you feel confident, you can present your recommendation to the president yourself."

Tenet responds angrily, then Berger's screen goes blank. He has hung up.

Having waited on the phone for clearance, the mission's lead CIA agent must give the rest of the team the bad news: The mission is aborted.

The next scene shows archival footage of President Bill Clinton's video testimony about his relationship with Monica Lewinsky.

Albright objected to a scene that reportedly shows her warning the Pakistani government before an air strike on Afghanistan, which she said was false and defamatory.

Former administration officials and Senate Democrats called the movie "terribly wrong."

Clinton, speaking with reporters after a Democratic fundraiser in Arkansas on Thursday, said that he had not seen the film but that "I think they ought to tell the truth."

The director, David Cunningham, in an earlier interview with The Associated Press, said the people putting the film together would hear conflicting reports all the time.

"These might be from experts who were there in the same room, and they're telling us completely opposite things," he said.

He said he would use the Sept. 11 commission report to try to resolve those disputes.

"There was no agenda for this movie to go after a particular party or person," Cunningham said. "We were showing what happened, and the people who were involved along the way. This is not a blue-state/red-state movie."

Former New Jersey governor Thomas Kean, a Republican who led the commission, defended the miniseries.

"It's something the American people should see," he said Friday in an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America." "Because you understand how these people wanted to do us harm, developed this plot, and how the machinations of the American government under two administrations not only failed to stop them, but even failed to slow them down."

The Unslammed Phone (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

DOJ_NMG_0061029

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Sandy Berger is lucky they didn't show him stuffing government documents into his bra.

After all, cinematic license is cinematic license.

Regarding ABC's tarted-up 9/11 movie that sparked a furor among Clintonites who felt they were unfairly blamed for the rise of Osama, I hate to be so quaint as to defend reality. There's not much point. It's as dead as dial-up.

In Hollywood, reality comes with quotation marks around it, as in fixed and scripted "reality" shows. In New York, hybrids of fiction and nonfiction are lavishly rewarded; publishers want the reality part to sell the fiction part and the fiction part to enhance the reality part. In Washington, the Bush team is on a cynical and dangerous new pre-election push to present its fantasies about Iraq as reality, accusing reality-based critics of "moral or intellectual confusion," as Rummy put it.

When a reporter asked President Bush a couple of weeks ago what Iraq had to do with 9/11, he blurted out the truth: "Nothing." But momentarily dismissing that fantasy isn't about to dissuade him from others. "One of the hardest parts of my job is to connect Iraq to the war on terror,'' President Bush told Katie Couric this week. I bet. Making up is hard to do.

The administration's shameless mau-mauing was undercut yesterday by a 376-page Senate Intelligence Committee report slapping Bush hawks for relying on the flawed information provided by Ahmad Chalabi's Iraqi National Congress to help make the case for war. The report also reaffirmed that Saddam viewed Osama in a negative light, and unveiled a C.I.A. assessment rejecting the president's continuing claims about prewar links between Saddam and the Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The 2005 C.I.A. finding concluded that Saddam "did not have a relationship, harbor, or even turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates."

W. is pulling out all the stops this week to try to make people forget he was in charge when the twin towers were hit, but if he's doing so great, why is Osama releasing new tapes while Afghanistan crumbles while Pakistan stands ready to implode while Lebanon has already exploded while Iran goes nuclear and taunts us while Al Qaeda in Iraq calls on its followers to kill Americans "by a sniper bullet, spear, explosive or martyrdom car"?

Conservatives are crowing at the prospect of an ABC movie written by one of their own that blames 9/11 on a flaccid Clinton national security team.

Bill was distracted by the Monica fallout, just as W. was distracted, on Osama and Katrina, by his insistence on living life as usual in Crawford. Bill had no natural inclination to use American force and fumbled on how to strike back at Osama. W., petulantly, did not want to focus on terrorism because his predecessor had.

W. had a clear narrative thread in 2001; all he needed to do was go after the bad guys who hit us. Instead, he obsessed about other bad guys who happened to pose no danger to us.

Why do presidents and filmmakers dealing with the most stunning events in recent American history feel the need to go beyond facts? Isn't the dire actuality enough? Oliver Stone implied that Lyndon Johnson and Nixon might have been in some tortuous way connected to plots to kill J.F.K.

The ABC movie promoted itself as a serious work based on the 9/11 commission report and featuring Tom Kean, the commission's co-chairman, as a co-executive producer. (It's impossible to imagine Earl Warren producing a movie about the events in Dallas.) But if it's making a claim upon people's attention as a trustworthy and accurate description of events that bear on all our lives, you've got to stick with the truth. You can't pick and choose when you want it to be history and when you want it to be art. (Quel art.)

Sandy Berger yelped about a scene that depicted him refusing to authorize a military strike to kill Osama and slamming down the phone on a C.I.A. officer at a key moment. Cyrus Nowrasteh, the Republican and Limbaugh pal who served as the writer and a producer, told KRLA-AM in Los Angeles that the scene was improvised.

They distorted history to throw in a standard cliché of melodrama? (The 9/11 Commission Report as Douglas Sirk would have filmed it.) Why compromise your movie by adding tacky things that don't increase its aesthetic power and detract from its moral power?

The argument over which president is to blame for 9/11 is tiresome. Both obviously bear some blame. There are no West Wing heroes in this story.

An Untrue 'Path'? (NSWK)

By Marc Peyser

Newsweek, September 9, 2006

Former president Bill Clinton is blasting the ABC 9/11 docudrama "The Path to 9/11" for being inaccurate and unfair. You've got to love the irony of that. Wasn't he the guy who hired Hollywood filmmakers to create a campaign biopic of his life? Sure, "The Path to 9/11" makes up dialogue, invents scenes and creates a composite character or two, but sometimes you have to craft the facts in a certain way to tell a complicated story. Just like sometimes you have to reconsider what the definition of "is" is when you don't want people to know you've had an affair with a White House intern.

But let's remove Clinton, and politics, from the situation. Does the president make a fair point? Is "The Path to 9/11" unfit for broadcast because it plays fast and loose with history? After all, "The Path to 9/11" claims to be a balanced and detailed account of the government's decadelong fight against extremist Islamic terrorists. It actually starts with the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center and tries to connect the many and disparate lines that became the blueprint for the attacks in 2001. The movie's theme is that government officials in two administrations had numerous opportunities to stop the various players—from the 19 hijackers to Osama bin Laden himself—but they bungled the job because they were overly concerned with political appearances and petty interagency feuds.

Clinton's major beef is over a scene where his security adviser Richard Clarke (played by Stephen Root), stops the CIA from assassinating bin Laden out of concern that the president wants to avoid any political damage should the mission go awry. The movie then cuts to real footage of Clinton testifying that "I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky." The obvious implication is that Clinton ducked pulling the trigger because he was too preoccupied with his political future, especially since it was undermined by his own personal drama. (And if that implication isn't obvious enough, the camera immediately cuts from Clinton to a suggestive shot of the looming phallic Washington monument).

Was Clinton too distracted to act? Maybe. Is it plausible to suggest that? Certainly to some people, including the filmmakers. And frankly, that should be enough. "The Path to 9/11" isn't a documentary; it's a docu-drama. Part of the idea of fictionalizing historical events is to tell a story, to get at a deeper truth than a documentary could. After all those Oliver Stone movies—not to mention dozens of "reality" TV shows—viewers know the difference between real history and an entertainment that uses history as its subject. If the Reagans can survive the snarky look at their relationship posited by the mini-series "The Reagans," certainly Clinton can survive "The Path to 9/11," too. This isn't a history lesson. It's a television show.

That said, ABC shouldn't be let off the hook entirely for "The Path to 9/11." The mini-series itself—which, by the way, is hugely engrossing and more than a little scary—should stand on its own. But the network's own PR for the movie opened the door to Clinton's complaints. The filmmakers, including producer Marc Platt and director David Cunningham, have been very outspoken about how "The Path to 9/11" is steeped in history. They say it's based primarily on the government's own 9/11 Commission report.

Former New Jersey governor Tom Kean, who co-chaired the commission, was a senior consultant on the movie and has personally vouched for the movie's accuracy in recent months. "This is the story of how it happened," Kean said at a news conference in July. Added Platt: "Our ambitions and our goals and our standards were all about accuracy." ABC was so impressed with the "accuracy" of the movie, it has planned to send it to schools as a teaching tool. What's more, the network will show the movie with no interruptions, which seems like a tacit way of saying this movie is too important, too truthful to be sullied with something as phony as a commercial. Pompous? Oh, yeah.

And now that pomposity has come back to bite them in the behind. If ABC hadn't acted as if "The Path to 9/11" was the definitive word on the events leading up to 9/11, perhaps the public officials depicted in it, including former national-security adviser Sandy Berger and former secretary of State Madeleine Albright, wouldn't be complaining about inaccuracies. You can't sell your movies as "extraordinarily educational," which is how Platt has described it, then throw on the mantle of fiction when someone whose life was fictionalized complains.

The fact is, networks are always chicken when it comes to political pressure. After all, CBS got so nervous about "The Reagans" that it made sister network Showtime air it. Even though ABC says it's standing by its movie now, I wouldn't be surprised if some of the most egregiously fictionalized scenes—including one where Berger slams down the phone on a CIA operative—were excised when the mini-series hits the air. Frankly, the Monica Lewinsky references—there are actually just two of them—do come across as gratuitous and semipolitical and could easily be edited out, too. There's plenty of blame to go around in "The Path to 9/11" without them.

Congress Criticizes Federal Response To Illnesses After 9/11 And Seeks More Spending (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

After listening to recovery workers at ground zero and downtown residents emotionally describe how they had been ignored and insulted as they sought help for health problems after 9/11, members of a Congressional subcommittee roundly criticized the federal response yesterday and called for sharply increased medical spending.

Subcommittee members, joined by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles E. Schumer, accused the Bush administration of ignoring the health problems that arose among workers who toiled at ground zero and the claims of downtown residents who say they were also sickened by the dust. The administration has done little to prepare for a similar disaster in the future, they said.

"Today it appears the public health approach to lingering environmental hazards remains unfocused and halting," said Representative Christopher Shays, a Republican from Connecticut, and chairman of the House Subcommittee on National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations, which held the hearing in Lower Manhattan, a block from ground zero. "The unquestionable need for long-term monitoring has been met with only short term commitments."

The subcommittee hearing, the fourth to be held since the Sept. 11 attack, came amidst rising concern about the long-term health effects on about 40,000 workers and volunteers who were exposed to toxic smoke and dust on the debris pile. The subcommittee is examining the way the limited federal funding has been used to address the health problems and is to look for ways to better coordinate those efforts.

Representative Vito Fossella, a Republican from Staten Island, criticized the government for not having done even basic work to record how many people participated in the cleanup and recovery operations.

Senator Schumer said the $55 million in federal funds set aside for medical treatment of rescue and recovery workers was inadequate. "We need a federal commitment that everyone who needs help will get it," Senator Schumer said.

Steven M. Centore, of Flanders, N.Y., was a team leader at ground zero for the Department of Energy's radiological assistance program. He said that he is now suffering from respiratory, circulatory and gastrointestinal problems. .

Mr. Centore, 49, said he struggled with the federal workers' compensation system and had received no financial help from the system. "I feel like it's a contest to see if they're going to give in first or I'm going to die first," he said.
